

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

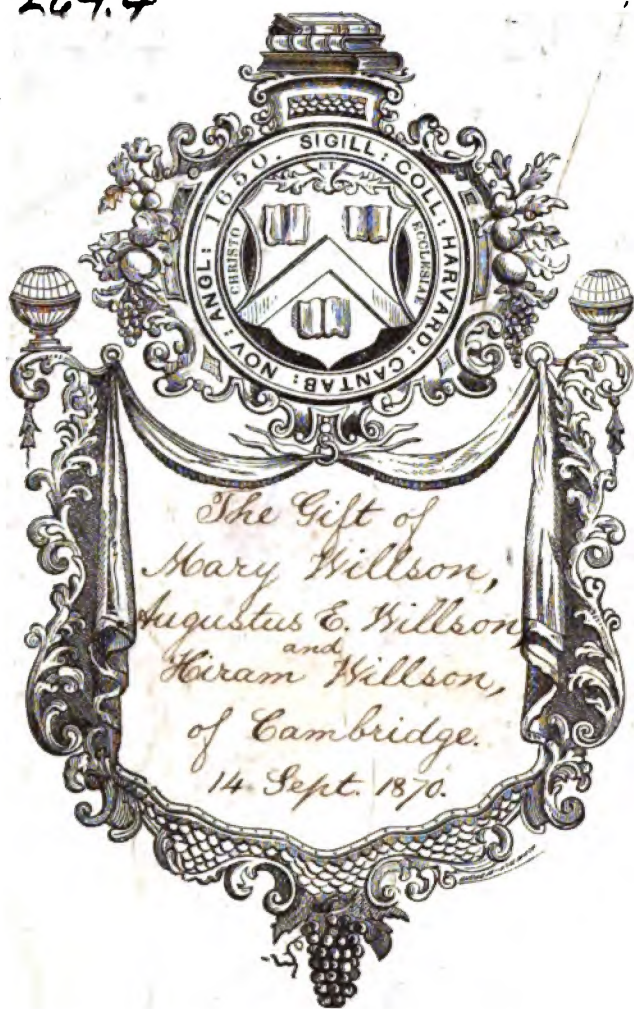

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LADIES' REPOSITORY.

JANUARY, 1855.

THE INSPIRED MAN.

BY J. D. BELL.

IF you had lived a mariner's life, you could speak of having many times gazed out, long and rapturously, upon the broad sea, when the soft sunbeams were sporting with her raven locks, and the wild and boisterous winds were all slumbering in the distant islands. Then you might tell us of having been suddenly startled from your calm and peaceful reverie by a deep voice from the heavens, calling up the Titan forces of the tempest. Soon your ear was stann'd by the loud wail of the blast, and, as you looked out, you saw the white sweat, foaming on the face of the toiling waters. Once more you stretched your giddy eyes over the great deep, and the thundering of the billows, the darkness, and the lightning, told you that old Ocean had grown eloquent.

I have fancied that this sublime scene might be considered a fit illustration of that grand process by which the great and divinely gifted man becomes inspired.

There are times when we see the human soul entering into a freer, mightier, and more intense life—a life that seems to gush with red and terrible action! The whole being seems to be shocked through and through with currents of divine galvanism. The ordinary infirmities of human nature seem to have melted all away under the mysterious heat of an awakened, inspired, eloquent soul. The reason has assumed a strange clearness; the imagination is all alive with bold and beautiful imagery; and the eye darts forth a wild and weird electricity. To act mightily, in that hour, seems as easy as for the storm to shake the giant trees, or to toss the iron-ribbed ship. The great deep of the soul has been broken up. Every look, every gesture, every smile, and every frown beams, and burns, and overflows with fervid power. And the glorious words that come sparkling, and leaping, and gleaming, and thundering forth—then, O, who can describe them!

"They seize upon the mind, arrest, and search,
And shake it—bow the tall soul, as by wind—
Rush over it as rivers over reeds,
That quaver in the current—turn us cold,
And pale, and voiceless, leaving in the brain
A rocking and ringing!"

One of the peculiar features of this lofty inspiration is its naturalness. It is always interpreted by the occasion from which it originates. You can not mistake it. No buffoon can pass off an inflated for an inspired soul. The mimic orator will always be betrayed by his speechless eyes; and gin-inspired poetry will always smell of gin. True eloquence can no more be mimicked than an elephant could be housed in a soap-bubble. The inspired man will always present you his credentials, and you will acknowledge them, and give him welcome to your soul; for you must. As his day, so will his strength be. In the hour of insignificant emergency, his voice will be sweet and playful; and when great interests are at stake, his appropriate utterances will also come forth; and you will understand them then, just as, when you hear a rolling among the clouds, you know it is the thunder.

There are three great moods of human eloquence or inspiration. One of these is that state of sublime abstraction in which the soul of the gifted poet is sometimes found absorbed away and lost. The inspiration of the poet is the most ethereal of any of which man is susceptible. We see men sometimes that remind us at once of Deity himself. They possess such power, that, with almost a single word, they might hush the clamor of rebellion, or take the spunk out of great armies. Such is not the poet's power. He partakes more of the angel than of the God. He seems to be the heavenliest being in the world. Milton and Paradise are twin words. How disgusted we are with the epic that runs down into sensualism and worldliness—with the Muse that pollutes its seraphic wing in the dust! You read a few leaves of Hudibras, and, in spite of all his admirers, your heart whispers, "This is not divine!" The true poet makes us heavenlier, not earthlier. I think there is, at best, but little divine inspiration in satires. When did you like Horace most, my friend? Was it when, with his great pinions dragging along the very ground, he led you through the dull routine of his journey from Rome to Brundisium? or was it when, almost a Horace yourself, you drank into your very being the beautiful fire of his Odes and Epodes? When did Byron catch hold of your spirit, and soar up out of sight with it in the ether of heaven? Was it when you read his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" and "Don Juan?"* or was it when you saw and heard him, like some royal angel, soliloquizing in the "Prophecy of Dante" and "Childe Harold?"

If you fathom the hearts of men, you will find that the universal sentiment is, that the true mission of the poet is to exalt the mind, to gather supernal light from the far-distant slopes and summits of truth, and to scatter it over the world. And hence it was that when we found Byron and Burns in a debauch, and read Alexander Pope's lampoon on London, the very best lines of these poets began, from that time, to smack too much of the flesh. I confess that I have never admired Lalla Rookh so much since I read of Tom Moore's duel. Inspiration is always understood to mean a state of exalted fervor—a divine afflatus. It can not be the fire of rotten wood. Milton and Homer both understood this; and, hence, though blind, they constantly gaze into our souls from their great works, with eyes like stars. You know how it was, too, with the divine Ossian. In that hour when his gorgeous words flew around your spirit, like cinders struck from a blazing diamond, you could not believe him a poor, blind man, pining for the light. His humanity was lost in his angelhood. And just so the true poet is always struggling upward from the human to the divine. It seems to be his fate to be constantly subduing and sublimating that which is material and earthly, whether of himself or of the world around him. He makes that look beautiful which is deformed. He puts sweet odor into the withered rose, and dilates upon the majestic beauty of darkness. He never tells you that he is poor, or blind, or sensual. He never tells you that because the critics have done him violence, they ought all to be damned. The working of his lower passions is entirely concealed; for he knows well that to unfold this would be fatal to a pure and serene spirituality. He makes his joys seem ethereal and his sorrows divine.

"His fantasy

Breathes spirit-life ecstatic o'er dead rhyme;
As from cold river waves the gold edged rays
Of morn's young sun send up a columned haze,
Rifted and quivering, through whose dense array
We see the rose-sheathed day-beams, trembling round
The silver sculpture of the clouds, that sway
'Neath sapphire skies, in virgin whiteness crowned."

Such is the true poet, and such is his inspiration.

But another great mood of human inspiration is presented to us in the orator. There is an indescribable power in gifted oratory. The inspiration of the orator is unlike that of the poet, inasmuch as it is a FUSION rather than a BLOOMING of the soul. The inspiration of the poet is beautiful, that of the orator grand and irresistible. One woos, the other carries by storm; the poet charms by the halo of light that envelops him, the orator overwhelms and merges every thing in the impetuous gush of his melted passions.

The orator seems to be an embodiment of all the forces as well as the charms of nature. When inspired, he represents the storm, flapping its wild wings over the great deep; and his words, then, are even "Like supernatural thunders, far yet near,

Sowing their fiery echoes through the hills!"

Again, he has all the gentleness and beauty of a summer day. His voice seems to mimic the soft gurgling of streams and fountains; his face is serene as the azure heavens; and we catch beautiful glimpses of a quiet soul beaming through his eyes, just as we sometimes see the peaceful sun mirrored far down in the blue waters.

But now he suddenly assumes a new attitude. The ripple of brooks and the music of birds is heard no more. The feast of beauty is all broken up. Blighted is the gorgeous purple of the fields, and covered with cold, dank clouds is the sun that but lately shone down so beautifully upon us. Winter—cold, bleak Winter—with his beard of frost, comes up before our eyes. We hear a dismal chattering of teeth, and see the billowy snow drifting over the frozen ground.

One word more, and we find ourselves, it may be, reposing on some soft couch, regaled by the breath of zephyrs, our thoughts wandering far away in the flowery land of dreams. But we can not stay long here. The eye of the orator suddenly flashes with keen lightning, and a deep voice, like muffled thunder, soon startles us up from our slumbers. We open our eyes, and lo! we now see cities, and mountains, and great trees reeling over the earth, drunk with volcanic fire! We are not mistaken. Etna—great Etna—vomiting forth terrific streams of burning lava, stands before us. Alas! this is too much. We sink down, our faces buried in our hands, and our hearts beating like battle-drums—thunder-shivered, speechless, lost! But it needs only one more flourish of that orator's mysterious wand to throw us back among those streams, and birds, and flowers, and dreams again. O, how omnipotent is the great orator! No wonder that when Benjamin Franklin had heard the mighty Whitefield for the first time in his life, he threw all the gold he had into the charity-box. No wonder that when Rowland Hill had become surcharged with the terrible electricity of the eloquence of Chalmers, he sprang from his seat, like a wild man, and striking the very pale of the altar with his fist, shouted to the top of his voice, "Well done, Chalmers!" And no wonder that when Patrick Henry, that "eagle of eloquence," uttered the eternal scream, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" the patriots of the Revolution began to harness for battle.

We should not fail to notice here, perhaps, how soon the great orator seems to resume his humanity again after the hour of his inspiration is over. The glorious man then unstrains his electrified nerves. The mighty bond of his being becomes loosened, and he stoops down from his empyrean of eloquence, like Cicero, it may be, to have a romp with his children; or, like Daniel Webster, "to saunter along the shore of the great Atlantic, watching the play of her noble billows, or seat himself on the bank of some flashing streamlet to fish for trout."

Now he is the ocean in a calm; or, rather, he is old Etna, whose base grows green with grass and flowers in midwinter.

We come, finally, to notice the third and last great mood of human inspiration. And it is that which arrests and startles us in the wild and awful splendor of the hero.

Heroism is but another name for practical eloquence. The hero is the inspired man, literally working out his lofty ideal. This ideal may be any great purpose. In the case of Bonaparte it was a martial conquest; of Robert Fulton, a steamboat; of Martin Luther, the Reformation. That is a false philosophy which confines heroism to simply a fearless wielding of the sword, and a firm facing of the cannon. The chief of warriors did mighty battle with but a helm in his hand, and a compass for his shield. The heartiest shouts of victory the world has ever heard, perhaps, came from old garrets and laboratories. Many a Waterloo has been fought on a leaf of foolscap. I turn my eyes down yonder, and see the battle route of that great Napoleon whose war-steed is the swift-footed lightning. Howard, and Columbus, and Morse, and Washington, and Bonaparte, were all men of one blood. And of the same brave blood were the Christian martyrs, and all the heroic missionaries that have fought and fell in heathen lands. But we must not tarry here.

Let us glance at the hero in that hour when his soul, swallowed up in the maelstrom of ambition, seems goading his very body with lashes of fire up the burning steep of victory. O, what an hour is that! Scorn, ridicule, danger, death, all that under other circumstances might intimidate, and terrify, have lost their power. The man is transformed into a hero.

"And now with flashing eyes he springs,
His whole bright figure raised in air,
As if his soul had spread its wings,
And poised him one wild instant there!"

Unlucky moment, this, for all opposing forces. A mighty hand has been lifted up, and the royal mandate has gone forth, "Thus far and no farther!" Stand back now, ye old priests, and princes, and kings. Hide thy dragon head, thou coward Pope! A hero, clad in fire, and armed with thunderbolts, is after you all. What can ye do now with your proclamations, and denunciations, and martyr-fires? Ye can not conquer a brave man. Devils can not conquer him. Who can stop a red comet in its fiery course? Who can gag a volcano? He looks at your swords, and their keenness is gone. He bares his bosom to your arrows, and they turn from their courses and come whizzing harmlessly over his head. He goes before the mouths of your cannons, and they are as mum as death. He defies your tortures, and goes to the stake shouting, Victory! At Thermopylae, he is Leonidas—at Quebec, Montgomery. Like Stephen, he falls with his radiant lips laureled with victorious prayers; and like Marco Bozzaris, he reels from his battle-horse, exclaiming in his last moment, "To die for liberty is a pleasure and not a pain." Such is the eloquence of heroism.

If we have correctly canvassed the whole ground of our subject, the three great moods of human inspiration we have just contemplated embrace all the points of inquiry that can, in any manner, be entertaining to us. We have seen the inspired man as the poet, the orator, and the hero; or, better to say, as the inspired thinker, the inspired speaker, and the inspired actor. It only remains now to ask each one to study the inspired man in connection with his own life and destiny. Yes, my friend, study him well. If you would be the poet, aspire to no less than ethereal spirituality. I beseech you, write not for this world under the miskindled fervors of passion.

If you would be the orator, struggle toward the glorious heights of speech. Be true. Be nobly natural.

And, let me pray you, do cultivate the spirit of the hero every day. You must not forget this. Every minute of time pleads for heroes. Will you be one?

LIFE AND REMINISCENCES OF WILLIAM JAY.

BY ERWIN HOUSE.

FIRST PAPER.

PERSONS who undertake the work of writing their own lives generally offend two classes of individuals: first, those who do the printing of their book for them; and, secondly, those who undertake to read such books when printed. The cause of offense in the former class arises from the fact that it is an enormous draft on their stock of capital I's, and in the latter class the stone of stumbling consists in the apparently everlasting glorification of self, which constantly stands out. Mr. Jay, the author of Morning and Evening Exercises, and a variety of the most popular and practical works before either the English or American public, and whose name is emphatically a household word among religious people and families, undertook the work of writing his own life, not for the benefit of the public, but at the urgent request of his own children. He succeeded well in the undertaking; and, now that he is dead, and those children have placed their father's life before the public, many will be the sentiments of gratitude and admiration expressed by those who love to peruse biography, seasoned with good sense, and pervaded by variety of incident and a wholesome vivacity.

William Jay was born near Bath, England, in the year 1769. Of his early life and parentage very little of a satisfactory nature is known. His parents were very respectable; that is to say, they were poor and religious. William was their fourth and only male child. It is mentioned in his commendation that he was remarkably free from those immoralities which too often attach to youth. "I remember one act only of gross transgression," says he, "and it pains me now in review; it was the uttering of a known and repeated falsehood, accompanied with an oath, to carry a point, as I was interested at play. For this my conscience so smote me, that I was soon constrained to withdraw from my companions, and went home, and retired to implore forgiveness." When about fourteen years of age, the Methodists came into the neighborhood where William lived, and he went to hear one of their preachers, by the name of Turner, preach. Here is his account of the way he was impressed by the services:

"The singing, the extemporaneousness of the address, and the apparent affection and earnestness of the speaker, peculiarly affected me; and what he said of 'the faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners,' was like rain upon the mown grass, or cold water to a thirsty soul. I scarcely slept that night for weeping and for joy; and as the preaching was to be renewed the next morning at seven o'clock—not to interfere with the service of the Established Church—I happened to be the first that came. Mrs. Turner, who had come from Trowbridge to superintend things for the time, opened the door herself, and, taking me by the hand, benignly asked, 'Are you hungering for the bread of life?' She continued talking to me most winningly for some minutes, till others began to enter. But this seemingly casual and trifling circumstance was important in the result; for from that day forward she particularly noticed me; and, as I had been recently apprenticed, and was returning from my work, which was then at Fonthill House, in the evening, she often met me, and conversed with me till I reached home; and her information and addresses were more useful than many of the sermons I heard, as she adapted herself to the state she found I was in, and to the present kind of knowledge which I required."

Young Jay continued to attend Methodist preaching; and, on one occasion, having listened to a sermon on the importance of family prayer, he went home and requested his father to set up the family altar, and have regular morning and evening devotions. The father declined, and from a consideration which makes, even now, many homes of professedly religious persons prayerless homes; namely, that he had no gift for prayer. Whereupon his son, to relieve his father, proposed, with tears in his eyes, to do the praying himself. The offer was accepted, and William forthwith became a sort of domestic chaplain. He also attended the Methodist prayer meetings, and engaged in the exercises with a zeal, a pathos, and a power truly astonishing in one so young. At one of the church prayer meetings an Episcopalian, an acquaintance of the Jay family, dropped in to see how things were carried on. In his turn William addressed the Throne of Grace. He had unction in his words, and prayed that all present might have their names written in the Lamb's book of life. This was too much for his neighbor, the Episcopalian, who professed orthodoxy, and who thought that he alone saw things clearly. He, therefore, took his young friend aside, and said abruptly to him, "You know well that that Lamb's book was filled up from all eternity, and if our names are not now written there, they never will be." But the young, praying soldier was not to be frightened by such a declaration; for he immediately quoted the words, "The Spirit and the bride say, Come; and let him that heareth say, Come; and let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

When about fifteen years of age, a clergyman of the Independent Church, by the name of Winter, a most exemplary man, became greatly prepossessed in regard to William, and took him as a pupil into an academy of which he had charge, and which was solely for the education of young men desiring to do good and preach the Gospel. Mr. Winter was a poor man, and so was William a poor boy, and sometimes they both got into straits about getting along temporally. Mr. Winter used frequently to go as far as thirty and forty miles on a Saturday to preach; but instead of getting good feed for his horse and himself, and pay for his preaching, he was turned empty away, and his horse outrageously foundered and abused. At one appointment, named Addington, where the populace had been stirred up beforehand against "irregular preachers," by the Episcopal clergymen and some other fellows of the baser sort, his horse lost a great portion of his tail and mane, and parts of both ears.

Mr. Winter, nothing daunted by the opposition and persecutions in his path, kept on quietly serving God, and so urged the work of preaching upon young Jay, that he took hold of the Gospel plow himself when scarce sixteen years of age. His first effort was made at a small village, called Abbington, near Stonehenge, and was from 1 Peter ii, 3: "If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." His divisions were as follows: 1. The Lord is gracious; 2. The best way to know this grace is by tasting it; 3. Such knowledge will have an influence over the possessor; for if we have tasted that the Lord is gracious, it will induce us to love him; it will draw out our desire after more; it will make us anxious to bring others to partake with us, saying, "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye may also have fellowship with us." From his sixteenth to his twenty-first year he was kept busy in sermonizing and preaching; for in that period he delivered over one thousand discourses, or about two hundred per year, or four per week. And this, it might be well to remark in passing, is more than the majority of more modern preachers do. Numbers of preachers in our city stations do not preach over sixty or eighty sermons a year, having no discourse through the week, and having but two Sabbath services, and one or both of these frequently attended to by some stranger or friend. Now and then young Jay had to take some severe criticisms. Here is a sample, in his own words:

"Soon after I begun my early career, I went to supply for a Sabbath at Melksham. At this time was residing there an old gentleman from London—a very wise man, at least in his own conceit. I called upon him on the Monday morning. He received me rather uncourteously. He did not, indeed, censure my preaching, but rudely said he had no notion of beardless boys being employed as preachers. 'Pray, sir,' said I, 'does not Paul say to Timothy, "Let no man despise thy youth." And, sir, you remind me of what I have read of a French monarch, who had received a young ambassador, and complaining, said, "Your master should not have sent me a beardless stripling." "Sir," said the youthful ambassador, "had my master supposed you wanted a beard, he would have sent you a goat."'"

People soon, however, began to appreciate the worth of the "boy preacher," as Mr. Jay was now called, and, from simple country appointments, he was elevated to preach in some good-sized towns and villages. In the year 1788, and when but nineteen years old, he became acquainted with Rev. Rowland Hill, who pressed him to go down to London, and occasionally fill his pulpit, that of Surrey Chapel, for him. With the consent and approbation of his tutor, Mr. Winter, he started with Mr. Hill to London. Here his preaching soon made him famous.

Crowds rushed to hear him, so musical was his elocution, so graceful his manner, so modest his behavior, so deep his piety. On the occasion of preaching his last sermon there, the whole of the yard in front of the house where he preached was filled with eager listeners, and when he had finished speaking, the multitude would not leave till he had, from an open window, bidden them farewell. While in London, beside the acquaintance of Mr. Hill, he formed the friendship of Rev. John Ryland and Rev. John Newton, two men of God. He had also several calls to settle in the city; but he declined them all, preferring a small congregation near Chippenham, at $140 a year.

During his first visit to Surrey Chapel, Mr. Jay became acquainted with a minister of Bath, named Tuppen. This Mr. Tuppen, on his return home, spoke in high praise of "the boy preacher;" and when subsequently he fell sick, he recommended his congregation to send for young Jay to supply his place, and to dedicate the new chapel, which was to be called Argyle Chapel. The official members complied with Mr. Tuppen's request, and Mr. Jay came and preached for them, greatly to their profit and satisfaction. Mr. Tuppen's illness was unto death; and among his last requests was one that Mr. Jay should be his successor, which request was unanimously complied with by the Church. From the very start, Mr. Jay "drew and kept full houses," and was extraordinarily popular and useful. His church had to be enlarged three times during his incumbency to accommodate the numbers who flocked to hear him.

On the sixth day of January, 1791, when in his twenty-second year, Mr. Jay was married to Miss Anne, daughter of Rev. Mr. Davies, of Bathaston, a small village two miles from Bath. The marriage ceremony was performed at St. Peter's, Cornhill, by Rev. Rowland Hill. Of his wife he thus speaks:

"She possessed every requisite that could render her a helpmate. Her special qualities were admirably suited to my defects. She had an extemporaneous readiness which never failed her, and an intuitive decisiveness which seemed to require no deliberation. Her domestic virtues rendered my house a complete home, the abode of neatness, order, punctuality, peace, cheerfulness, comfort, and attraction. She calmed my brow when ruffled by disappointment or vexation; she encouraged me when depressed; she kept off a thousand cares, and left me free to attend to the voice of my calling. She reminded me of my engagements when I was forgetful, and stimulated me when I was remiss, and always gently enforced the present obligation as 'the duty of every day required.'

"I mention this the more not only to express my own gratitude, but that my Church and the public, if they have derived any little advantage from my labors, may see how much of it they owe to this wise and good woman. She now stood in the additional relation of a mother, and in process of time furnished me with a most lovely family of six children, three of each sex, who 'rose up and called her blessed.'"

Of his fifth child, Edward, he narrates this incident:

"When quite a child, he had nearly perished. His nursemaid had, by reading herself asleep, set fire to the curtains. I had just time to snatch him from a flaming bed, which was nearly all consumed, with other furniture in the room. He was at first educated for the ministry, and preached for some time with much approbation. But a timorousness and even dread with regard to his appearing and officiating in public, instead of decreasing by use, so grew upon him, and so threatened and even affected his health, that I was constrained to acquiesce in his importunity to leave the pulpit and enter secular life."

And of his last child, a daughter named Statura, he writes the following touching account:

"She was a child of a very lovely and obliging temper, and apt at learning. She was also truly pious, and, like her two sisters, had early come to the table of the Lord. But at the age of nineteen I was summoned to resign her. She had always been free from ailments. I left her in perfect health, to go and preach at the opening of a new chapel at Tavistock, in Devonshire; but I had not proceeded farther than Totness when a messenger overtook me with foreboding intelligence. I hastened back in anxious, trembling suspense, and reached home only just in time to see her dying of typhus fever. She was incapable of knowing the father around whose neck she had so often clung. I turned away, and was led by her mother into the solitude of my study. We knelt down, hand in hand, to pray; but not a word was uttered. At such a season, how poor is speech, and how surprising is it that persons should employ it, and not yield to the devotion of silence and tears!

"This was the first time death had entered our indulged dwelling. Till now I knew not what it was truly to be a parent. My heart was desolate within me; and there was danger that weeping would hinder sowing. As my ministry had always been very much of a consolatory kind,

I began to dread the application of the address of Eliphaz to Job, 'Behold thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands; thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees. But now is it come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art weary.' "

Mr. Jay was not possessed of a very strong physical constitution, and was frequently the subject of headaches and dizziness that rendered preaching difficult. These attacks were very sudden, and came on him several times in the pulpit. Feeling the necessity of a careful regime, and regular habits, he betook himself to a spare diet, to early rising, and to rigid habits of temperance. Summer and winter he rose at five o'clock and retired at ten. The last day of the week he always took as a holiday.

"It was the practice of my dear father," writes one of his daughters, "to throw off all study on the Saturday, that he and his subject might be fresh for the Sabbath. On that day—and O, what a joyous afternoon that was to us children!—we were indulged in rambling with him in a country walk, choosing the side of some running brook, which he delighted to follow, or sending us scrambling into field or hedgerow for wild flowers; and, when each brought their little nosegay, to receive the prize held out to them for the best flowers, or best arranged."

In a letter to a Committee of the Festival of the Bath Teetotal Society, he used the emphatic words:

"The subject of Teetotalism I have examined physically, morally, and Christianly, and, after all my reading, reflection, observation, and experience, I have reached a very firm and powerful conviction. I believe that next to the glorious Gospel, God could not so bless the human race as by the abolition of all intoxicating liquors."

There is something in this declaration which it would not be improper for a considerable number of English clergymen especially to dwell upon in solemn meditation.

His first published work was a discourse on "The Mutual Duties of Husbands and Wives," which rapidly went through six editions. Of all his works, however, the Domestic Minister's Assistant, consisting of morning and evening prayers for six weeks, had by far the largest sale. "I always," said he, "composed rapidly. If I succeeded at all to my satisfaction, it was commonly at once. What I produced by mere dint of effort seldom pleased me. The mind should, indeed, be excited by love to the subject, or pleasure in the study; but I always found a consciousness of difficulty and elaboration unfavorable to success. The production was wanting in simplicity and naturalness. There is no reaching flowers by ladders and balloons. They do not grow in the air, but in the ground. They are not above our head, but at our feet. We find them in walking. We bend to view them, and stoop to gather them. I always found one thing very helpful in the choice and in the study of my subjects for preaching. It was the feeling of a rightness of aim and motive; that is, a simple regard to usefulness; and a losing sight of advantage, popularity, and applause."

In reference to his sermons, it may be remarked that he never set apart regularly any particular time for study, thereby reducing the exercise to a kind of mechanism or compulsion. He thought habitually. He chose his texts and subjects early in the week, and studied upon them wherever he was, whether in the house or out walking, or working with his own hands. "With regard," said he, "to subjects, what I have always deemed the best kind of preaching is neither highly doctrinal nor dryly practical; but distinguished by what I should call experimentally, or a constant blending of the doctrine and practice of the Gospel strongly with the affections and feelings."

He guarded sedulously against length in a sermon, seldom exceeding forty minutes in any discourse. On the principle which Lamont recommended, he thought that nothing could justify a long sermon. If a sermon was a good one, there was no necessity of its being a long one, and if a bad one, it ought to be short. "I could commonly ascertain," he says, "before I left the study, how I should succeed in the pulpit. With me the tug of the war was always alone. If I felt that I had grasped my subject, and could gain a certain frame of spirit made up of the solemn and the tender, I rather longed for the service than dreaded it; and this was very much the case on all occasions, the more extraordinary and trying ones not excepted."

He was no mere story-teller; and yet, throughout the most of his long ministerial life, he dealt largely in incident and anecdote. Bunyan's motto, copied from Hosea, was, in some sense, his motto: "I have used similitudes." This practice, however, of using appropriate metaphor and illustrations, does not belong, as the reader knows, to all preachers. Perhaps the instance mentioned by Dr. Carey may be recollected by some. The Doctor is reported to have said to a young minister who preached before him, "My young friend, I have much approved of your sermon, but it had one deficiency—it had no 'likes' in it." And when asked for an explanation, he said, "Why, when you read our Lord's discourses, you constantly meet with the expression, The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, like unto mustard-seed, like unto a net, like unto a marriage, and so on. Now, never preach again, my young friend, without some 'likes' in your addresses." A story, says Cecil, "will hold a child by the ear for an hour together," and "men are but children of a larger growth."

Dr. Bowrie, physician to Mr. Jay, in some reminiscences of his life, speaks as follows respecting some peculiarities in his preaching:

"Mr. Jay, in his preaching, often made a wonderful impression by a single sentence delivered in a powerful manner. One of these I shall mention as pressing most strongly at this moment on my mind, although heard by me many years ago. He had been preaching on the repentance of Judas, and took occasion in the discourse to attack the love of money, as one of the, if not the principal, sins of the Church of God; and at the close of one of the divisions of his subject, he burst forth in his own peculiar and emphatic manner, with the following awful sentence: 'Avarice, avarice is the monsoon, the devil's trade-wind, from the Church into hell.' Another at this time presses itself forcibly on my memory; and although, perhaps, by the very fastidious, it may be said not well fitted for the pulpit, yet at the time of delivery it made a wonderful impression, and now is so clear before me that I must give it. Mr. Jay was speaking of the glaring inconsistency of many professors of the Gospel, and endeavoring to show how impossible it was to expect the Divine blessing to rest on half-and-half professors of religion. He rested much on the necessity there was for decision for God, and the clear manifestation before the Church and the world, in the believer's walk and character, so as to leave no doubt who indeed was his Master; and in the midst of a powerful appeal pronounced the following: 'Some of you, my dear brethren, are so inconsistent and undecided, that if at this moment I saw the devil running away with some of you, I could not call out, "Stop thief!"—he would but carry off his own property.'"

As a pastor, he was somewhat peculiar. He announced that, in order to have time to preach, he must not spend all his time in pastoral visiting. The healthy and the wealthy, if they were pious and exemplary, he begged to be excused from calling on, except "semi-occasionally;" but the afflicted, the poor, and the wayward, he felt it his duty to look after, with attention and carefulness. He was brief and prayerful in these calls, and talked and laughed but little. Questions having a direct reference to one's spiritual case were put to each member called on, and he accepted of no equivocation in reply. So large, however, was his congregation that he found it very difficult, preaching as he did five times a week—that is, three times on the Sabbath, once Wednesday night, and once in the country adjacent—to attend to pastoral calls, even among those who needed such calls. He more than once urged on his leading members, male and female, the absolute necessity of their acting as pastors, or callers and exhorters upon their fellow-members. "Is there nothing you can do," said he once, addressing his brethren and sisters, "but serve tables? Could not females be usefully and properly employed? Were they not, in the first Churches, officially engaged, not indeed in preaching, this was expressly forbidden—and inspiration is only common sense here—but in cases that did not compromise the duties and decencies of their peculiar sphere and character? Paul says to the Philippians, 'Help those women that labored with me in the Gospel.' To Timothy he speaks of a 'widow well reported of for good works, if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good.' 'I commend unto you,' says he to the Romans, 'Phebe our sister, who is a servant of the Church, which is at Cenchrea. For she has been a succorer of many, and myself also. Also greet Mary, who bestowed much labor on us.'"

To remedy somewhat his deficiency in visiting, he appointed a Monday evening meeting, to which he especially invited the busy, the poor, and the aged, and talked to them for an hour or so in a free and familiar manner about their sins, and about the best means to be employed to live happy and to obtain salvation.

Of his personal reminiscences, his criticisms on cotemporaries and friends, and of his piety and his triumphant death, we can not speak now, but must beg the reader's indulgence till another month.

LIFE is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindness and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart and secure comfort.

CHRIST AND THE INFIDELS.

THE brightness of the brightest name pales and wanes before the radiance which shines from the person of Christ. The scenes at the tomb of Lazarus, at the gate of Nain, in the happy family at Bethany, in the "upper room," where he instituted the feast that should forever consecrate his memory, and bequeathed to his disciples the legacy of his love; the scene in the garden of Gethsemane, on the summit of Calvary, and at the sepulcher; the sweet remembrance of the patience with which he bore wrong, the gentleness with which he rebuked it, and the love with which he forgave it; the thousand acts of benign condescension by which he well earned for himself, from self-righteous pride and censorious hypocrisy, the name of the "friend of publicans and sinners;" these, and a hundred things more, which crowd those concise memorials of love and sorrow with such prodigality of beauty and of pathos, will still continue to charm and attract the soul of humanity, and on these the highest genius, as well as the humblest mediocrity, will love to dwell. These things lisp in infancy loves to hear on its mother's knees, and over them age, with its gray locks, bends in devoutest reverence. No; before the infidel can prevent the influence of these compositions, he must get rid of the Gospels themselves, or he must supplant them by fictions yet more wonderful. Yes; before infidels can prevent men from thinking as they have ever done of Christ, they must blot out the gentle words with which, in the presence of austere hypocrisy, the Savior welcomed that timid guilt that could only express its silent love in an agony of tears; they must blot out the words addressed to the dying penitent, who, softened by the majestic patience of the mighty sufferer, detected at last the monarch under the vail of sorrow, and cast an imploring glance to be "remembered by him when he came into his kingdom;" they must blot out the scene in which the demoniacs sat listening at his feet, and "in their right mind;" they must blot out the remembrance of the tears which he shed at the grave of Lazarus—not surely for him whom he was about to raise, but in pure sympathy with the sorrows of humanity—for the myriads of desolate mourners, who could not, with Mary, fly to him, and say, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my mother, brother, sister, had not died!" they must blot out the record of those miracles which charm us, not only as the proof of his mission, and guarantees of the truth of his doctrine, but as they illustrate the benevolence of his character, and are types of the spiritual cures his Gospel can yet perform; they must blot out the scenes of the sepulcher, where love and veneration lingered, and saw what was never seen before, but shall henceforth be seen to the end of time—the tomb itself irradiated with angelic forms, and bright with the presence of him "who brought life and immortality to light;" they must blot out the scene where deep and grateful love wept so passionately, and found him unbidden at her side, type of ten thousand times ten thousand, who have "sought the grave to weep there," and found joy and consolation in him "whom, though unseen, they loved;" they must blot out the discourses in which he took leave of his disciples, the majestic accents of which have filled so many departing souls with patience and triumph; they must blot out the yet sublimer words in which he declares himself "the resurrection and the life"—words which have led so many millions more to breathe out their spirits with childlike trust, and to believe, as the gate of death closed behind them, that they would see him who is invested with the "keys of the invisible world," "who opens and no man shuts, and shuts and no man opens," letting in through the portal which leads to immortality the radiance of the skies; they must blot out, they must destroy these, and a thousand other such things, before they can prevent him having the pre-eminence who loved, because he loved us, to call himself the "Son of Man," though angels call him the "Son of God."

It is in vain to tell men it is an illusion. If it be an illusion, every variety of experiment proves it to be invariable, and it will not be dissipated by a million of Strausses and Newmans. Probatum est. At His feet, guilty humanity, of diverse races and nations, for eighteen hundred years, has come to pour forth, in faith and love, its sorrows, and finds there "the peace which the world can neither give nor take away." Myriads of aching heads and weary hearts have found and will find repose there, and have invested him with veneration, love, and gratitude, which will never, never be paid to any other name than his.—Henry Rogers.

As he that makes a bridge of his own shadow can not but fall in the water, so neither can he escape the pit of hell that lays his own presumption in the place of God's promises.

The world twines itself about the soul, as a serpent doth about an eagle, to hinder its flight upward, and sting it to death.

THE TWO EDENS.

BY M. LOUISA CHITWOOD.

I AM dreaming, dreaming of Eden,
 Ere the serpent entered in,
 And over the brows of the tempted
 Fastened the fangs of sin;
 When the flowers that grew in the garden
 With shadowless bloom were bright,
 And no broken urn of the lily
 Infolded the dews of night.

O, fair and beautiful Eden!
 O, perfect and sinless love!
 When light, like a prism of glory,
 Circled the world from above!
 And a sweet, rejoicing anthem
 Was sung by the earth to the sun,
 As swift through the realms of azure
 She swept in her glory on;

When afar in the quiet valleys,
 'Neath the bloom of a thornless rose,
 The lion and lamb together
 Lay down in a sweet repose;
 When the fawn and the spotted leopard,
 The wolf and the young gazelle,
 Came close to the sound of the singing,
 As Eve's voice rose and fell.

And the beasts that lived in the jungles,
 And the birds that flew in the air,
 Fled not from the footsteps of Adam,
 In Eden, ere Death was there.
 But I turn from the hour of darkness,
 The time of the cross and thorn—
 The night of the earthquake's mutter,
 That followed when sin was born.

I am dreaming, dreaming of Eden—
 That Eden of love that lies
 Far over the shadowy waters—
 The quiet land of the skies—
 Where, over the walls of pure jasper,
 No serpent can enter in;
 And o'er the Eternal City
 Hangeth no cloud of sin;
 Where the loved, upon whose bosoms
 The sods of the earth are lain,
 Will come to our fond embraces,
 And gladden our hearts again.

O, fairest and beautiful Eden
 Of endless, eternal rest!
 Of all the sweet dreams that e'er thrill me,
 This glorious one is best.
 When the heart within is pulsating
 With sorrows, and hopes, and fears;
 When the eyes that look to the star-land
 Are misty and dim with tears;
 There cometh the voice of an angel—
 A syllable sweet of love—
 With a thought and hope of the Eden
 Remaining for us above.

LIFE.

BY ELLA ENFIELD.

'Tis but a weary scene,
 This toilsome life—
 A restless, troubled dream—
 A constant strife.

When childhood's happy morn
 Unfolds its light,
 Then hope begins to dawn,
 And life is bright.

Soon clouds of sorrow come
 O'er childhood's sky,
 Obscure life's rising sun,
 And dim the eye.

Corroding cares come on,
 With added years,
 Pressing the spirit down
 With anxious fears.

As darksome night beclouds
 The sunny morn,
 So grief and sorrow shroud
 Hope's golden dawn.

Here short-lived pleasures dwell,
 Vain, fleeting toys,
 And momentary dreams
 Of earthly joys.

The "cypress" wreath adorns
 The "unwritten brow,"
 Where once the "orange" bloomed,
 So faded now.

The beauteous flow'rs, arrayed
 In gorgeous bloom—
 Into the tomb!

How soon they droop and fade
 Thus earthly beauty dies;

'Tis constant never:
 Like fading light it flies,
 Soon gone forever.

Our life is but a dream—
 A fleeting breath—
 A few remaining sands,
 Awaiting death.

Earth's treasures are but toys,
 Not worth our care;
 And all its transient joys,
 How vain they are!

But there's a world above,
 Where all is peace;
 Where joys abound and love—
 Where sorrows cease;

Where life—immortal life—
 Forever reigns,

And beauty robes with green,
 Those heavenly plains.

There blooming Hope unfurls
 Her banners fair,
 And sweetest music flows,
 Unceasing, there.

MORAL EDUCATION.

BY REV. E. THOMSON, D. D.

ALL agree that the youth of our land should be provided with common schools; that common schools are designed to educate; that education means development; and that it should embrace the whole man.

There was a time when the friends of education, in their care for the mind, lost sight of the body, forgetful that, however superior the spirit may be to its earthly instruments, its outward manifestations are through the bodily organs. It is as though the engineer, impressed with the distinctness and power of steam, should be unconcerned with the machinery by which it is applied. Now, however, it is understood that the teacher should possess a competent knowledge of anatomy, physiology, and hygiene, in order that he may give judicious directions in the construction and furniture of his school-room; in regulating its supplies of heat, light, and atmosphere; in adjusting the tasks and punishments of his pupils, and in superintending their diet and exercises; that he should not only be able to give such directions, but also satisfactory reasons for them; to illustrate, in a familiar manner, the general laws of digestion, circulation, respiration, etc., and to show their practical application. For want of such qualifications in the teachers of other days, many are weak and sickly among us, and many regard education through a cloud of gloomy and painful associations. Once it was supposed that education consisted in so many quarters of grammar, and so many of geography, and so on. Now it is generally admitted, that while we teach the child arithmetic, grammar, geography, civil history, and the general principles of philosophy and natural history, we are to bear in mind that these, after all, are but means, not the end; that the great object of the educator is to teach the child to think. Let the pupil form the habit of patient, clear, consecutive thought, and you may let him go. Thinking, not knowing, makes the great distinction between the mind of the philosopher and that of the fool; the ability to reason is the measure of mental excellence, the instrument of high achievement. 'Tis this that scales heaven, and fathoms hell, and compasses space; that outstrips the lightning, and speaks like the voice of God; that defies volcanoes and storms; and laughs at warrants and executions in its burning path. 'Tis this, despite all conquerors, to which God has given the dominion of the world, as by a covenant of salt. It is a trite observation that studies should be so arranged that all the mental faculties may be developed and duly balanced. In cases of eccentricity this is necessary to guard against monstrosity, and in other cases it is very well. But ordinarily we need have no painful concern in this matter. To prepare men for the various pursuits of life their minds are constituted differently; and the school should not be a bed of Procrustes. If we can form, in each case, a habit of vigorous mental action, we can safely trust to social intercourse and the daily scenes of the world's state to regulate and moderate it.

We are too much disposed to regard the faculties of the mind as separate and independent, like oxygen and hydrogen in the compound blow-pipe; whereas, they are but the different modes in which the mind acts, and are only treated separately, in scientific works, for the sake of convenience. In most cases, the soul, in performing one operation performs others also. How can we have an act of judgment, for example, without attention, abstraction, memory, association, etc.? In strengthening one power, then, we may strengthen all; let us, therefore, hail with delight any evidence of genius in the pupil in whatever form it may appear.

Next to the education of the mind comes the development and training of the taste, and the sensibilities, both natural and moral. All are agreed up to this last point. When we come to moral nature there is a class that cries, "Hold, you may teach the temporal but not the spiritual; all moral and religious instruction must be excluded from the common school." Of this plan I remark that it is neither feasible nor allowable; and to the illustration of this proposition I will devote the remainder of this paper.

That the scheme is not practicable is evident, first, from the very nature of education, which consists in leading out the mind, encouraging inquiry, nourishing free, bold, independent thought. Will you draw lines around an awakened, emancipated, aspiring spirit, and say, hitherto shalt thou come and no further? More especially, can you restrain it from those great subjects which have been the themes of ages, which have absorbed the minds of Moses, and Socrates, and Paul, and Plato, and which have controlled the march of human events? As well attempt to hold the lightning as it leaps from heaven to earth, or from earth to heaven. From every figure on his blackboard, from every crown, or cross, or flag upon his outline map, the boy, that is a boy, may push his inquiring way downward to conscience, or upward to God. Vain to cry, halt, when he has pushed you to the line of things, moral and religious.

Second, from the connection between the different powers of the soul, intellectual, sensitive, moral, and voluntary. This is so intimate that you can not train one class of faculties without training others. The celebrated Dr. Hunter, who was noted alike for the solidity of his judgment and the facetiousness of his expressions, once remarked—glancing at certain theorists—"Gentlemen, physiologists will have it that the stomach is a mill, others that it is a fermenting vat, others again that it is a stew-pan; but in my view of the matter, it is neither a mill, nor a fermenting vat, nor a stew-pan, but a stomach, gentlemen, a stomach." So of the human mind—it is neither a reasoning, nor a feeling, nor a conscientious apparatus, but a mind, gentlemen, a human mind. Suppose we adopt the phrenological hypothesis, and ascribe to each of its powers a separate organ; still, it must be conceded, they are intimately connected, so that you could not influence one without affecting others. They must be more closely connected than the different organs of the body, yet you can not seriously affect one bodily organ without affecting more or less every other. There is a great sympathetic nerve which binds them all together, and teaches each to weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice in the same system. An injury upon the surface of an extremity may carry dismay to the vitals. Moreover, the different organs of the body depend upon each other. Suppose you determine that you will watch exclusively over the brain; soon may you look for cerebral disorder. Well, you interrogate the troubled organ. Why, dear Brain, are you so perverse? how is it, after all the care that I have bestowed upon you, and the exclusive affection I feel for you, that you are radiating such a half-elaborated, pernicious, nervous influence over the whole body, distressing every nerve and confusing every organ? "Well," the poor brain replies, "I am not to blame; I am not unmindful of my functions, nor insensible to your goodness; but the heart has been pumping up lately such a corrupted stream of blood that, with all my extra exertions, I am not able to manufacture out of it any thing better than the vicious, maddened stuff that I send out through the nerves." Well, go now to the heart. Heart, what is the reason that you have sent such an impure current to the brain of late? "It is no fault of mine," replies the heart; "I pump up as good a blood as I receive; I wish it were better, I am sure; for it is painful to work in such a fluid, and if some change is not made soon I shall get sick. Ask the lungs why they send such a poor article to me." Well, Lungs, what does this mean? "Blame not me; I expand and contract, as I have always done, and air the blood as much as ever—the fault is lower down. Ask the vena cava why it sends up such miserable venous blood?" Vena cava, how is it? "I furnish as good an article as I can, considering the abominable chyle which I get. Go to the stomach, and you will see what is the matter." Well, Stomach, the whole system is in disorder, and the fault is traced to you. "I own," says the stomach, "that the trouble is with me; nevertheless I do the very best I can with the materials I have, but they are very unsuitable; and, moreover, with the water in this neighborhood there is often mixed a strange poison which bewilders me, and sometimes turns me upside down." Thus, a little defalcation or derangement in one of the partners carries bankruptcy and confusion into the whole bodily firm. This will serve as an illustration. The different organs of the spiritual system—intellectual, sensitive, and moral—are also united by sympathy and mutual dependence; if you get one of them into the habit of vigorous and healthy action, the others will assume, to some extent, a corresponding action. Quickened the heart, for instance, and intellect and conscience will wake up; touch conscience, and intellect and heart will leap; arouse intellect, and its associated sensibilities will be more or less stirred. With what god-like energy does even a sluggish mind move when brought under the power of some strong passion! How often does the Gospel, by quickening conscience, exalt reason! In proportion as it is believed by a man or a people, both heart and intellect beat more quickly, and the individual and the state steadily ascend. So, too, improve intellect, and you improve, as a general rule, conscience. I grant there are exceptions: quickened intellect may be attended with dormant, rather, perverted conscience; but this only proves that something more than intellect is necessary, not that quickened intellect does not tend to quicken conscience. There is also mutual dependence among the different powers. Confine attention to intellect and it may act perversely, not because it does not act strongly, but because it has not right premises. The most important truth is moral, but the state of the heart materially affects the intellect in its efforts to acquire it: it constitutes a medium through which it is seen. If you put on green glasses, you see the whole creation green; so if you look through a green heart, you see the whole moral world tinged. Why is a father unfit to sit in judgment on a son? why has a prisoner the right to challenge his enemy from the jury-box? why is it so hard to convince the miser, however strong his intellect, of the necessity for charity? or the coward of the necessity for battle? or the sluggard of the necessity for action? or the lover of a wrinkle in the face of his mistress? The heart may also put reason in a wrong relation to truth; may turn it away from the proof; may even silence what it can neither escape nor confute, as Wadsworth's drummer did Fletcher's reader. The heart must be clarified before the intellect can have clear vision on moral mountains. The intellect, moreover, is dependent on the heart or conscience for impulse, without feeling it would act to no purpose; the stronger the feeling the stronger the mental action: hence the superiority of conscience as a motive power.

Suppose we pay exclusive attention to conscience: we may make it as tender as the apple of the eye, and yet be miserable offenders. A man may persecute his neighbor, sacrifice his child, expose his father to perish, and take his own life, and in all this think that he is doing God service. The feelings of obligation must be connected with right views of duty before we can go into the path of uprightness; therefore, we must cultivate the intellect—the perceiving power. The divisions, strife, enthusiasm, fanaticism, bigotry, etc., in Christendom are chiefly owing to a want of intellectual training rather than a want of religious principle. From this correspondence and dependence of action it follows that you can not educate one part of our nature without influencing others.

But, thirdly, from the connection between truths, the scheme appears impracticable. Perhaps there is not an atom, all the relations of which can be described by a human or angelic mind. These relations run backward and forward, upward and downward in a series, the end of which God only knows. So with phenomena: a spark falls upon a shaving, a conflagration ensues; and the whole atmosphere of the globe is so affected that no particle of it sustains the same relation, or will sustain, at any time hereafter, the same relation as if the spark had not dropped; and as to other results, commercial, intellectual, and moral, who shall trace them? So with truths: the most in significant is a member of a great family, to every member of which it stands related. The law that expands a bubble propels a steam-engine; the principle that wafts a feather wheels the planets. Who shall say, when he introduces a truth into the mind, where it shall stop? it may lead that mind onward through related truths forever. But let us apply the remark. How can you teach mental philosophy without affecting the heart, directly or indirectly? You can not dodge the questions of the immateriality and the immortality of the soul, the freedom of the will, the immutability of moral distinctions; and to discuss them would be to mine in the depths of theology. You may be willing to skim the superficies, but what shall keep your students from the profundities? Nothing, if only you have educated them. Do you teach the history of philosophy? it must be either in the form of a dry genealogy, or a warm genesis of the human mind; if the former, it is a misnomer to style it history of philosophy; if the latter, you must go with your pupils to the depths of heart and conscience. Do you teach rhetoric? what more interesting or fundamental topic does it embrace than the rules of evidence? How can you learn to persuade without learning to convince? and how learn to convince without treating of evidence? and how treat of evidence without bearing upon the very foundations of the Christian faith? According as you instruct upon this point will your pupils be inclined to receive or reject Christ, or prefer this or that creed or Church. You may not intend this result, you may not trace the process; but the result is inevitable, and the process traceable. Do you teach logic? you may easily teach it so as to incline the pupil either, on the one hand, to be a sophist, or, on the other, a reasoner. You may so select his authors and examples, and so arrange his exercises as to give him a bias toward either Bacon or the school-men. Though the principles of the science are invariable, their applications may be very different, and so may the mental habits and moral results to which those applications respectively lead. Perhaps you say that these are not suitable subjects for the common mind. Well, lay them aside. History is certainly fit for any school, but how will you teach it? If you give any thing more than a chronological chart, you must impart much moral and religious instruction. Man is in history, God is in history. You must treat of the rise and fall of religions as well as empires; of dark ages and light ages; of corruptions and reformations. Will you shut out the history of the world, and open only the history of our own country, which can scarce be said to have a history? Even there you must read of paganism, and Puritanism, and ecclesiasticism, and Antinomianism, and Quakerism, and witchcraft, and freedom, and slavery; and can you be silent on all these points, even under the probings of vexatious questions? He who studies history studies to little profit if he merely mark events; he should trace them to causes, should analyze and generalize, should go from effects to agents, through plans and purposes to motives, and through motives to principles. Do so, and where are you, but in the question of Divine providence and speculations concerning its future operations and final results? Every-where images and examples rise upon the heart, and arguments and reasons gather over the mind to teach the inevitable ruin of vice and the final triumph of virtue. Who has not heard of "Butler's Analogy," which proves that providence and religion run side by side?

But let us limit the studies of the school to the natural and exact sciences. Even here we may not be able to avoid the conscience and the heart. Moral truth may start up and refuse to "down" at our bidding. Direct your eyes either to the earth or the heavens, you see displays of wisdom, power, goodness: these are abstracts—where is the concrete? these are attributes—where is the Being to whom they belong? So grand the demonstrations of God on the pages of modern astronomy, and so simple the process by which the mind may ascend from them to God, that a great man has pronounced a halt in it as proof of insanity. "The undevout astronomer is mad." Who may prevent a child from ascending from creature to creator—from exclaiming, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty?" or from descending from the general conclusion to specify inferences: such as, "When I consider the heavens," etc.? From masses do you turn to atoms, and from attraction at sensible distances to attraction at insensible. Here, then, is chemistry. One of its first truths is the law of definite proportions—a law deemed by many one of the clearest demonstrations against Atheism that creation affords. To some minds all the fires of the crucible denote the finger of God. Parke's chemical catechism is as full of theology and thanksgiving as of science. Perhaps the dryest of all the natural sciences is anatomy—it is a valley of dry bones—yet to an ancient anatomist, Galen, every bone of the skeleton was a verse, and every joint a stanza in a hymn of praise to God; and a modern anatomist, Sir John Bell, has written a treatise to prove, from the human hand alone, the being and natural attributes of the Almighty. And what shall we say of geology? which, affording evidences of repeated acts of creative power, new illustrations of Divine goodness, enlarged conceptions of Divine plans, conclusive proof of a superintending Providence over the globe, and his special interference from time to time with his general arrangement; and which, teaching that the material universe had a beginning, that fire and water are the chief agents in effecting its changes, that the work of creation was progressive, that man was the last of the animals created, and that he has been but recently introduced into the world, has important connections with both natural religion and revealed. Indeed, all the natural sciences have relations to theology at all points—they are "Bridgewater treatises." God is the center and circumference of science. Trace any ray of scientific light upward, or trace it outward, to farthest east or remotest west, and you find one law, one God and Father of all, who is above all and in all. What shall prevent the pupil from crying out, "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" Who shall enable us to imprison our pupils in spiritual diving-bells, by which to shut out Him in whom they live and breathe, while they dive into the boundless ocean of his wisdom, and love, and power? Suppose we lay aside the natural sciences, and confine the studies of the pupil to reading, writing, and arithmetic. Well, what shall we read? what shall we write? what example shall we spread upon the black-board? Seeing the intimate relations of truth you must draw black lines around almost every page. You must make the Index Expurgatorius as long as the catalogue of books. It were easy to set copies that might set the heart on fire: such as, "All men are born free and equal;" "All men have inalienable rights, among which," etc. Ah! that et cetera might point the hero's sword or form the martyr's heart. It is already undermining all thrones but God's. Dr. Channing's antislavery feeling was kindled by one of his earliest copies, and which was in these words: "All men are free when they touch the soil of England." "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners;" this simple line might work like leaven in the heart of the child, and through it in the heart of the nation. So examples in arithmetic and algebra might be so framed, either by accident or design, as to lead to the solution of the sublimest moral problems.

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE.

"A LIGHTED lamp," writes M'Cheyne, "is a very small thing, and it burns calmly and without noise, yet it giveth light to all who are within the house." And so there is a quiet influence which, like the flame of a scented lamp, fills many a home with light and fragrance. Such an influence has been beautifully compared to a "carpet, soft and deep, which, while it diffuses a look of ample comfort, deadens, oftentimes, many a harsh and creaking sound."

AN EXCURSION TO THE COCO-MARICOPA INDIANS UPON THE RIVER GILA.

FORTY-FIVE miles to the Coco-Maricopa villages. The river Gila bends to the north, but will meet us again at the villages, not sooner. Forty-five miles without water and without grass. The trains of wagons, and the weary band of riders must be hurried by the mules as quickly as may be over the desert stage; the forty-five miles must be got through without stoppage during the cool hours of the evening and the night.

That was once our predicament; namely, the predicament of Mr. Bartlett, the commissioner attached to the United States and Mexican boundary commission, of the surveyors, engineers, soldiers, and other members of Mr. Bartlett's party, engaged in traversing the northern frontier of Mexico, and of myself. For my own part let me own that I neither hungered nor thirsted, nor was weary by the way, having been carried comfortably stretched upon a sofa through deserts and wildernesses, and among all savages encountered by my fellow-travelers. I was carried about on my sofa by a couple of stout volumes that have played the part of chair-men excellently—let me say so much in a certificate at parting—never wearying or causing weariness. They have just been equipped by Mr. Bartlett, and are ready to carry any man who will make use of them through many of the half-unknown regions of Texas, New Mexico, California, Sonora, and Chihuahua.

The last tributary to the Colorado flowing from the interior is the Gila, which comes to it through an extensive tract of uninhabited desert, broken with isolated mountains, destitute of grass, or wood, or water. The course of the Gila is throughout by rocky wilds and barren plains, in which man can not live.

We came every-where, I and the boundary commission, upon the ruins left by parties who had gone on the same road before us. Abandoned wagons here take the place of the dead camels of other deserts; we found them occasionally baking in the sun, or arrived at places where we saw much iron strewn about, with fragments of vehicles, tin kettles, and camp equipage, impediments that had been destroyed by overburdened men, on their way to the gold diggings of California.

Upon one spot there was a piece of rocky ground covered with fragments of trunks and wagons, among which were human bones and skulls. That was the scene of the disaster that fell on the family of Mr. Oatman in March of the year 1851. Mr. Oatman was traveling, in company with other emigrants, and had with him wagons and merchandises. Against advice, he set off in advance of his companions from the Pimo villages. His little son came back among the Indians some days afterward, a child of twelve years old, beaten and bruised, who had returned on foot through seventy miles of wilderness, forty-five of them without water, to report that the Indians had killed his father and his mother, and carried off his sisters. He had himself been beaten and left for dead. When he revived he had seen only the mangled bodies of his parents, and the wreck of their property. His two sisters, girls of from twelve to fifteen years old, were gone. The perpetrators of this outrage were the Apache Indians, and the Maricopas went with the child on a fruitless expedition for the recovery of the two girls, who are at this hour, if they be not killed, detained among the savages. The Maricopas covered Mr. Oatman and his wife with stones, for no grave could be dug in those inhospitable rocks, and went on to inform the Major at Fort Yuma.

The houses of the Coco-Maricopas look like rabbit warrens. They are dens built of sticks and straw, with or without mud. Forked poles are stuck upright in the ground; poles are laid across them; and about these there are sticks laid so that a rude kennel is formed in which a man can not stand upright, and into which he creeps by a hole some three feet square. Rushes or straw are woven between the poles, and the whole mansion is sometimes stuccoed with mud. In these houses the Indians sit and sleep, and to these they retire when the weather is inclement; but their ordinary life is out of door or under rude arbors attached to their more solid wigwams.

The Coco-Maricopas are particular about their hair. In the first place it should be understood, that, except over the eyes, they never cut it, and that, when fully let down, it falls over their backs and shoulders, reaching to the knees; commonly, however, it is knotted up behind with a great club. Just over the eyes it is cut off in a straight line, so that it is quite removed, not merely parted from before the face. These Indians weave for themselves handsome figured belts, which they wear commonly as head-bands, and they usually fill their hair with clay, which is, on the whole, a cleaner dressing than the fragrant fat which is used by some European tribes. The women drudge more than the men, and may be seen carrying on their heads not only baskets of corn, but also, on the top of the corn, cradle and child.

They are brave in war, and they are faithful, too, in love. Each man takes but a single wife, and though it is his business to conciliate her parents with gifts, he marries only on receiving the free assent of the fair one, or rather dusky one, whom he is courting. He makes love with a flute. It is rather a cat-courtship. When the Coco-Maricopa, or the Pimo Indian, thinks that the heart of his beloved is inclined toward him he proceeds to a declaration in form, which he makes by taking a flute of cane pierced with four holes, sitting down in a bush near the lady's dwelling, and setting up a dismal too-too-too for hours together, day after day. If the girl takes no notice of his call, he is a rejected suitor; if she be disposed to marry him, she comes and says so. The bridegroom is expected by gifts to compensate, according to his means, the parents of the bride for the loss of her services, the services of a girl being, among these tribes, most valuable, because she does all household work, and even helps to till the ground. Sometimes, indeed, she also weaves, but generally weaving is the work of the old men.

Francisco Dukey, the Maricopan chief and interpreter, was a greedy fellow, with the temper of a Jew. He was the most civilized of his tribe, and appeared in shirt, pantaloons, and hat. To get what pickings he could out of the Americans appeared to be his business; all that he could for himself and the rest of his friends. Francisco sitting down to dinner with the visitors as guest in their camp, occasionally handed bread and meat to his friends who stood around, and after dinner filled his plate with good things which he handed round for them. On a subsequent occasion he went so far as to strip the table, leaving nothing for the cook and servant of the honorable commissioners. Much to his own surprise he was not again asked to stop and dine. Francisco, being civilized, knew the potency of whisky. He had got whisky from emigrants, and he desired whisky from Mr. Bartlett and his friends, who were determined never to give intoxicating drink to any Indians. Not having it as a gift, Mr. Dukey hoped to come upon it as a treasure trove, and tried every junk-bottle he saw about the tents or wagons. Once he got lemon syrup, then he got vinegar, another time he took a pull at a mixture for diarrhea.

After that he was satisfied, and tried no more. Dr. Webb, attached to the Commission, was collecting specimens of the natural history of the districts visited, and the Indians were much edified and amused by the contents of his bottles, and the dried objects hanging about the tent. It was suggested, therefore, that the boys of the village should go out to collect any curious insects, lizards or snakes they could find, and that they should be rewarded for so doing. Instead of letting the boys go, the men, for hope of reward, marched out themselves, and in a few hours came with a few grasshoppers and crickets. Although useless, Dr. Webb received them graciously, encouraging the captors to make further zoological research. About an hour afterward, half a dozen sturdy men marched to the camp in single file, every man swelling with importance. The leader advanced with a grand air, and the Doctor got his bottles ready. Space was made on a table for the prizes, and the Indian then laid upon it two small and very common lizards without their tails, those having been broken off in the catching. For this contribution to science, the six men required a shirt apiece.

Camp being fixed, a friendly message was dispatched to the chief, Cola Azul—blue tail—who was working in the fields. He soon appeared with his interpreter, and came in state wearing several shirts, a blue overcoat, felt hat, and pantaloons. The burden of his state was much too heavy for him, the thermometer then standing at a hundred and twenty. It was a relief to hear that he was seen presently afterward not far from the camp, sitting under a tree in none but the clothes nature gave him, with his dignity at his side tied up in a bundle.

The religion of these tribes is not very comforting. They believe that after death their souls will go to the home of their ancestors, and live in the great sandhills on the banks of the Rio Colorado. The souls of their enemies, the Yumas, will go to the same place, and the fighting shall continue evermore between the hostile races. The limbs of every man's body are to be transformed into those of wolves, bats, and owls.

THE OCEAN CEMETERY.

THE sea, great world of waters, is the largest of cemeteries, and its slumberers sleep without a monument. All graveyards, in all other lands, show symbols of distinction between the great and the small, the rich and the poor; but in that ocean cemetery the king and the clown, the prince and the peasant are all alike undistinguished. The waves roll over all; the same requiem-song, by the minstrelsy of the ocean, is sung to their honor. Over their remains the same storm beats, and the same sun shines; and there unmarked, the weak and the powerful, the plumed and unhonored will sleep on, till awakened together when the sea shall yield its dead.

GHOST STORIES.

BY ALICE CARY.

NUMBER I.

WHETHER myriads of spiritual creatures do in verity walk the air; whether, in truth, some mortals have been called away by the flitting of a pale bird or a voice on the winds by night, it is not my purpose now seriously to inquire. However thin the veil may be that divides us from the future life, and however much the angels may come and go, if so they do, lessens not the great solemnity, and we all of us stand back from the still entrance of another life, listening for some noise louder than the earth-worm makes—some voice of gladder assurance than the sobbing and the farewell.

How far the lights from the other side of the darkness have been really supposed to shine in upon us, and how often traced to their truth and dwarfed to merely some will-o-the-wisp, would be a curious inquiry; but in these stories I propose only to relate such experiences of the dreamers of dreams and seers of visions, as have, from time to time, been made known to me, some of them grave and some of them gay, trusting in that love of the marvelous, which we all have in a great or less degree, to give to my stories an interest, which, in themselves, they do not possess.

First, then, "It is many and many a year ago" that my good sister Rosalie and I were left to tend the fire in the sugar-camp. I was something more than twelve years old, and she thirteen, or thereabouts. We did not expect to be long alone, and at first thought our task a pleasant pastime. We were nearly a mile from the house and in a great, lonesome woods, but what cared we for all that—we had penetrated every nook a thousand times for buds or berries, moss, pebbles, or plants, and never encountered any thing more fearful than some owl, a stray cow, or a harmless hunter. So our laughter rang across the hills in answer to each other, for we separated now and then and went on what we humorously termed exploring expeditions—in simpler phrase, in search of hickory bark, with which to make our fire bright when the night should fall.

A great heap of the shelving strips, peeled from the growing trees, lay before the arch where the flames curled red together, and the steam rose from the boiling sugar-water and drifted along the hillside like a heavy mist; but the work was not relinquished; even when a sufficiency had been accumulated, there was a pleasure in the discovery of a new tree, and with the growth of the bark-heap grew ambition. We would surprise our father when he should join us with our industry, and make a great flame that should light him along the woods as he came, for the night bid fair to be a dark one. "Heigh-ho, if here ain't a couple of little Indians, as I am alive," called a voice, half kindly and half harshly, as we met on a knoll returning with the last arm-full we had proposed to gather.

We stopped suddenly and saw, a little to one side our path, partly concealed in some papaw bushes, and pointing his gun directly in our faces, a tall, bony-visaged man.

"O don't, Amos," said Rosalie, shielding her eyes with her hand, "don't hold your gun so, we are afraid of a gun." At this appeal the reckless fellow began snapping the lock of the gun, assuring us that it was full charged, and that if we stood still he would shoot us in the face, and that if we attempted to run he would shoot us in the back, and that in any event we were dead squaws. "If that is the case," Rose said, "we may as well go on. I hate to die by so mean a hand, that's all."

The man, whose name was Amos Hill, a reckless, worthless idler of the neighborhood, but guiltless of any real crime, now came out of the bushes and joined us, telling us that his gun was empty, and that for the world he would not harm us, and further to make amends he offered to carry our bark for us, and said if we were afraid he would remain with us for an hour. Rose, who was sadly vexed with him, replied that there was nothing she was so much afraid of as himself, and would greatly prefer that he should go his own way.

He affected to regard her words as a pleasant jest, and said he would remain with us whether we wished it or not, for that it was not safe for such children as we to be left in the woods alone. A sort of rude hut stood immediately before the arch where the sugar-kettles were placed, composed of pieces of plank and clapboards that had some years before been a part of a house a little way from where we were—of the dry limbs of trees and the like.

In this hut, which was open toward the fire, Rose and I seated ourselves on a rude bench, while Amos stationed himself outside to watch for ghosts, as he said, and shoot them if any made their appearance. His gun, primed and cocked, he set up beside him, and, probably, to give his pretenses the greater effect, bared his brawny arms and hauled some blazing firebrands within reach, assuring us that either fire or fire-arms were available against ghosts, whatever might be said to the contrary.

The night set in dismal enough, as the clouds and the damp sighing winds had foretold; and the slow falling of the rain on our leafy roof, the trickle of the brooks along their stony beds, and the noise of the winds in the thickets and the tree-tops all blent together, and seemed to us a melancholy moaning, for, to say truth, we were greatly more afraid with our protector, as Amos called himself, than we should have been alone. And sitting there in the rude shelter before the great blazing fire, the rain now and then dropping on our heads, Amos told us the following ghost story, to amuse us, as he said, but I suspect now it was rather to annoy us and retaliate upon Rose for her plain speech. Our hut, I said, was in part composed of the planks and boards which had once made a house. I could remember myself when it stood without inhabitant, but in pretty good repair, about the distance of a stone's throw from our camp; a spring, almost choked with spearmint and iron-weeds, was yet bubbling up a few steps from where the stones of the chimney lay, and we had picked bits of earthenware and searched for more precious treasures about the ruins many a time. We knew, too, that two brothers named Alerton had once lived in the log-house, and that one of them had died there. Some other facts with which we were conversant the story-teller adhered to, giving thus to his narration an air of probability, which otherwise it would not have had. How the young men had chanced to live in the woods alone, Amos asserted was unknown to him. Whether he spoke truth I know not; but it never occurred to me to make inquiry on the subject elsewhere, and I have no means at hand of knowing now. I only know that an old house stood in my father's woods when I was a child, and that earlier than I could remember two brothers named Edward and Albert Alerton lived there together.

But to the story. Amos began by asking us if we had never seen the ghost of Albert walking about the camp of gloomy nights, and he peered out curiously as he spoke, as though he expected to see him. You know, I suppose, he continued, that he is buried yonder on the hill-side where the sweet-brier grows? We knew of the sweet-brier, but said there was no grave-mound there. "No," said Amos, "but there is a hollow there; for when the grave was sunken it was never filled, and the wild rose was planted there by Betty Gardener," for that he saw her digging and setting it one moonlight night himself, as he drove the sheep home away from the wolves.

"Go now, if you dare," said Amos, "and see if there is not a sunken grave beside the brier."

Rose was not naturally timid, and I suspect assumed more bravery than she really felt; and so making a great torch of the hickory bark, she said if I would go with her she would go, and, laughing, we set out together. The torch grew dimmer in the rain as we went across the brook, treading on the sandstones that stood above the water by the spearmint spring, and up the slope of the hill. Rose stopped once or twice and whirled the bundle of bark round and round to give the flame a new impetus, and when we came within a dozen yards of the rose-bush, held it high above her head that we might see a little in advance of us. We did see distinctly, not only the brier-bush, but something beside it that seemed like a woman, haggard, and clad in pale-colored garments.

We did not wait to be assured of what we saw, but ran back fleetly enough, Rose dropping the torch or the rain beating it out, I forget which—I only know we plashed through the water in the dark.

Amos did not laugh, for he was not a little superstitious himself, and examining the priming of his gun came within the shelter of our hut, having first brightened the fire and whistled the fragment of a gay tune. "Now I guess you will believe," he said, and from the earnestness of his manner, and the drops of sweat along his forehead, it was evident that he believed at any rate.

We quite forgot to ask who Betty Gardener was, till, in the course of the story, it was unfolded.

"I don't see how he happened to be buried there," said Rose, now taking it for granted that Albert was buried as Amos had said, "and why he should come back to the earth, if he does come; was he wicked, or why can't he rest?"

"Wicked!" repeated Amos, "he was the best boy in the world, for he was only twenty when he died—such a sweet temper and such a fair face never went together before. His eyes were brown as a bird's, and his hair of the same hue, only touched with sunshine, and the smile of his lips was sweet as that of a woman," and in his earnestness the rough man paid a compliment to the sex, which, in his more habitual mood, he would have been far from doing. "All his ways were gentle like a child," he went on to say, and that his hands were as white as a lily; and that while his brother Edward hunted in the woods with his gun and dogs, Albert would dig flowers or gather berries of fruits, or sit in the sunshine reading books of poetry.

"No, no, he was good as he could be," repeated Amos, "and once I told him the biggest lie I ever told any body." Another time Amos would have boasted of this, but now he was frightened into confession.

"Humph," said Rose, "what made you?"

"I don't know," said the man humbly, "I wish I hadn't." And after a moment he went on: "One of the coldest nights that ever was—too cold to snow—though a little now and then sifted in your face hard as steel, and the wind came so sharp and still from the north it seemed to cut right through you, I was going home two or three hours after sunset from where I had been stealing apples in a barn not far from here, and seeing a bright light at the window of the cabin yonder, I turned aside and went in, partly to warm by the fire, and partly to borrow Edward's gun. I remember the house and every thing that was in it, and how the brothers looked, just as if it was yesterday. The great wood fire made the little room glow again—a pewter dish of bright apples was on the pine table, and a bunch of quails tied together by a string hung in the window, and a China pitcher, ornamented with red roses and pale green leaves, hung on a peg over the fireplace. Edward was mending some fishing tackle, and filled up all the intervals of talk with whistling or singing, and Albert sat on a low stool in one corner, reading by the firelight from a piece of an old volume entitled 'The Black Penitents.' His face was stooped forward over his book, and his hair fell in half curls along his forehead, while one arm was around the neck of a huge black dog called Rover, that sat upright beside his young master.

"We had some merry jesting, Edward and I, at the youth's expense, for it was reported among the neighbors that he and Betty Gardener were promised to go together to the parson's so soon as the sanction of the girl's mother could be had, which it was not thought likely would happen very soon, she being a rough, head-strong woman, and giving preference to a rich miller from a distant neighborhood. More than once she had said Albert was a weakly, worthless stripling, whom she despised, and that, unless he kept out of her way, she would twist his neck off as readily as she would that of the pigeon that crossed her path. A coarse, vulgar woman was Mrs. Gardener, plowing and planting the fields with her own hands, and slaughtering a sheep or a calf just as a butcher would do. Folks wondered a good deal that Albert was not afraid of her threats, for it was whispered about that her husband had died of poison; and though no body said his wife gave it him, it was none the less believed.

"That Albert and Betty—as sweet and modest a girl as ever was—continued to meet, in spite of the mother, I knew; for I had seen them gathering berries together the last harvest, and not more than a week past had seen Betty milking in the very China pitcher which hung over the fireplace, and afterward carrying it to the hedge, where she delivered it to Albert himself.

"This I told Edward, who laughed as merrily as I; said they should have to enlarge the house; growing boisterous when I said Albert had paid for the milk in coin current among lovers. This was not true.

"Albert smiled and said Betty had given him many a pitcher of milk beside the one I told of, as Edward knew; but that if we would find something else to jest about it would please him more than he could say. He spoke so sweetly, yet so seriously, that we could not jest with much grace afterward, and partly to make amends I took one of the stolen apples from my pocket and gave him, which he liked, he said, all the better for being frozen. He laid the book open on the floor beside him as he talked, and still keeping his arm around the neck of the dog, shook back his pretty curls and smiled now and then as though amused rather than interested in what I said to him. His girlish beauty, or his indifference, or both, vexed me, and I told him I knew of an orchard full of just such apples as I had given him, three or four miles away, and that we would some day take a basket and go to it together, intending to entice him to go on the search alone, as I really did.

"Edward said he could not loan me his gun the following day, but that if I would join him we would make a day together.

"On my way home I mentally located the orchard I had told Albert about, and marked out a route which it would cost him some pains to get over, thinking to have fine sport over his empty basket when he should get back. I did not consider how delicate he was, and how unequal to so long a journey in the intense cold.

"The morning was a little milder, cloudy, and snowy, and soon after breakfast Edward and I set out on our hunting expedition, as agreed, Albert declining to join us, as I had expected, and proposing to hunt the orchard instead. We laughed at his gloves, overshoes, comforter, and other wrappings, as, accompanied by Rover and with a small basket on his arm, he set out, saying he should be at home and have a bright fire waiting for us at seven o'clock.

"We had a brave day of it," continued Amos, looking in the direction of the grave to see if he could discover the ghost, "finding more game than we could well get home. The snow fell all day, so that when we crossed tracks we knew them to be fresh, and counted an addition to our treasures. Once crossing Mother Gardener's fields, as in derision we called the old woman, we saw her splitting back-logs half a mile from the house, and Edward, playfully leveling his piece, said he had a mind to make a target of her, and if he had poor Albert would have been the better off." Again Amos stopped to listen and poke the fire, but seeing nothing, and hearing nothing, he re-seated himself and resumed.

"The sun set clear, the snow half a foot deep by this time; and the moon coming up full and round we kept up our sport for two or three hours, and so intent on it were we that Albert was scarcely thought of. The wind was still, and it was as clear and intensely cold as I ever saw it; and as I blew on my numb fingers I thought what Albert must have suffered, and felt a twinge. Coming in sight of the house we saw no light, and I had just remarked it, when Edward replied, 'There he is now, just before us; he has been to Mother Gardener's for milk; don't you hear him striking on the pitcher?'

"He was not more than thirty yards in advance of us, and from the sound seemed to be striking the pitcher with his knuckles as he walked. 'Halloo!' said I, 'how many apples did you get?' but no voice replied. 'O don't think to deceive us,' said Edward, 'we know you have been to Mother Gardener's, and let the fire go out at home; stop and tell us how is Betty!' Such a dismal groan made answer as I never heard, and we both hurried forward to see what was the matter; but though we nearly run we gained not a whit, the boy keeping just so far in advance. 'Very well,' said Edward, halting, 'we are not so anxious to join you as you may think;' and here came such another groan as a dying man might make, and the youth staggered one way and another as if sick or faint.

"We thought he was practicing upon us, and spoke no more; and presently, being near the house, he turned aside and sat down where the brier-bush now grows. The moon shone full in his face as he turned, and seeing that it was indeed Albert, we told him he would have a cold bed, and would find it for his interest to come in, upon which he groaned again more piteously than before. Taking no further heed of him we passed into the house, where all was dark and lonesome enough.

"Rover rose from the corner on our entrance, and seeing not Albert threw his fore-paws on the window sill, and, looking in the direction of Mother Gardener's, howled out aloud three or four times, and striking a light we saw the China pitcher empty, and, as usual, hanging on the peg over the jamb.

"We made a great fire, and had been warming by it more than an hour, Edward appearing a good deal uneasy about his brother, but still not going forth, when all at once the door opened and Albert came in, pale and staggering just as we had seen him.

"We saw at once this was no affectation, and hastened to make a bed for him; and when he lay down he moaned just as we heard him an hour before. Edward asked him a little sharply why he had not answered our call, and why, when so ill, he had lain down in the snow.

"He asked, in a whisper, for water; and having swallowed a large draught, he told us he had not seen us, nor heard us call, nor lain down in the snow, and said he had come directly from Mrs. Gardener's, pointing out the direction and solemnly assuring us that he had not been where we supposed we had seen him. Having swallowed another draught of water, he said he was on his way home, and being almost frozen came across Mrs. Gardener's farm; that she saw him from the window as he looked at the house in the hope that he might see Betty, and coming out asked him very kindly to go in and warm by the fire; that he did so, and that she gave him something to drink, which he believed was killing him; and that Betty, coming in as he drank, pulled the cup away from his lips, crying out, 'Good God, mother!' and that she herself had walked with him most of the way home, supporting and cheering him; but that it was so cold he had persuaded her to go back against her will, telling her he felt quite well. He said all this gasping for breath and in a whisper; and while we sought to help him in some way, we knew not how, the door opened hurriedly and Betty came in, and, regardless of us, took his head on her bosom and rocked him to and fro, telling him she loved him, and he must not die; that she could not live without him, and she put her hand on her head as though it were indeed cracking. He smiled when he could not speak any longer, and putting one arm around her neck drew down her head—perhaps he kissed her, I don't know—and a moment afterward Betty called us to come and help him. Poor Albert! there had come a helper greater than we.

made to-night, we went out to the hill-side, thinking perhaps the poor boy had not known what he said, and that after all it had been him that we saw. Our own tracks lay fresh, but there were no others; and where we had seen him lie down, the snow was white and level without the slightest imprint at all. Of course we knew it was no mortal thing we had seen, but a shadow, as it were, sent to tell us of the death that was coming.

"All that night, and all the next day, and till the morning of the day after, Betty sat by the coffin still as a stone, speaking not for any thing that was said to her, her eyes tearless and her mouth rigid as though it would never smile again.

"By Edward's direction a grave was digged a few steps from the door; he would not be so lonesome, he said, with Albert so near. He was buried there, and Edward might as well have been buried, too, for all the best part of him seemed to go with Albert; his gun grew rusty, and he neglected all the sports he used to enjoy so much, never jesting or smiling, or caring for his old companions any more. He would sit moody in the corner reading his brother's books day after day, and when the spring came round he would sometimes sit at the door and play the flute that used to be Albert's; but all the neighbors said the music was not like the old music. One night hearing the flute, I went across the fields and found him, thinking perhaps he would be glad of mortal company, having had only the dead so long. He spoke civilly enough, but seemed little glad to see me, playing on or musing the same as if I had not been there. All at once there was a noise, like some one digging, by Albert's grave, and looking in that direction, there, sure enough, was a woman setting a bush—her black hair blowing wildly about her shoulders; for it was a rough March night—clouds, and moonlight, and wind, all flying about together. Of course it was Betty Gardener; and when she had planted her rose, the old dog—black Rover—that was lying at Edward's feet got up and joined her, and the two went away silently together."

At this juncture of the story footsteps and merry voices were heard, and the next moment two or three young lads of the neighborhood joined us at the camp-fire. All the tenderness and pathos of manner which had accompanied the story-telling, Amos dropped at once, and assumed the bullying, bragging behavior that characterized him. The lads were on their way home from a singing school, and when they went forward, which they did presently, Amos joined them, for that he was afraid to go alone I suspect, and Rosalie and I were left to protect ourselves from fright as we best could. We began by talking loud and making the blaze very bright; but when the fire was mended and we sat down, we found it difficult to keep up a steady conversation, and every now and then caught ourselves listening for the steps of our father, we said; but to own the truth, it was more in memory of what we had seen, or supposed we had seen by the grave.

The rain was still falling slowly, and the night so dark that we could not see at all beyond the circle of the firelight; we had been left alone much longer than we had expected to be; and far from the house, the grave at hand, and the ghost story still ringing in our ears, it is no wonder we were afraid.

Two or three times I thought I heard footsteps along the damp leaves before I dare say so; for the sound was not in the direction we expected our father to come. At length I became so alarmed that I could not forbear asking Rose if she heard any thing, when she owned that she had heard the noise I spoke of for some time past, but that it must be a sheep or a cow astray from the flock. She said this to quiet me, but I did not believe it, nor she either. The step was too light and stealthy to be that of an animal; and yet what mortal would be walking alone in the rainy woods at night? and yet that some one was walking so we could no longer disbelieve. Our rude house, as I said, was open at one side, so that it could afford us no protection from an evil-disposed person, if such a one were hovering about us. We listened for the firm, fearless step we expected over the hill, but in that direction all was still, while between us and the grave we distinctly heard the slow, light treading. While we whispered together as to what we should do, we beheld standing in the edge of the light, but not plainly visible, something that looked very like the figure we had seen by the grave. We waited no longer, but stealing out of the house gained the hill-top by a little circuit, and ran nimbly toward the lane leading to the house. When we dare look back to see if we were pursued, we heard the reassuring step of our father, and when we told him what we had seen, he said it was likeliest our fancy or the winds, or both together, or at most Amos himself lingering about to frighten us. Whatever it was we were not afraid to return with him and ascertain. It surprised us a little that he should walk right forward, never stopping to listen or look about at all, not even when we reached the hilltop, and saw sitting on the bench we had lately quitted the shape we had twice seen before. This was no ghost, but a veritable old woman, with white hair and wild, wandering eyes, from which the look of reason seemed long to have departed. On her head she wore a white veil, and about her person a great shawl of a gray color; but we had no time for scrutiny, for she no sooner saw us than she ran swiftly into the woods, and we heard no more of her that night.

It was afterward reported that Betty Gardener was come back, having escaped from the asylum where she had been a great many years, and that many persons had seen her wandering about the neighborhood and sitting at the grave of Albert Alerton. If it were she that we saw I know not, but we could think of no explanation of our strange visitor so probable. Whether or not the boy was supposed to have been murdered, and what became of the melancholy Edward, I never thought to inquire, when a child, but I shall not fail to do so now if opportunity occurs, and if any thing come to my knowledge worth writing out I shall give it in a subsequent story.

Edward's cabin, as we called the two or three logs and the pile of stones where the chimney had been, possessed for us thenceforward a new interest; and though half afraid we used to linger about the ground, especially at the spearmint spring, partly fearful and partly hoping we should see the unquiet ghost Amos had told us about; but we never did, though we once found some flowers which seemed to have been lately strewn over his grave, and a fine linen handkerchief spread at its head over a bunch of white violets, as though to cover the face of the dead.

Of all the treasures in life's chart Love is the most beautiful; but to Betty and Albert, as to thousands of others, it was only a dream.

STRENGTH OF SOUL.

It is Virtue alone which can render us superior to fortune; we quit her standard and the combat is no longer equal. Fortune mocks us; she turns us on her wheel; she raises and abases us at her pleasure, but her power is founded on our weakness. This is an old-rooted evil, but it is not incurable; there is nothing a firm and elevated mind can not accomplish. The discourse of the wise and the study of good books are the best remedies I know of; but to these we must join the consent of the soul, without which the best advice and the best counsel will be useless.—Petrarch.

ANGELS.

BY COATES KINNEY.

"Are they not all ministering spirits?"—HEB. 1, 14.

With sweet voices, solemn warnings
Of the being yet to be,
Bands of spirits hover round us,
Like the shore-birds on the sea.

Shore-birds, how they set hearts longing
For the happiness of home!
As around the wearied vessel
They in flocks of beauty come;
They out venture far and farther
In the calm of sea and sky,
Singing glad; but when the tempest
Threatens and the rocks are nigh,
Then they, landward wildly winging,
Scream the omens on the gale,
Of a shock among the breakers,
To the ruin rushing sail.

So these spirits from yon bright shore,
Golden with the sand of stars—
When God's truth has calmed the billows
Of our being's passion-ware—
Then these spirits come to visit,
Come to visit and console,
Dipping angel pinions round us
In the earthly sea of soul—
Cheering onward, or else warning
Of some thundering tempest nigh,
Or some secret rock of ruin
On the voyage to the sky.

They are round us—round us ever;
'Tis their presence in the soul,
When affections, like full fountains,
Gush from thence without control;
When the thrilling heart-cords quiver
As a harp's air-smitten strings,
'Tis their sweeping angel fingers,
Or their brushing angel wings;
When the soul of earth takes pinion
For a heavenward faith-flight far,
Upward through the awful nothing
Beckon they from star to star.

Oft they glide down in our slumbers—
Those whom on the earth we knew,
And those who have lived before us—
And we wake to live anew;
For their voices, sweet and solemn,
Though but ripples of the tone
Which upbillows, music's ocean,
Ever round the Great White Throne;
Yet inspire us with more longing
For the glory in the sky—
For the happy life immortal
Of these angels hovering nigh.

With sweet voices, solemn warnings
Of the being yet to be,
Bands of spirits hover round us,
Like the shore-birds on the sea.

A TRIP TO QUARTERLY MEETING IN OLDEN TIME.

BY REV. JAMES L. CLARK.

IN the year 18—I received my appointment to H—— circuit, which was generally regarded in the conference as being located somewhere near the starving point. But being a great admirer of the itinerant system, and a firm believer in a special Providence, I received my appointment as coming from God, and immediately removed, with my family, to my new field of labor, where I was received with warm hearts and open houses, in more respects than one.

I had traveled round my circuit once or twice, spying out the nakedness of the land, when the time came for holding our first quarterly meeting. It was to be held about fifteen miles from the place where we had pitched our tabernacle for the year. On Friday about noon I put my horse in a buggy, and, with my wife and child, set out for the place where I was to meet my official brethren to transact the business connected with the welfare of our Zion.

The country through which we passed was, comparatively speaking, new. For the first few miles we passed openings, here and there, where the pioneers of civilization had leveled the forest, and erected their rude tenements, to afford them shelter and protection from the inclemency of the seasons as they rolled around. We soon, however, left these cheering evidences of civilized life behind. After crossing a small stream we took up the side of a hill till we arrived at the summit of one of those numerous ridges, or continuous ranges of hills, so common in this country. Here we were surrounded with the unbroken forest. Our road followed the tortuous windings of the main ridge, keeping generally on its summit, which frequently was so narrow as scarcely to afford level ground enough for the road; while down on either hand it rapidly descended, as far as the eye could reach, till it terminated in a narrow vale, some three or four hundred feet below the level of its summit. Here solitude swayed her scepter. No sound broke the awful stillness that every-where reigned, save now and then the mournful note of some wandering bird, who, far from human habitations, sought a retreat in these solitudes of nature.

We had advanced through the forest about four miles when we met with a slight accident, which proved to be the cause of some inconveniences which we afterward suffered. In passing down a gentle declivity the fore axle of our vehicle caught on the top of a stump and broke the singletree. Here we were four or five miles from the nearest human habitation, and with no tools or implements to make another. And to add to our cheerless prospect, the heavens became overcast with clouds which threatened to pour out the teeming shower upon us. Night was fast approaching. What could we do? Necessity is said to be the mother of invention. After thinking for a moment I took off my lines, and with them tied the broken singletree to the crossbar that held the shafts together, and then walked and led my horse; but owing to this delay, and the slow gait we were compelled to go, night overtook us before we came down the side of the ridge into the valley of a small stream, called H——s river. Shortly after we descended into the valley, the glimmering of a light and the barking of a dog gave us the welcome information that we were near the abodes of human beings. When opposite the house we stopped, and I went in to ask for permission to stay all night, but we were refused by a gray-headed man. I urged my condition—a stranger totally unacquainted with the road. The night was dark and rainy, and my wife and child were with me, not knowing where to look for shelter; but I pleaded in vain. I was told that about two miles farther there was a house where he expected we could stay. I turned away more in sorrow than in anger to impart the information of our repulse to my companion, while this passage of Scripture awakened mournful feelings in my breast, "I was a stranger and ye took me not in." We now resumed our journey, the rain meanwhile increasing. Surrounded by darkness that might almost be felt we went on through scenes of danger, out of which the directing hand of God alone brought us in safety. All at once our progress was arrested; we had missed the road. Leaving my horse I felt about with my feet till I found the track, and in a short time we emerged from the woods into an open space, and presently came to a house, where, upon inquiry, I found we could stay. When we entered the house, quite fatigued and hungry, we found none of the family at home but a young man, who informed us that we could get nothing to eat, as they had no bread baked, no candle to make a light, and his sister, who kept house for him, had gone to stay all night at one of the neighbors. As this had been fast day we felt a little disappointed in not getting supper. Fortunately, however, we procured a little milk for our babe, and after satisfying its demands we had prayers, and then, wet and weary, we retired to rest, thankful that we were so much better off than our Savior was when he was upon the earth, who had not where to lay his head.

We rose in the morning, after a refreshing sleep, and started on our way, the rain still falling. After proceeding about half a mile we upset on the edge of a dangerous precipice. My wife and the child were thrown within about a foot of its edge, but, thanks to a kind Providence! we escaped unhurt. By perseverance, in an hour's traveling we arrived safely at brother W——'s, wet, tired, and hungry, and did ample justice to the food we found smoking upon the table. Breakfast over I started through the rain to the spot where the quarterly meeting was to be held, and was met a short distance from it by my presiding elder, brother S——, who kindly welcomed me to my kingdom. After conversing a short time we proceeded to the place of meeting; but such a place! It was an old frame, twenty by thirty feet, built for a bark shed for a tannery, the vats for which still surrounded the building, if such it could be called. In order to protect them from the inclemency of the weather, the brethren had collected some plank and set them up on end round the frame, leaving an aperture on one side to answer for a door. Windows there were none. The boards were fastened on with hickory withs. The inside was seated with split poles, which were laid across some sills which were placed lengthwise of the building. The floor was of dirt, plentifully covered with straw, as the space within our altars at camp meetings frequently are. A rude fixture at one end answered for a pulpit, from which we preached the unsearchable riches of Christ to the hungry souls who came through the mud and rain to this rude temple, dedicated, for the time being, to the worship of God. After sermon by the elder, which seemed to drop like showers of mercy on a thirsty land, the usual routine of quarterly conference business was attended to, when it appeared that the sum of nine dollars, thirty-seven and a half cents was paid in for the first quarter of the year. Well, the poor had the Gospel preached unto them. We retired to dinner, and sat down to the table, the furniture of which consisted of a few broken plates, knives, and forks, for there was not a whole one of any kind on the table. On the center of the table smoked a piece of fat pork, a few potatoes, and some corn-dodgers, as they are termed in this country, made of corn coarsely ground and half sifted. From these we satisfied the demands of nature, and felt like giants refreshed with new wine. At five o'clock brother H——n preached; we had a moving time, but nothing special. On Sabbath morning we had our love-feast. It still rained; but the people came out, and God manifested himself to us in the old bark-shed as he did not unto the world. Many felt like singing,

"My willing soul would stay
In such a frame as this,
And sit and sing herself away
To everlasting bliss."

Our meeting progressed finely. During prayer meeting at night eight broken-hearted penitents had the oil and wine of consolation poured into their bleeding hearts, and were enabled to rejoice in the knowledge of the forgiveness of sin. We continued our meeting several days with success. The last night was a time of power. Although the rain poured down incessantly, and the wind blew almost a hurricane, with the lightning flashing, and the thunder rolling almost continually, yet but few of the people knew of the terrific nature of the storm that was raging without. The cries of the penitent for mercy, the shouts of the new-born soul, and the rejoicing of the people of God over their children and friends just converted, all mingled together, rose above the roar of the tempest without, and forcibly reminded me of the scene described in Ezra, where the noise of the shout of joy could not be discerned from the noise of the weeping, for the people shouted with a loud shout, and the noise was heard afar off. Fifteen professed to find pardoning mercy that night, and among them was the young man and his sister, at whose house we staid over night on our way to the meeting. As the result of our meeting thirty-eight professed conversion, many of whom are still on their way to glory. Surely the wilderness and the solitary place was glad for them, and the desert rejoiced and blossomed as the rose. I felt amply paid for all my difficulties in getting there, and more than ever resolved for God to live and die.

IDLERS, THEIR VISITS.

THE idle levy a very heavy tax upon the industrious when, by frivolous visitations, they rob them of their time. Such persons beg their daily happiness from door to door, as beggars their daily bread, and like them sometimes meet with a rebuff. A mere gossip ought not to wonder if we are tired of him, seeing that we are indebted for the honor of his visit simply and solely to the circumstance of his being very tired of himself.

PHILOSOPHY OF WINGS AND TOES.

BIRDS live more in a given time than any other creatures. For to live is not only to live; it is also to move, act, and travel. The hours of the swift, which in sixty minutes can reach the distance of eighty leagues, are longer than the hours of the tortoise, because they are better occupied, and comprise a greater number of events. Men of the present day, who can go from Europe to America in a little more than a week, live four times as much as men of the last century, who took a month to make the passage. People who are now fifty years of age have still a longer time before them than Michael Angelo and Voltaire had at the moment when they were laid in the cradle. Independently of birds thus enjoying more of life than all other beings in the same given number of years, time seems to glide over them without leaving a trace of its effects; or, rather, time only improves them, reviving their colors and strengthening their voices. Age increases the beauty of birds, while in men it brings on ugliness.

Hold not up your chin too high over the ring of your white collar. I have seen better white bands about the neck of many a little bird that twitters in the hedge by the wayside. It is not reason that parts you from the beast most widely, so much as your hat. Many a dog has better head-lining than yours, but a head-covering like that which you clap on every day would look ridiculous, even upon a pig. I should like to know what furrier or paletot-maker, with the clothes of beasts given him to cut up and fashion into clothes for men, can dress the world of fashion half as well as the animal itself is dressed. What Macintosh garment is so beautiful as the water-proof dress of the salmon or the duck? Brummel never wore a coat half as well-fitting as a dog's. This coat fits without a crease, and always maintains its luster by a principle of renovation contained in itself. It becomes thicker and heavier when its wearer is exposed to severe cold and needs the warmest wrappers, and it becomes, in hot climates, thin and very light. It maintains the temperature of the body, and impedes the transmission either of heat or cold from without. It serves as a light mattress to the wearer that enables him to lie down comfortably on the bare ground, on stones, or upon the hardest floor, and to resist any ordinary amount of damp. The same dress on a female wearer serves as a bed for her little ones to nestle upon. A whole bird of paradise, or part of the tail of an ostrich stuck upon a lady's head does not impart to her dress the lightness and beauty of a complete set of plumage such as any bird, even a poor linnet in Seven Dials, has for everyday wear. Then how amazingly fit are the bird's clothes for the bird's occupation! The direction of every feather is calculated in birds of swift passage to assist and expedite their flight; and in birds that fly stealthily by night, to make their movements noiseless.

A bird is a model ship constructed by the hand of God, in which the conditions of swiftness, manageability, and lightness are absolutely and necessarily the same as in vessels built by the hand of man. There are not in the world two things which resemble each other more strongly, both mechanically and physically speaking, than the carcass and frame-work of a bird and a ship. The breast-bone so exactly resembles a keel that the English language has retained the name. The wings are the oars, the tail the rudder. That original observer, Huber the Genevese, who has carefully noticed the flight of birds of prey, has even made use of the metaphor thus suggested to establish a characteristic distinction between rowers and sailors. The rowers are the falcons, who have the first or second wing-feather the longest, and who are able by means of this powerful oar to dart right into the wind's eye. The mere sailors are the eagles, the vultures, and the buzzards, whose more rounded wings resemble sails. The rowing bird is to the sailing bird what the steamer, that laughs at adverse winds, is to the schooner, which can not advance against them.

The bones of highflyers, as well as their feathers, are tubes filled with air, communicating with a pulmonary reservoir of prodigious capacity. This reservoir is also closely connected with the air-cells which lie between the interior muscles, and which are so many swimming-bladders, by aid of which the bird is able to inflate its volume, and diminish its specific gravity in proportion. In birds that are laden with a heavy burden of head, Nature has interposed so decided a gap between skin and flesh that there results an almost complete detachment of the skin. Consequently, they can be stripped of their coating just as easily as a rabbit can. In man and other mammals the blood, in the act of breathing, advances ready to meet the air; in birds, air enters to find the blood, and comes in contact with it every-where. Hence an ubiquity of respiration and a rapidity of hematosis which explains the untirability of the wings of birds. The muscles do not get fatigued, because they receive new vigor every second from the influence of the ever-revivified blood. A stag or a hare drops at last, when hunted, because its lungs, rather than its legs, are tired.

Between the different members of a bird's body there exists a sort of equilibrium and balance, which prevents any one organ from obtaining undue development without another losing in the same proportion. Thus, exaggerated length of wing generally coincides with very small feet and legs. Examples: the frigate-bird, the swift, and the humming-bird. Feathered feet and legs are mostly short, as in pigeons, bantams, ptarmigan, and grouse. Nature always contrives to economize out of one part of a bird's body the material which she has too lavishly expended upon another. Good walkers are bad flyers, and good flyers are bad walkers. First-rate runners and divers are deprived of the power of rising in the air. Half-blind individuals, like owls, are astonishingly quick of hearing. Creatures clad in plain costume are recompensed by the powers of song. The lark and the redbreast, victim species—both being greedily eaten in France—have the gift of poesy bestowed upon them to console them for their future sorrows.

The most exquisite sense a bird possesses is sight. The acuteness and sensibility of the retina are in direct proportion to the rapidity of wing. The swift, according to Belon's calculation, can see a gnat distinctly at the distance of more than five hundred yards. The kite, hovering in the air at a height beyond our feeble vision, perceives with ease the small dead minnow floating on the surface of the lake, and is cognizant of the imprudence of the poor little field-mouse, as it timidly ventures out of its hole. Some hunters in Bengal killed a large wild boar, and left it outside their tent. An hour afterward the sky was blue and cloudless, only a minute speck in one quarter fixed their attention. It became larger, and proved to be a vulture flying in a straight line out of the far heavens toward their wild boar. In less than an hour seventy vultures had thus flown in straight lines from all quarters of the sky. Again—Aleppo is so placed that it may be seen from a great distance. Stand after dinner on the terrace roof of a house at Aleppo, and make gestures with your hand, as if you were scattering crumbs. Flocks of birds will dart to your feet out of a sky in which just before perhaps not one was visible. From the upper regions of the air they keep a look-out on the flesh-pots of the Syrians. The bird that is so far-sighted is near-sighted, too; it discriminates morsels, and sees accurately what it should pick up, between its eyes and the point of its beak; for it must adjust its eye, and does so readily, even to that short distance. The bird, too, has a surprising quickness of sight. When flying at the pace of an express-train under shelter of a forest, it will steer its way among the boughs, and never once suffer collision, after our express-train fashion. So quick-sighted, short-sighted, and far-sighted are birds.

All God has done and made he has thoroughly well done and made. If he had not exactly proportioned the visual organs of the bird of prey, or the swallow, to its dashing flight, the mere extreme velocity of the bird would have only served to break its neck. Partridges constantly kill themselves against the iron wires of electric telegraphs; and nothing is more common than to find thrushes and larks with dislocated vertebrae, when they fall into the large vertical net which is used in France by twilight sportsmen.

Perhaps, after all we have said and seen, the sense of touch is the most perfect in birds, and the organs of feeling are endowed with a subtlety of perception more exquisite even than those of sight. In fact, air being the most variable and unstable of elements, birds would be endowed by nature with the gift of universal sensibility, enabling them to appreciate and foretell the slightest perturbations of the medium they inhabit. In consequence, the feathered race are armed with a nervous impressionability which comprises the different properties of the hygrometer, the thermometer, the barometer, and the electroscope. A tempest, which takes the man of science by surprise, has, long before, given warning to the birds of the sea. The noddies, cormorants, gulls, and petrels know twenty-four hours beforehand, by means of the magnetic telegraph which exists within them, the exact day and moment when Ocean is going into one of his great rages, opening wide his green abysses, and flinging the angry foam of his waves in insult against the forehead of the cliffs. Some birds are the harbingers of wintery storms; others usher in the advent of spring. The raven and the nightingale announce the coming of the tempest by a peculiar form of bird's expression, which they both seemed to have borrowed from the vocabulary of the frog—a pre-eminently nervous animal, to whom the science of galvanism is greatly indebted. The chaffinch, in unsettled weather, recommends the traveler to take his umbrella, and advises the housekeeper not to be in a hurry to hang out her linen. Certain mystic geniuses have attributed this faculty of divination possessed by birds to some special sensibility, acquainting them with the action of the electric currents that traverse the atmosphere, and accurately informing them of their direction. Nor is there any scientific argument which can be confidently opposed to such a theory.

After the organs of sight and touch, the sense of hearing comes next in importance. The delicacy of the auditory powers of birds is sufficiently apparent with the passion for vocal music which many of them manifest. It is a universally admitted physical law that, in all animals, a close and invariable correspondence exists between the organs of voice and those of hearing. Now birds, it will be seen, are the Stentors of nature. The bull, who is an enormous quadruped, endowed with an immensely capacious chest, does not roar louder than the bittern, a moderate-sized bird which frequents our ponds. In Lorraine they style him the bœuf d'eau, or "water-bull." A crane, trumpeting two or three thousand yards above the surface of the earth, pulls your head back just as violently as a friend who asks you "How do you do?" from the balcony of a fifth-floor window; while the thundering Mirabeau, who should venture to harangue the Parisian populace from the top of the towers of Notre Dame, would run a great risk of not being able to convey a single word to a single member of his congregation.

Ascend in the air, by means of a balloon, in company with an old Atlas lion, whose formidable roaring once struck terror throughout Algerian wildernesses; and, when you have risen only half a mile, make your traveling companion give utterance to the most sonorous of his fine chest-notes. Those notes will spend themselves in empty space, without descending so low as the earth. But the royal kite, floating another half mile above you, will not let you lose a single inflexion of his cat-like mewings, miniatures though they be of the lion's roar. It is probable, says M. Toussenel, that Nature has expended more genius in the construction of the larynx of a wren or a nightingale than in fabricating the ruder throats of all the quadrupeds put together.

Smell and taste are but feeble in birds; and they have no great occasion for either sense. A bird's appetite must be enormous, in order to supply the animal heat necessary for the maintenance of its superior nature. A bird is a locomotive of the very first rank, a high-pressure engine, which burns more fuel than three or four ordinary machines. "Animals feed, man eats," says worthy Brillat Savarin. "Clever men alone know how to eat properly." This strictly true gastronomic aphorism is more exactly applicable to birds than to quadrupeds. Birds feed to assuage their hunger and to amuse themselves, not to indulge in mere epicurism. They fatten through sheer ennui, and for pastime's sake, rather than through any ambition of "cutting up fat." The task, moreover, assigned to them is to destroy the innumerable seeds of weeds, [which they do in a larger proportion than the protected seeds of human food,] and animal and insect vermin, which would soon annihilate the labors of man, did not certain species of birds feel an incessant craving to devour them. Birds have no nose, for the same good reason that they have no palate. It is not necessary that creatures, destined to eat every thing without making wry faces, should have posted in front of their stomach, as we have, a vigilant sentinel, who is troublesomely cautious who and what he allows to enter the fortress. All, therefore, that has been said about the fine scent of the crow and the vulture, who snuff gunpowder and corpses at incredible distances, is simply absurd. There is an excellent reason why crows should not smell gunpowder; namely, that gunpowder is scentless till it is burnt. (We venture to doubt this statement of fact: having a decided personal nose for the saltpeter.) If crows could perceive that perfume it would attract them, instead of driving them away. Crows and vultures are carrion birds, who love, above all things, the treat of a battle.

Once when the sons of the last king of France had ordered the make-believe of a nice little war, to be got up in the environs of Fontainebleau, for the gratification of the burgesses of Paris—a race whose eyes are always on the look-out for childish spectacles, wherein quiet people pretend that they are on the point of killing other quiet people—an old crow of the neighborhood, who had gone through the campaign of 1812, fancied he recognized in the maneuvers of the army of parade, a repetition of the murderous dramas which had supplied him, in the good old time, with frequent and delicious banquets. He informed his comrades all around, what a lucky chance was in store for them: expressly advising them to get their beaks and claws sharpened on their way to the rendezvous. A whole flock of body-pickers assembled, and hovered in thick groups over the two camps, exciting them by their vociferations to set to, in right good earnest. If but little blood were shed, it was not through any fault of the crows; and nothing could equal their spite and rage when they found that the demonstration was only a joke.

We have here only room briefly to state that

M. Toussenel, for reasons which he ably states, classifies birds according to the form of the foot. Every bird, from the penguin of the Antarctic Pole, to the gerfalcon of the North Cape, has the foot either flat or curved. The whole kingdom of birds is thus divisible into flat-foots and curve-foots. The first three orders of the former class are, the oar-foots, the stilts, and the velocipedes, or runners. Further general details are now impossible; we can only give a sample of the runners.

The velocipedes come immediately after the stilts in the order of creation. They were the first inhabitants of the earliest emerging continents; for they are herbivorous and gramnivorous creatures, and grass is the initial manifestation of the vital forces of the earth. Their character of primogeniture is, moreover, indelibly stamped upon all their features, in their rudimental structure, and their small number of toes. The order opens with the ostrich—the ostrich is a bird-quadruped, as the penguin is a bird-fish—it can not fly for want of wings, and has only two toes on each foot. If the monodactyl, or one-toed bird, existed, it would certainly belong to this order. All the runners of Europe have wings and can fly. The most unfinished series we possess is that of the winged tridactyls. The bustard is the one which comes nearest to the ostrich. Nevertheless, as every individual in the order has its frame modeled, more or less, after that of the ostrich, it is important to refer to this original or primitive pattern, and to compare its organization with that of the humming-birds, in order clearly to comprehend the character and the providential destiny of the creatures we are considering.

The humming-bird, and all the swift sailers, have the thoracic cavity, or chest, outrageously developed, with the ridge of the breast-bone projecting like the keel of a cutter. But, in virtue of the natural law of equilibrium, this excessive development can only take place at the expense of some other part of the body. In the humming-bird the atrophied and deficient portion is the region of the insertion of the lower members. All is sacrificed to lightness and utility. The chest is fashioned like the blade of a knife. In short, the swift sailer, when its feathers are plucked, has a great resemblance to its own skeleton: an idea, which invincibly repulses all thoughts of savory roast-meat.

But let us demolish, piece by piece, the frame of the bird of prey, or the humming-bird. Let us put the complete in the place of the incomplete, and substitute the empty for the full. Let us take, in one word, the very reverse of all these anatomical arrangements, and we shall have the exact pattern of the runner. There do not, perhaps, exist in all nature two creatures belonging to the same family, which bear such slight marks of relationship as the humming-bird and the ostrich. In vain would the latter deny the fact that it partakes more of the camel than of the biped; for, in proof of the fact, it carries on its back the children and the kings of Egypt. An ostrich is a vice-versa humming-bird. Here flight, there running, is the only means of locomotion. In the ostrich the breast-bone, instead of projecting, is flattened down to ridiculous dimensions. It is a bony plate in the form of a shield, which acts as a prow instead of a keel. The thighs and legs assume the bulky dimensions of the same parts in herbivorous quadrupeds. All of which means, that Nature, who, in the swift sailers, has favored the development of uneatable parts at the expense of those which are articles of food, has completely changed her style of architecture in the velocipedes: neglecting the parts which are never eaten, in order to develop, in luxurious fashion, those parts which supply us with dainty dishes.

Now, wherefore this contrast of comparative anatomy? Wherefore has Nature, who does nothing without a motive, so liberally garnished the velocipede with meat? Why has she endowed that tender viand with so remarkable an easiness of digestion, and so exquisite and inviting a flavor? Does Nature, by these signs, intend to insinuate that the providential destiny of the runner is to be snared or shot, and then roasted and eaten?

The fact, alas! is only too probable, the language too clear, the oracle too certain. Yes! every thing leads to the belief that Nature has destined the order of velocipedes to serve as food for flesh-eating creatures, in every kingdom of the animated world. Yes! these unhappy races merit, in the same degree as the ruminants, the appellation of the victim order. [Victim, from the Latin victus, conquered, from which the word victuals is also derived, in consequence of the ancient practice of conquerors making a meal off their conqueror's sirloin.]

The velocipedes are all true ruminants, living, like them, on grass and grain. They have several stomachs, with a preparatory crop, fulfilling exactly the same office as the paunch of the quadruped. Now, all meats produced from grass are of delicate taste and easy digestion. Analogically and algebraically speaking, the hen is to the cow as the partridge is to the roe. The hen gives us her eggs and her chickens, just as the cow does her milk and her calf. We ought, besides, to remark that, in either order, the flesh of the female is superior to that of the male. The fact, moreover, is universal, that nature has endowed the female world with more delicate aromas than the male; with more fleshy tissues and shorter muscles.

The great bustard is the swiftest of our runners. Per contra, flight is severe exercise, and is only undertaken, with visible repugnance, when danger is knocking loud at the door. The slightest damage to its wings exposes it to serious disasters. One morning before daybreak, when some Champagne peasants were proceeding from Suippe to Chalons-sur-Marne, they perceived a herd of creatures at a certain distance from the road making unavailing efforts to rise from the ground. On approaching to inspect the phenomenon more closely, they ascertained that the crippled birds were great bustards, whose wings were so completely locked up by the hoar-frost as to be useless, either for flight or running. The barbarous travelers, as we should have done in their place, naturally took advantage of the circumstance. They knocked the unhappy fowls on the head; and the market of Chalons, the capital of Bustardland, was abundantly supplied on that occasion. A gunshot which tells upon a bustard, at the lowest figure, is always worth twenty francs on the spot. Champagne, which, in the time of Belon, was so rich in bustards and so poor in vegetables, is still the only province of France where these birds feel comfortable, and consent to breed. But two facts are sufficient to give you an idea of the present variety of the species. Many sportsmen, M. Toussenet included, have shot for years in the Champenoise desert, without burning powder over a single bustard. And for many seasons past, Chevet, the illustrious game-dealer of the Palais Royal, has not received more than half-a-dozen specimens. The great bustard has passed into the state of a myth in Artois, Vendee, Brenne, and even in the stony plains of the south, where it formerly took up its winter quarters. Its apparition in those credulous districts is now considered as the forerunner of extraordinary political events—although it seldom does really more than announce the approach of frosty weather.

The physiognomy of the plovers is not happy. Their head is much too voluminous, their eye too large, their bill too short, inserted too low, and too much at a right angle with the cranium. The sentiment of fraternity is highly developed in most species of the Ploveridae. When a plover is brought to the ground, the whole band alights to render him assistance. Sportsmen have more than once exterminated whole flocks of dotterels without stirring a step. The poor creatures cruelly expiate their fault of having too round a head. They have the extreme and idiotic simplicity to believe in the harmlessness of tipsy people; and allow themselves to be easily approached by whomsoever may pretend to be unable to walk straight. Religious observers of the Mussulman law, they repair to the water-side at stated hours, two or three times every day, to make their ablutions and wash their feet. The dotterel, of all the plovers, has the biggest and the roundest head, which might, perhaps, be supposed to indicate that it contains the greatest quantity of brain. The fact is exactly the reverse. He has the greatest faith in drunken men, and manifests the most obstinate propensity to throw himself in the sportsman's way. This same dotterel, formerly very common in La Beauce, was the primitive element of the famous pate de Chartres. It has fallen a victim to its own glory. The pate's success led to the pate's consumption, and the pate's consumption led naturally to the destruction of the species. The Chartres pastry-cooks are at last obliged to replace the absent dotterel by partridge, quail, and lark flesh.

Threetoeism's last expression appears in the form of the golden plover. Henceforth this character of primitiveness completely disappears; its disappearance announces the end of flatfootism, and our arrival at a superior sphere. The bird by which the transition is made is the lapwing, rejoicing in a small hind-toe. The apteryx is an instance what a superior passional title is conferred upon a quasi-tridactyl by the simple addition of a spur, however high on the leg it may sprout. The influence of a fourth toe is not less manifest here. The Swiss lapwing contracts matrimony. He is willing to remain the golden plover's messmate and friend in the daily relations of winter life; but he refuses to enter into any community of political and vernal doctrines with him. The moral superiority of the four-toed bird is further displayed in the crested lapwing. Why this crest on the English peewit? Why do we find an attribute of royalty adorning one head and not another?

The crest, it appears, is an honorary reward bestowed upon the peewit, both for his exemplary domestic conduct, and for the numerous services of a composite kind which he renders to his lord and master, man. The peewit is not content with supplying us, in October, with savory meat; in spring he presents us with exquisitely delicate eggs, at least as good as those of the domestic hen. He does not restrict his benefits to the pleasures of the table; he affords us sport on the grandest scale. At large, he protects the dikes of Holland from the ravages of worms, which would otherwise undermine them. For that reason, he prefers the Polders to any other residence—plains which lie beneath the level of the sea, and have been rescued from the waves by the industry of man. In captivity he ornaments our gardens by the finished graces of his elegant person. He wages a relentless war against earth-worms, grubs, slugs, and snails. Boldly setting his face against the loose and shameful morals of his neighbors, he alone dares to display the noble standard of conjugal fidelity. Henceforth the crest of the peewit will puzzle nobody. The answer to the enigma is openly published. The flight of this bird in a state of excitement is not less rich in somersaults and pirouettes than that of the snipe when deeply in love. And if the lapwing can not, like him, bleat like a goat, to declare his passion, he makes up for it by mewling like a cat.

Nature has so regularly constituted the series of dusters, and has so artistically limited the boundaries of the genera, that she has really made each physical character of the bird an element of classification. Contrary to the opinion of learned men, you may take this family by the feet, by the head, by the neck, by the tail, by the color, by the origin, by the country, by the locality, without incurring the least risk of error. For head-dress, there is the aigrette of the pea-fowl, the tuft of the pheasant, the longitudinal comb of the cock, the helmet of the guinea-fowl, and the bald and carbuncled pate of the turkey. There are rudimental tails, short tails, middle-sized tails, outrageous tails. There are tails square, tails round, tails lyre-shaped, tails wheel-and-fan-wise. But the series has something better than that to serve it as a separative type. It is a mark of such superior importance, that merely to indicate it renders all mention of the others unnecessary. The spur is the feature now referred to.

The spur is no mere accident in the way in which a creature is shod. Instead of softening a distinction, it makes a real revolution. It effects a thorough transformation of costume and manners, and sums up in itself the whole family history. In the single word spur are comprised the ideas of pacha, harem, despotism, jealousy, dazzling dresses among the males, gentleness and timidity among the females.

If the task of christening the turkey had been left to the first child that came to hand, it is more than probable the bird would have been called the glouglou, seeing that such is the name he gives himself. But the course of things, in natural history, never runs on so smoothly as that. The creature's earliest French godfathers, with their heads full of certain features of the cock, gave him the name of coq d'Inde—to distinguish him, observe, from the one who really came from India, whereas the new arrival was a native of America. But as, in those days, America passed for the continuation of Asiatic India, the unfortunate choice of coq d'Inde ought not to be imputed to individual ignorance. Afterward coq was suppressed; and, little by little, the bird was called first the dindon, then the dinde. Fourier—who knew so many things without having learned them, and who divined the history of a species from one single character—makes the turkey the emblem of the bashful lover. The turkey brutally tramples upon the passion which exhausts and is killing him. But this weakness of temperament is only one of his least defects. Buffon, who wants to make him out a brave fellow, quotes in support of his opinion the singular proof of courage that a flock of turkeys have been seen to surround a hare on her form, and bravely unite to peck her to death. A number of political heroes are capable of this act of heroism, and sometimes perform it; but without being awarded the laurel for the act.

The turkey is bald, like most fast livers. His face and forehead are disfigured by bunches of warts and chaplets of excrescences, swollen and red from the excesses of the table. These characteristics recall the physiognomy of the vulture, whom the turkey resembles in stature, color, cowardice, and greed. When a man is both stupid and mischievous, we proverbially say he is like a turkey. But the portrait is too flattering; the turkey is worse than mischievous and stupid. He wears at the bottom of his neck a tuft of black hairs, to testify his fraternity with the he-goat. This model of gluttons, drunkards, and sluggards, is inscible in temper, like all people who quickly get fat and rich. You hear him storm and cry glouglou—you see him red and blue with anger. The turkey-hen, however, is well-behaved, and is the most devoted mother in the world.

When the writing of this article had been concluded, we received a communication which corroborates M. Toussenel's estimate of the passionate sensitiveness, the vigor, and the visual perfectitude of at least one family of the beings gifted with wings and toes:

"On Friday last, the fourth of August," our correspondent writes, dating from Glamorgan-shire, "one of my cats, an adept at bird-catching, was clever enough to capture a martin. He was immediately assailed by two birds of the same species, who each made a stoop at him, striking and then wheeling off; but he bore off his prey. Nothing further occurred till Sunday—probably from want of opportunity—but on that day, being in front of the house, and the coast clear, the cat was vigorously attacked by three martins. Rising to a considerable height in the air, they darted down on his head with great force, and in such quick succession that they quite confused him. At first Mr. Tom's efforts were confined to attempts to get hold of his assailants; but they wheeled off, after delivering each a blow with their pointed beaks, too swiftly to be caught.

"This warfare had lasted a considerable time—for the whole affair occupied fully three-quarters of an hour—when the three birds flew off, each in a different direction, as if to procure recruits; and in a very short time reappeared with six or seven other martins, who all joined in the same plan of attack. Tom, who may be supposed to scorn the idea of flying from small birds, was soon roused to anger, in place of desire for prey, by the incessant stabs at the back of his head—the birds hitting it every time with unerring precision, after adroitly skimming off for another descent and another aim, move how he would; and he at length grew quite angry. He growled, and erected his bristles and tail for a regular fight. Finally, unable either to seize his tormentors or to endure the fierceness of the attack any longer, he ingloriously retreated under a warehouse door, which afforded him shelter, the birds striking at his tail, the last part of him in sight."

Then comes a postscript:

"On concluding my letter, I walked out, and stood for some time in the front of the house near the spot where the combat took place on Sunday. A martin, which had a nest under the eaves of the warehouse, was sailing about in the air, and Tom's sister was pattering along on the ground, neither animal, to all appearance, regarding the other. In a few minutes the tom-cat came out, and in an instant the bird, screaming loudly, flew at him with the utmost fury, making several desperate darts, but seemed fearful of approaching quite near enough to strike, there being no other bird in sight to second him, or to distract the attention of its adversary; but it was quite clear that there was no mistake in recognizing its enemy, although the two cats are so very nearly alike in size, color, and general appearance, that no person, unless very intimately acquainted with them, would be able to distinguish one from the other. This little bird, however, had been so nicely observant, as to know at once, without hesitation, who was the offender."

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF BISHOP HEDDING.

BY REV. E. PADDOCK, D. D.

EVERY thing relating to that great and good man, the late Bishop Hedding, must have a permanent interest to all who knew him, and especially to the members of the communion to which he was so bright an ornament. In my own bosom scarcely any other human name awakens emotions at once so deep and so tender. The remembrance of him is always grateful to my heart. I became acquainted with him at an early period in my public life—soon after he was ordained bishop—and, for many years, performed for him, when he visited the conference of which I was a member, the office of private secretary. Of course, I was much in his company; and especially as he presided over that body about as frequently, perhaps, as all the other bishops taken together. And the more I was with him, the more I loved and venerated him. Such dignity and such simplicity, such lofty intelligence and such purity of aim, are seldom found in the same person. Eulogy, however, is far from being the object of the present brief communication.

The perusal of your late article, Mr. Editor, on "The Last Hours of Bishop Hedding," brought so vividly to my recollection a passage in his history, that I can hardly suppress my inclination to give your readers the substance of it.

At the session of the Oneida conference, in—I think—1840, held at Norwich, Chenango county, N. Y., I was quartered at the same house with the venerable Bishop. As I was going out to public worship, on Sunday evening, he said to me, "Brother, I wish you would excuse me from accompanying you, I am so much fatigued; and then you know the exhausting labors of the closing part of the conference are still before me; and I must recruit, and prepare for them." In truth, I had no thought of his accompanying me; for I knew he had not only preached a long and fatiguing sermon that day, but had ordained both the elders and the deacons. The circumstance, however, shows—what was always an amiable trait in his general character—his tender regard for the feelings of others. He was studiously careful never to say a word or perform an action which would be likely to give pain to any human being, save only when it was clearly apparent that the interests of religion demanded that sort of discipline, and then the infliction was ever accompanied with so much tenderness that even the subject of it was obliged the more to respect him.

The public service of the evening performed, I returned to our mutual lodgings. Finding the chamber of the good Bishop unilluminated, and presuming he had retired to rest, I determined to pass through his room—which I was obliged to do in order to reach my own dormitory—as quietly as possible, so as not to disturb him. As soon as I opened the door, however, I heard his tender voice in the opposite end of the room, saying, "Brother, please be seated while I light a lamp. You will find a chair to the left of the door." The venerable old gentleman experienced some little difficulty in igniting his match, but finally succeeded in lighting the lamp, when he said, "I have been sitting here by this open window, enjoying the cool air, [the evening was excessively warm,] and examining this poor heart of mine, to see whether it loves the blessed Jesus as much as it used to." After a moment's pause, he added, his voice tremulous with deep emotion, "And I think it does, full as much—yes, a little more than it ever did before." These were his precise words—words which I can no more forget than I can forget that I ever saw the man.

Seating himself, he continued to speak of his own past experience with a freedom and a pathos which were at once most delightful and most edifying. Among other things, he said, "I do not know whether it is so with others, but I often find great spiritual comfort in reading our hymns. They contain a depth, a concentration of meaning, which comes home to the soul with a kind of divine power. Though I can not substitute them for the inspired word, I frequently read them with a view to religious edification, as well as from a regard to their unsurpassed poetical beauty."

The afternoon sermon, that day, had turned chiefly on the resurrection of Christ, and the exercises were closed with that incomparable hymn, commencing,

"He dies, the Friend of sinners dies."

To that hymn the Bishop particularly referred, and spoke of it as one of the finest in the English language, and as often having been a blessing to his own soul. He repeated the whole of it with the greatest force and propriety, and pointed out its principal beauties with the nicest discrimination. He regarded it then, as he did upon his dying bed, as being "all glory." Indeed, all of his exercises on that happy morning to which you refer—the morning he was visited by the Rev. brother Ferris—seem to have been strikingly of a piece with those of the memorable evening at Norwich.

"THY WORD IS TRUTH," ST. JOHN XVII, 17.

BY MRS. A. L. RUTER DUFOUR.

"Thy word is truth." Of dust thou art, frail mortal;
And unto dust at last thou shalt return; [Gen. iii, 19.
Thy soul must enter through death's gloomy portal,
Its future destiny beyond to learn. [Rom. v, 12

"Thy word is truth." From out the house of David,
And stem of Jesse, shall a Savior spring; [Isa. xl, 1.
Then as a rose the desert waste shall blossom, [xxxv, 1.
With joy and gladness shall they sweetly sing.
[xxxv, 2

"Thy word is truth." Behold the promised Savior,
Low in the manger, where the ox is fed; [Luke ii, 7.
The morning stars for joy have sung together,
[Job xxxviii, 7.
And Chaldea's shepherds, full of fear, have fled.
[Luke ii, 8, 9.

"Thy word is truth." Lo in Gethsemane's garden
[Matt. xxvi, 39.
Great drops of blood stood on his regal brow:
[Luke xxii, 44.

"I pray thee, Father, let this bitter cup Pass by; but not as I will, Lord, but thou."
[Luke xxii, 42.

"Thy word is truth." The Savior cried, "'Tis finished!" [John xix, 30.
And terror hid the guilty world in gloom;

[Mark xv, 33.
He conquered death, and, in full strength and glory,
[Luke xvi, 8.
Unbarred the portals of the guarded tomb.
[Matt. xxviii, 2, 3, 4, etc.

"Thy word is truth." Now, by the blood of Jesus, [Eph. i, 5, 6, 7.
As children, Father, to thy throne we come,
[Rom. ix, 26.
The heathen to thy son shall soon be given,
[2d Psalm, 7, 8.
Thy will on earth as in the heavens be done.
[Matt. vi, 10.

UPWARD steals the life of man,
As the sunshine from the wall,
From the wall into the sky,
From the room along the spire;
Ah! the souls of them that die
Are but sunbeams lifted higher.—Longfellow.

THE DAUGHTERS OF CHINA.

BY REV. J. W. WILEY, M. D.

THE immense empire of China presents for our study, and the exercise of our sympathies, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of females, held in the degrading bondage of Oriental customs, and in the ignorance and superstition of idolatry. The moral and social position of these suffering millions is such as to waken in every pious and benevolent heart a desire to ameliorate their condition, and to elevate them to a higher and better state. Providence has unexpectedly thrown open to the Christian world, the long-closed gates of the heathen empire in which these oppressed daughters are found, and, through strange and even wonderful developments, appears to be calling loudly upon the lovers of the Savior and the friends of humanity, to turn their attention and their labors to the Christianization of the vast people thus brought within the reach of their sympathies. The two hundred millions of oppressed females, found in the population of this empire, claim, by their situation, a large share of our Christian sympathy, and, by their interesting and promising character, a large share of our benevolent labors toward enlightenment and evangelization. Here, where the Gospel exerts none of its benign influences, the rights of women are truly invaded, and from being the equal and the companion of man, she is reduced to a mere instrument for his pleasure, or a faithful slave for his service. To all who are sincere and earnest advocates for "Woman's Rights," and are anxious for opportunities to exercise their benevolent feelings in lightening the burdens, and refining the character, and exalting the position of their oppressed sisters, we most heartily commend the vast field which is here opened to their philanthropic labors.

In China, as in other countries, the influence of woman is great, and is exerted in the family and in the state, in morals and in religion; but in that country, in the position which she occupies, that influence is only exercised for evil. We feel convinced that nothing can reach and break up the numerous and great evils of heathen life and society, but the transforming influence of our holy Christianity. This alone can destroy the idolatry which lies at the bottom of their degradation, and this only can teach to benighted man the true position which should be occupied by the help-mate that God has given him, and thus shake the very foundation of the oppressive system which degrades the daughters of the east. But the enlightening truths of the Bible must be taught to the oppressed females, as well as to their unfeeling masters. We in vain attempt a reformation of society by directing our attention to the men alone. The future men and women of the nation are under the influence of the wives and mothers of to-day, and we are only vainly laboring to exhaust a stream that is fed by a never-failing fountain, while we leave untouched this undercurrent of woman's influence. It is as necessary to teach the mothers as to enlighten the fathers, and the wives must be converted, or we can produce no permanent impression upon the minds and hearts of the husbands. We must reach the children, the future nation in embryo—but we must reach them through the family, in which presides the wife and mother.

But who shall teach the women of China? The missionary, who goes forth to preach the Gospel, can not gain access to the females of the land. The iron usages of eastern society forbid his entrance into the "inner apartments," where the mothers, and wives, and daughters are found, and custom does not allow the daughters of the land to mingle in public assemblies. The missionary looks in vain to find the female in his chapel, and but seldom is she found to stop and mingle with the crowd that gathers around him in the street or in the country. The boatwoman, and the burden-bearer, and the market-woman, whose avocations have somewhat freed them from the restraints of society, and in an equal degree rendered them less susceptible to good impressions, may occasionally delay for a moment to catch a passing word from the missionary; but the Chinese lady is to him always unapproachable. In no class of society is education given to females, and scarcely any are able to read at all the language of their own country; so that, while excluded by the usages of society from the direct labors of the missionary, they are also, by ignorance, shut out from receiving a knowledge of the truth through books. What, then, can be done for the daughters of China? Can nothing be done to give to them the blessings of the glorious Gospel, and to elevate them to the high and happy sphere secured to the gentler sex by the institutions of Christianity? They can be reached, and the blessings of the Gospel can be imparted to them; but it is only by the personal labors of their sisters, the daughters of England and America; and it is for these to say whether the Chinese female shall be elevated to the hopes and privileges of woman in Christian lands, or remain the unhappy victims of the despotic usages of the society in which they live. With the view of awakening a deeper interest in behalf of these females of China in the hearts of the highly blessed daughters of America, and with the hope of inspiring in some hearts, at least, a spirit of consecration to the noble work that lies before them, we wish to give to them a better acquaintance with these daughters of the east.

In contemplating the women of China, they present themselves to us, as in our own country, in various grades of society, from the humble boatwoman and the noisy burden-bearer, to the modest and retiring wife of the wealthy merchant and the secluded but gaudy wives of the mandarins. She is found, degraded and ignorant, in her contracted home, on a little boat that lies moored by the river's bank, or plies to and fro on its broad bosom, gaining her livelihood by fishing, and rearing her children in want and ignorance. She is found, beneath the rays of a broiling sun, laboring in the fields, sowing, planting, and gathering, and bearing her products on her shoulders to market, her careless husband, in the mean time, often amusing himself with the children, or smoking his tobacco or opium at home. She is found thronging the streets, bearing heavy burdens, performing the most menial services, competing with rough, half-naked men in feats of strength and labor, herself as boisterous and as masculine as they. She is found, in another grade of society, in the secluded retirement of her home, called by the name of wife, but used as her master's slave, having the duties of a miserable household to perform, with none of the rewards of love or gratitude. Still higher in life she is found as the tinselled and ornamented inmate of the "inner apartments," secluded from society, bearing the hollow title of wife, or filling the character of the purchased handmaid, free from degrading employments, but left to amuse herself as she can with music, embroidery, and dress, and always expected to amuse and gratify the wishes of her master, without dreaming she has a right to be considered his equal and companion, or expecting any return for her affection and kindness. She is found, too, in the wretched haunts of vice and infamy which abound upon the water and the land, the most miserable and degraded of her kind, because often her degradation is involuntary, and she occupies her wretched position because unfeeling or poverty-stricken parents have sold her to a monster.

As found in these various positions, her personal appearance and dress differ considerably. In the middle and lower ranks of society, the Chinese female possesses but few attractions.

Her dress is always modest and seasonable, but not always clean and tasteful. Her naturally tawny complexion is made more dark and rough by exposure to the sun, and her consciousness of degradation and her conflicts with rough and boisterous men have made her bold and masculine. The laboring women of China have often been mistaken, by recent visitors, for men, and we have heard those who had but just arrived in China, remarking that they found no women in the streets, when, perhaps, a third of all they met were the tawny, toiling, noisy daughters of China. In all ranks of society the hair of the women of China is always beautiful; it is always black, glossy, and luxuriant, arranged with taste and beauty, adorned with flowers, or often put up in the shape of their favorite but fabulous bird—the Chinese phoenix—a long fold of rich, dark hair, reaching out behind the head, representing the large tail of the bird, with two others extending from the sides of the head, representing its expanded wings, while another cluster gracefully bends over the forepart of the head, terminated by a light metallic appendage, representing the bird's bill, which rests upon the forehead. In scarcely any grade of society is this beautiful ornament of the head found disheveled or neglected.

Nor can the worst of usage, nor the deepest degradation, entirely crush out of the hearts of these humbler daughters of China all womanly feeling, and they are still found to possess some of the gentler affections, and capable of being reached and affected by kindness and sympathy. Some have been gathered, by the missionaries, from the lowest walks of society, and, after being introduced into their families, and made to realize—what is almost a new idea to them—that, after all, there are such things in the world as gentleness, kindness, and affection, the cords of womanly feeling have been touched in their hearts, and they have been awakened into a sort of new life, manifesting the kindness, the faithfulness, and the devotion which can probably never be entirely obliterated from woman's heart. Two or three instances of this kind are now vividly before my mind, and I remember, with the most grateful feelings, many instances of the affectionate kindness of one of these daughters of China.

"The Chinese lady, in the better classes," says Mrs. Bridgman, in her excellent little book, "The Daughters of China," "is not without attractions; she is generally bland and courteous in her manners; her toilet is often arranged with taste and beauty, though her decorations are usually profuse and gaudy. Her dress is well adapted to the season. In the heat of summer, her attire is simply grass-cloth; as the weather becomes cool, this is exchanged for silk and other richly embroidered materials.

"The whole Chinese system of ethics requires females to be so secluded that their opportunities of intercourse with foreign ladies are few; when they do meet them, however, their address is singularly confiding and affectionate, and they enter into conversation with sprightliness and vivacity. But what do they talk about? Your age, the numbers of your children, your ornaments, the style of your dress, and your large feet. Examine the countenance of the Chinese; the features are regular, and, though there are peculiarities which mark the race, such as the obliquity of the eyes, flat nose, tawny skin, and, when uneducated, a certain inane expression common to both sexes; yet when the Chinese lady is favored with an interchange of sympathies with one of her own sex from another country, there is light in her eye and joy in her heart; it is not the flash of a bright and highly cultivated intellect; for, alas! she is not considered worth the pains, time, and money, of being taught to read; but the women of China have souls, and there are deep fountains there, sending out, as far as their situation admits, streams of maternal and sisterly affection; and there are fountains of evil, too, and the courses that issue from them are broad and deep. Ungovernable temper often spreads discord in the domestic circle, and the strong folds of idolatrous superstition bind her tender offspring by an oath of perpetual fidelity to the altars of false deities."

Much attention is paid by the females of China to dress, and their outward adornments are always fully up to the measure of their pecuniary ability. The dress, in all ranks of society, is strikingly modest, concealing all parts of the person except the face. This, with the head, is usually left uncovered. No hats are worn by the ladies, as these would interfere with the beautiful arrangement of their glossy hair, and their place is supplied with flowers, both natural and artificial, tastefully set. Along with these, among the wealthy, may often be seen pearls and other rich and gaudy ornaments. An interesting element in the Chinese character is their fondness for flowers, and in this their females largely participate. Every little boat that floats upon the water will have at least one flower-pot, and as many more as can be afforded; and every hut, however dark and dismal it may be, will have something green and beautiful about it. The poorest boatwoman and the toiling daughter of the field, as well as the high and wealthy, will have a flower to adorn their heads, and nearly every little shop, as well as the rich store-room, will have some pots of green and flourishing plants. Chrysanthems, camellias, lilies, polianthes, magnolias, oleanders, azaleas, orange-flowers, and the blossoms of early spring, are universal favorites, and the magnificent lotus is looked upon with the profoundest admiration, if not, indeed, with idolatrous veneration. This is a pleasing, and, we think, a promising trait in the character of the Chinese female; we have hope in the heart, though it may be hardened by the folds of heathenism, in which there is a love for the beautiful, and particularly for the softer and gentler beauties which God has made in the flowers.

The dress of the poorer females is usually made of grass-cloth or cotton, black among the laborers, and usually light blue, bordered with pink, among those of indoor occupations. Among the higher class, we find grass-cloth, silk, crape, etc., ornamented and embroidered. The dress is made tight about the throat, with large sleeves, sometimes exposing the hands and wrists, strung with bracelets made of shell, precious stones, gold, or silver. Underneath this outside dress or tunic is, among the wealthy, a richly embroidered skirt, extending nearly to the feet, from which appear below the embroidered pantalettes, nearly concealing the tiny feet which can not be dispensed with in the Chinese lady. When or how this cruel custom of compressing the feet originated, it is probably now impossible to determine; but at the present day it prevails throughout the empire, and is the mark of the Chinese lady, and indispensable to a suitable betrothal. Betrothal takes place very early in life, and a little girl whose feet are permitted to attain the usual size, would not be chosen as the first or principal wife, and could not be introduced into any of the higher classes of society, except by being purchased as the second, third, or fourth wife of some mandarin or wealthy merchant, who would like her handsome face to ornament his miniature harem. Females who have been saved from the tortures of this compression can thus only expect a life of toil or degradation, and they find their homes upon the water, or in the fields, or as bearers of burdens in the close and filthy streets, or as the subordinate inmates of some rich man's "inner apartments." For these reasons, the custom prevails extensively in all parts of the country and in all ranks of society—the poorest family striving to secure the honor and the advantages of having at least one small-footed lady. The process of compression is usually commenced at about the fourth year of age, and is done by bandaging the feet closely with strong muslin rollers, and must be an extremely painful process, as the cries of the young sufferers during its first stages are every-where heard. It results in a miserable deformity of the feet, which renders them almost useless as organs of locomotion. The gentlemen of China appear to be very warm in their admiration of these little, deformed appendages of the ladies, speaking of them often in conversation, praising them in poetry, and contrasting them with the large feet of foreign ladies, which they suppose to detract greatly from what they are willing to acknowledge, the surpassing beauty of their faces and persons, and the elegance of their manners.

These "waving willows," as they poetically call them, may often be seen in the lower walks of life, tottering along in the street, supporting themselves by one or two sticks, or resting on the shoulder of a little boy or girl. They are rendered unfit for any laborious employment; but in poor families it is often necessary for them to do a large amount of outdoor as well as indoor labor, and they frequently display considerable ingenuity in devising ways and means to accomplish their object without the use of their feet.

"OUR FREDDIE STILL."

BY MRS. E. T. EBERLEIN.

SHALL we not watch for him when morning breaks,
And when night's gloomy shadows pass away;
Will not his beauteous eyes and sunny face
Come with the day?

Shall we not see him at the hour of noon,
When his fond father from his work shall come,
Whom he was wont, with happy feet, to speed
To welcome home?

O, when the night comes stealing on, and folds
Her sable robes around the weary earth,
And when the cricket's chirping voice is heard
On the lone hearth—

Shall we not see him in the old arm-chair,
Watching, half fearfully, the shadows creep,
On the dim walls, or gently in our arms
Fold him to sleep?

He is not there—not there, nor any where
That mortals with frail footsteps e'er have trod;
For thou hast called the gentle spirit home
To thee, our God.

There, when our pilgrimage on earth is done,
And we have meekly borne thy righteous will,
May we not clasp him to our yearning hearts—
Our Freddie still?

THE FALLEN SOLDIER.

BY MRS. M. A. RICKLOW.

"My heart bled within me when I gazed on young H., where he lay in all the pale beauty of death. He was to have been married, the week following, to an accomplished lady; but such was his great zeal to serve his country, that he became a volunteer in our camp, and met his death the following morning. On opening his vest, we found a likeness of the beautiful Miss ———. The back of the portrait was stained with his blood."—LIFE OF MARION.

WHERE his country's banner sweeps,
On the field of war he sleeps,
With his eyelids, darkly fringed,
By the breath of cannon singed;
And you see the crimson blood,
Where the youthful hero stood.

Warrior! in the furious strife,
In the weary ebb of life,
What could solace thy young heart,
Making Death's a pointless dart?
Could thy love of country stay,
While thy life-stream ebbed away?

Soldier! here, what hast thou pressed
Closely to thy cold, still breast?
'Tis a maiden's pledge of truth,
Beaming with the air of youth;
Smiling in the dreadful fray,
Where the dead and dying lay.

Often didst thou fondly gaze
On that sweetly pictured face;
Dreaming of a conquered peace,
When the gory fight should cease,
And thy happy country, free,
Should give back thy bride to thee.

But thy hopes are withered now;
Death has chilled thy noble brow;
And the maiden long shall wait,
Tearful and disconsolate;
For her warm heart followed thee,
Struggling here for liberty.

Long that maiden dreamed of bliss—
Dreamed of coming happiness;
But her hopes are lost in night;
Thou hast fallen in the fight,
And thy garments, soiled and torn,
Stiff with clotted gore are grown.

Where the dewy morning weeps,
There the maiden's lover sleeps,
There is sinking to decay,
There may be the vulture's prey;
But he did not die unblest,
With that image on his breast.

WHITE as a white sail on a dusky sea,
When half the horizon's clouded and half free,
Fluttering between the dun wave and the sky,
Is Hope's last gleam in man's extremity.

THOUGHTS ON DEATH AND LIFE.

BY REV. A. D. FIELD.

"There, when the turmoil is no more,
And all our powers decay,
Our cold remains in solitude
Shall sleep the years away.

Yet not thus buried or extinct
The vital spark shall lie,
Far o'er life's wreck that spark shall rise,
To seek its kindred sky.

These ashes, too, this little dust
Our Father's care shall keep Till the last trumpet sound, and break
The long and dreary sleep."—H. K. WHITT.

READER, shrink not away because I have named to you a doleful subject; for perchance even out of this there may come sweetness for thee.

Why is it we start back so much appalled when we look into the grave? Too much of our fear comes from a wrong view of the matter. We are too apt to look upon Death as the great destroyer, and to shrink from his presence as from a foe. But Death is not a destroyer; death is not an extinguishment. The grave does not swallow up all there is of the loved ones. No! death is only a departure; and as the immortal spirit takes its flight, the clay habitation falls back to earth. The player, behind the scenes, dresses and paints for the coming acting; when the curtain rises, he enters into the scenes for which he has been preparing. Life is the fitting time, and death is only the hoisting of the curtain that lets us on the stage to act in the eternal scenes forever. The cold sweating of death is only, as it were, the cold drippings of the waters of Jordan, as we pass over to the promised land.

Look ye at yonder ship, as she comes, like a distant bird, over the waters. She heaves in sight; she comes up; she passes by; she goes beyond the horizon, and disappears from our view. But is she lost? When she went out of sight, did she sink overwhelmed in the waves? No, no. She has only gone on to her destined port. Thus the dear child comes into the family circle. For awhile its prattle is heard; for awhile its beaming face greets the delighted household—and then it disappears; it goes away from the sight. No more—ah! no more—shall it be there! But is it annihilated? Is it laid away, perished forever, in an eternal sleep? No! Parent, weeping over the tomb with anguish, no! Like the disappearing ship, it has only gone on to its heavenly destination. You saw it for awhile; but it could not tarry; the angels have taken it away. And, perchance, those heavenly symphonies that break upon your ear in dreams of the night-time are notes swelling out from the harps of the redeemed ones, among whom your little one tunes a harp before the throne of the Lamb. Yes; the little Roscoes, and Myras, and Henrys, and Marys, that are lost from the home circles, are to-day sweeping each a harp in the blessed land. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

"Not lost; but heaven has one angel more;
Not lost; but gone before?"

To be sure, there is a seeming death of the body; but is the body the person? Cut off my limbs—ay, flay the flesh from my bones—and you do not destroy me. You have only been hewing down my habitation. I, the immortal—I still live. You bury my arm; it is not me. You bury my whole body; it is not me. The laying of my body in the grave is only burying all my body, instead of a limb; I still live on. Let a driving wind blow down the house in which I live, and it leaves me still living. To be sure, the place of my habitation is crumbled to pieces; but yet I am alive, though miles away. So when we lay the bodies of the loved ones of the heart in the grave, it is only laying away the clay tenement now no longer habited; the loved one is gone away, and lives on in better than earthly mansions.

"Then weep not for Mary,
Though she is no more,
Her voice is now mingling
With saints on the shore.

O, weep not for Myra;
For near the bright throne,
She sweepeth the harp-strings
That now are her own.

O, weep not for Beatie;
Though laid in the tomb,
She liveth in glory,
And beckons thee home."

But though, when we think of the gone ones, we think of them as in heaven, yet the heart often turns to the grave. There is a love that lingers around the tomb, though we look upon the loved ones as gone to mansions of light. We cling, with fond regret, to the dear relics that lie crumbling to dust in the ground. While we look to heaven, we love to do so from the graves of the dead. This is not a feeling that needs to be smothered. Well may the heart of a fond mourner weep over the grave.

When we leave olden homes and go to new lands, we love to think of all that is past. When we revisit the old places, how dear are the houses where we have lived!—how dear the old school grounds where we have spent our youth! Above all, how sacred the old churches, with their altars, where we have so often kneeled! Our home is in a far land; but how fondly the heart lingers around the dear remains of scenes that gave us joy in days gone by! It is thus respecting the dead. We can believe our little Willie lives in heaven; but we are so apt to lose the spiritual in looking at the material, we can hardly think of him only as connected with the frail body we laid in the grave. We remember the prattle of his tongue. We remember the sparkling of his eye, the curling of his auburn locks; and no wonder we love to linger around the dear earth that incloses his mortal remains.

We watch, with anxious solicitude, the fate of those old church walls; and who shall say we may not think of the destiny of the crumbled body of the one we loved so well? Then often, and fitting, is the thought that comes up, Shall we see Willie again as he was?

Here our hearts may take comfort. The crumbling clay shall be resuscitated. But how are the dead raised up? God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. "Behold, I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep; but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for this corruptible must put on incorruption; and this mortal must put on immortality." Death is swallowed up in victory!

"There, there we shall sleep, but not always remain;
We look for the coming of Jesus again."

The grave has been crying out for victims these thousand years. The low wail of the mourners that go about the streets has long sounded upon the evening air. But shall this cry resound forever? No, no! We are awaiting a voice mightier than that of the grave, that shall drown out the dull tolling of the funeral knell.

But how can the resurrection be? "Should it be thought a thing impossible that God should raise the dead?" Ay, God is to do it. Were it said that man was to do it, or even an angel, we might linger in despair; but God is to do it!

"An angel's arm can't snatch us from the grave, But millions of angels can't confine us there."

"Arrayed in glorious grace,
Shall these vile bodies shine,
And every shape and every face
Be heavenly and divine."

ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON said that he loved a life divided between ascending up to heaven to procure blessings, and descending to diffuse them upon earth.

THE PILGRIMS.

BY REV. ALBION FELLOWS.

MANY years ago there lived in England a very strange people called the Puritans. Their manners and customs were, in some respects, absurdly rigid. They were intolerant and austere; and yet they were a high-minded and noble people. They bowed meekly before the Lord of heaven, but looked down with contempt upon princes, and nobles, and kings, and refused to pay them homage. When persecution came upon them they had no fear of death. They arose to their own rescue, girt on the sword, went out to battle, and spread terror through the ranks of the enemy.

Wearied, at length, with unceasing contention, and still determined never to submit, a part of their number resolved to leave their home, escape its oppression, which they could not endure, and suffer banishment and exile in the savage wilderness of a distant clime. It was a bold resolve. They knew that dangers were in their pathway, that the dark, heaving sea was before them, and that tempests were out, ranging the deep and howling for prey. But they called upon their God, and went down to the sea. There, rocking on the tide, they found the Mayflower, waiting to bear them from their homes forever away.

The time had now come to try their souls. For the last time they turn to look on the hills of England. Friends are there to bid them a last farewell. How touching is the parting scene! Friend looks mournfully in the face of friend, as if standing by the bedside of the dying to catch the last look of life, and hear the last sigh. And then, all kneeling down, their tears bedew the sandy beach, while their hearts are uplifted with the fervent prayer that Heaven would keep them till death, and bring them together again when the trump of the angel shall sound. They embrace once more, and then embarking, the little ship, with its precious freight, moves slowly from the shore. With tearful eyes, those that remain upon the shore gaze anxiously upon the vessel till the white sails appear like a speck against the bending sky; and on the Mayflower eyes grow dim with looking back, and will not turn from the lingering gaze till the last hill sinks down and is lost behind the waves.

The Pilgrims are out on the deep. They know their peril, and trust in Him who holds the winds in his fists and calms the roaring tide. Storms arise and threaten; but the hand of Providence here. The tempest thunders by, and the trusting pilgrim-band is safe. Weeks roll away, and the little bark, shaken and tossed on Atlantic's stormy waves, is nearing New England's shores. The pious voyagers, arising from their morning devotions, and beholding, for the first time, the land of their exile, bow down again and give thanks to the God who has kept them from the ocean's wide grave.

The Pilgrims rejoiced, when they stepped on the rock of Plymouth, that they were beyond the reach of oppression's cruel power. They had already suffered much, and were well aware they had more to endure; but they were not disheartened. They still held fast their integrity, and worshiped their Maker even when famine pressed them sorely; and when death came among them, the victims of the destroyer bowed submissively to the summons and the stroke, while the survivors looked up to Heaven through their tears, and still gave thanks and sang praises.

Thus lived and died the bold Pilgrims who braved the perils of the deep and the dangers of a savage wilderness, who endured winter's cold and the lack of bread, that they might live before their God with a conscience untrammelled, and leave the world with a spirit unfettered and free. And they did not pass away without fulfilling their high commission, and leaving a worthy memorial of their Christian heroism. In the freedom of speech they led the world. They laid the corner-stone of a free and happy nation, and upon the firm granite of their hills they planted the strongest pillar that has ever graced the temple of liberty.

Hallowed, thrice hallowed, be the memory of the Pilgrims! The waves that wafted their bark to the shore are still rolling and dashing upon the rocky coast; but the Pilgrims are gone.

Pierpont, one of the Pilgrim poets, speaks of his fathers mournfully, though sweetly:

"The Pilgrim fathers are at rest,
And the snow-white sail,
That they gave to the gale,
When the heavens looked dark, is gone,
As an angel's wing through an opening cloud
Is seen, and then withdrawn.
But the pilgrim spirit has not fled;
It walks in noon's broad light;
And it watches the bed
Of the glorious dead,
With the holy stars by night.
It watches the bed
Of the brave who have bled,
And shall guard this ice-bound shore,
Till the waves of the bay
Where the Mayflower lay Shall foam and freeze no more."

IMMORTALITY OUR PORTION.

BY M. MITCHELL.

HOW expanding to the mind of man is the thought that he shall live forever—that his spirit's life shall outlast the mighty monuments of time, and live after the last page shall have been written in the annals of the world! There is grandeur and sublimity in the thought. All things else may die; but our souls shall live forever. All things else may lose their grace and beauty; but our spirits, lovely even in ruins, shall retain their loveliness, and, rising o'er the wreck of worlds, never know the pangs of death. While contemplating it, man's brightest hopes grow brighter, his purest aspirations purer, and his entire being feels as if it had advanced one step farther in its upward course, and reached a point from which more extended views greet the eye, and fairer objects are seen. It is an elevating, an ennobling idea—one worthy the meditation of beings made a "little lower than the angels;" for it softens the asperities of life, sweetens its bitterest cups, and, when the darkness of the grave gathers around man's pillow, cheers him onward. Yes; immortality is the soul's birthright. Our spirits are children of the Deity, breathed by him into the nostrils of men, and, partaking thus of his own immortal nature, must live forever. God has declared it. His word is truth. Other proofs, too, exist, which strongly demonstrate its certainty. How otherwise can we consider that belief which pervades the hearts and consciences of universal man? Visit whatsoever tribe, language, or nation we may, deep in their beings will we find implanted the consciousness of immortality. Go, tell him whose dwelling is near by the rushings of the lordly Niger, that life is but a dream, and the "grave its goal," and how soon will his bosom swell, and his eye reveal the throbbings of the inner man, as he points you upward, and adds his testimony to that already collected, that man's soul shall live forever! Whisper to the child of the north, "in mournful numbers," that earth is man's only home, and the future but a blank, and how soon, from the hidden springs of his being, will gush up the stout denial, and from his tongue words of purer accent fall, teaching that grander, holier, healthier doctrine, immortality our portion! Thus we will find it all o'er and o'er the world, up on the hills and down in the valleys, out on the verdant plains and in the deep forests, by the side of babbling brooks and on the shores of roaring oceans. Wherever, in short, man is found, there will appear truths innumerable, unmistakably declaring that the soul is immortal, and earth but its probation home. They speak forth in full strength and power; and, when rightly apprehended, strike a death-blow at the illusory systems men have devised for their own pleasing. Alas, that man should trust to reason's glimmering ray—

"Dim as the borrowed beams of moon and stars
To lonely, weary, wandering travelers!"

To comprehend the idea of immortality, in its fullest extent, is beyond the capacity of finite minds. It is too boundless, too immeasurable. To gain even a partial conception of it requires all the intellectual energy we can summon. "World by world shall drop mellowed off the wrinkling stalk of time," and the lights of the universe grow dim; but our souls shall wane not, neither become faint nor weary. The stars which decorate the dome of the skies, "the hollow of God's hand," shall cease to revolve in their orbits, and be numbered among the things that were; but man shall live, and feel an impulse urging him on forever. Earth, too, shall be shaken from her axis, and her revolutions never more usher in the "uprisen sun, God's lidless eye;" but our souls shall see Him as he is, and live forever. The universe itself, that great cathedral,

"Whose quenchless lamps, the sun and moon supply;
Whose choir's the winds and waves; whose organ, thunder;

Whose dome the sky!"

shall hear its death-knell tolled and requiem sung; but man, child of heaven, shall live forever; and, if obedient to his Creator's will, forever chant glad anthems around the throne of the great I Am.

A happy immortality! How it thrills my soul and bears my spirit upward! Let life's sorrows be my portion, and her stormy waves beat wildly against my light, frail bark, what care I? Onward, upon the breast of the heaving billows, is my course, and the port of heaven the port in view. The Bible is my chart to guide me onward; and yours, too, gentle reader. Obey its dictates, and your path through life will be strewn with the most fragrant of flowers. Listen to its teachings, and you shall be happy. Be good, be god-like, and be true, and it shall be yours to hear, when the grave-blossoms drop from the brow of old Time, the glad voice—

"Awake from death—awake, and live with God."

THE YOUNG DEPARTED.

BY JOHN OCKELTREE, M. D.

Joy that the heart hath cherished
Never, never die;
Buds that on earth have perished
Blossom in the sky.
Death hath no power to sever
Golden links of thought—
Links that stretch upward ever,
Links in that chain that never
Rust of earth hath caught.
Gems that are brightest, rarest,
Cumber not the earth;
All that is purest, fairest,
Have the "second birth."
Ere the first stain of sorrow
Spots the sinless brow.
O, it is sweet to borrow Faith from that far-off morrow,
Breaking on us now.
Where dwell the young departed—
They of unripe years?
Who bade farewell, ere started
Care's petrifying tears?
Not where the grass is growing
Greenly on the sod;
But where Life's stream is flowing;
Where soft airs of heaven are blowing,
Round the throne of God.

REMINISCENCE OF JOHN WESLEY.

ONCE I went with him in his carriage into Bristol, and heard him preach from Eph. v, 8: "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of light." It was the only opportunity I ever had of hearing this truly apostolical man. The whole scene was very picturesque and striking. Several preachers stood in the large pulpit around him; the sermon was short, the language terse and good, but entirely devoid of expansion and imagery, while the delivery was low and unanimated. This surprised me. Was it the influence and effect of age? If it was originally the same, how came he to be so popular among the rude multitudes which always attended him, and so hung upon his lips? Whitefield's voice and vehemence, and strong emotions, will, in some measure, account for the impressions he produced, even regardless of the grace of God which accompanied them. How popular and useful was Berridge! yet he had nothing of the vulgar orator in his manner; it was plain and unimpassioned. This was the case also with many of the original corps of evangelists.—Autobiography of Rev. William Jay.

TRAINING A CHILD—A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

WE have a friend, somewhat advanced in life, who has that best certificate of ability in a mother; namely, a most exemplary family; and we are often greatly interested in hearing her tell anecdotes of her experience in bringing them up. Some of these are too good to be lost, and for the benefit of our lady readers we repeat one.

When our friend was yet a young mother, she had two daughters, one less than two years older than the other. The eldest, Julia, was a petite beauty, very delicately formed, with regular features, clear complexion, and bright golden ringlets. The second, Helen, was of larger growth, more childlike, with less of the statuary perfection of form and features, a paler cheek, and straight hair, which obstinately refused to be curled. Her principal beauty was the lovelight in her serious, contemplative face, which was not so obvious to strangers. The children were so nearly of one size, and so constantly dressed alike, that they were thought to be twins; but the younger was comparatively unnoticed. They were constantly together, while visitors at home and strangers abroad were daily or hourly exclaiming, "O, what a beautiful child!" what "lovely hair!" when looking at the elder sister. One day, after some ladies had passed out who had been very lavish of expressions of admiration for the golden curls, the little Helen came up to her mother's side and with an unshed tear in her eye looked up and asked, "Mother, is not Helen's hair pretty too?"

This was a revelation to the mother, and taking her up she caressed the unpraised hair, and said how beautiful it was for mother, and how mother loved Julia and Helen both alike, and how dear they were to her. But experience had taught her that she could not prevent strangers admiring and caressing the one child, while they passed the other unnoticed, and thus make the one vain and the other sad. So, after a severe mental struggle, she resolved to sacrifice the external beauty of the elder to preserve her spiritual loveliness, and in half an hour Julia's golden curls, and Helen's straight tresses, were lying side by side in a paper envelop. In speaking of it, she said, "O, it did appear so hard to cut off those curls, for I had been so proud of them; but when it was done there was little difference in the children's appearance, and people took but little notice of them."

At the age of three years little Helen was beautiful in her shroud, and at thirty Julia wears her curls with a different grace and humility from what she would have done had she never so lost them.

TALKING TO THE FLOWERS.

BY W. S. PETERSON.

SITTING in the door-yard grassy,
Is a little blue-eyed lassie,
Talking to a flower;
And her cherub voice is ringing,
Half a laughing, half a singing,
Hour after hour.

Don't her azure eyes look funny,
Peeping through the ringlets sunny,
O'er her forehead falling!
Now a little bird comes near her,
And her tones grow louder, clearer,
To the songster calling.

I can scarcely other deem her
Than a little fairy dreamer,
Really unreal;
For she is a lovelier being
Than the poet's eyes e'er see in Fancy's bright ideal.

Frowning maids of doubtful ages,
And better-halfless sages,
Will call it folly, may be,
Thus to be soliloquizing,
And gravely poetizing
Just about a baby;

But, to me, there's not a creature
Of lovelier form and feature
In this world of ours,
Than a little laughing lassie,
Sitting in the door-yard grassy,
Talking to the flowers.

THE MOTHER TO HER DEAD CHILD.

BY JAMES FUMMILL.

Rest, quiet slumberer, thy pain is past;
Pale sickness can not harm thee more, my child:
A spirit pure, and free, and undefiled,
Among the angel bands thy lot is cast.

O, when I saw thee die—lone, solemn hour!—
The pall of silence falling on thy face,
As falls cold twilight on the flower space—
Then felt I darkness on my spirit low'r!

What was the world to me, my angel blest,
When, in thy little coffin, sweet and still,
They bore thee from me to the church-yard
chill,
And laid thee down, in dewy spring, to rest!

When I surveyed our garden walks at even,
And missed thy gladsome laugh and sparkling eye,

I wept; but, looking on the peaceful sky,
Smiled through my tears to think thy soul in heaven!

TRUTH AND POETRY.

BY W. H. BARNES.

WHO can explain the strange whims and caprices of the public mind? The thoughts and ideas which come and go through the popular brain are not governed by the ordinary laws of association. Realities which have been married ever since time began, suffer a strange divorcement when they pass through the great cerebrum. For instance, the world has long thought that Poetry and Truth were deadly enemies; yet there are no friends in the universe more true-hearted than they.

Truth lived in the bosom of God before he had made one visible creation. When the first thing of beauty came from his hand, Poetry was born. God saw her fit for companionship with Truth, and joined them together. Since then they have walked forth together, blessing with their presence heaven and earth, and all the stars. The coming of every beautiful creation has strengthened the ties which bind Poetry and Truth. "Whom God hath joined together let not man put asunder."

The true poet is the great apostle of truth. He speaks silver-toned words which the world delights to hear, and those words bear the burden of reality. Many such poets the world has not seen; but at their coming they shed a fadeless renown upon the ages in which they lived. Falsehood is the language which the coward speaks; but the poet is not a coward. He stands up before his own and all coming ages, and speaks what his heart prompts him, recking not whether the world frowns or shakes its sides with laughter.

In the progress of Truth and Poetry over the earth they are sometimes seen side by side in the same pathway, and all speak blessings on them as they pass. But very often men hear the silvery voice of Poetry, but their dull, earthly eyes fail to see her silent sister walking by her side. Sometimes the golden cord which unites them is concealed by the gorgeous drapery, yet we doubt not that they still walk forth in company.

Every observer has seen many traces of their union in the great highways of literature; let us wander into the by-paths and point out some of the spots that have been visibly hallowed by their united footsteps. We do not search long in vain; for here in an every-day volume before us we find the sweetest poetry and truth, deep-laid in human nature, joined to describe the feelings and illusions of the watcher by the death-couch of a loved one:

"We watched her breathing through the night—
Her breathing soft and low—

As in her breast the wave of life
Kept heaving to and fro.
Our very hopes belied our fears,
Our fears our hopes belied;
We thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died."

Those who have seen a loved one die can feel that Truth is here as well as Poetry. How often, through the night, did the fear come upon you that she was dying, but you bent over her and found that she was sleeping sweetly! After a while the pale features seem so smiling and beautiful that you think she has wandered away from the sick bed in a pleasant dream. But the heart beats no more, the wave of life is still, the one you loved is dead.

A little way further the two are united to teach us a lesson on intolerance. Here Truth, which sometimes seems to occupy the back-ground, assumes even the more prominent position.

"Consider, then, before, like Harlothrumbó,
You aim your club at any creed on earth,
That by the simple accident of birth
You might have been high-priest to Mumbo Jumbo."

Here the beautiful sisters, though clad in a homely garb, join their voices to recommend that charity which suffers long and is kind. When Poetry and Truth unite themselves against an evil, it withers beneath their mysterious touch. How unmanly does that bigot appear who would

"Rush at a benighted man,
And give him two black eyes for being blind!"

We always feel grateful to the poet, who, by a hint whispered to us in solitude, starts a deep fountain of thought and feeling in the heart. Poetry alone may appear upon the printed page, but Truth makes her appearance in the soul, and there lingers long, speaking words, pleasant to be heard. A poet has humorously described his mission:

"To patch with song
The ragged mantle of the beggar earth."

There is more of truth in these quaint words than is expressed. This is indeed a "beggar earth," ever making demands and continually uttering petitions in the ears of mortals. An inordinate "love of the world" is thought to be man's peculiar attribute; he should now manifest it by his actions. Let the orator speak words of consolation and hope; let the miser give of his hoarded gold; let all men bring their brightest talents and apply them to the benefit of the mendicant; let every profession and occupation work with manliness in their several spheres, and the world will soon be beyond the reach of penury and want. Her face, now care-worn and haggard, will then be bright and beautiful. Her vestments, now torn and worn by six thousand years of storm, will be exchanged for robes of royalty. Her neglected fields, which now produce thorns and briars, will be as the "garden of the Lord."

But we have strayed from the ancient landmarks of literature farther than we intended. If, in our discursive wanderings, we have learned a good lesson, let us remember it; and whenever, in the future, we see Truth and Poetry together, let us welcome them to our hearts.

TRAITS AND ANECDOTES OF THE HORSE.

THE horse is universally acknowledged to be one of the noblest members of the animal kingdom. Possessing the finest symmetry, and unincumbered by those external appendages which characterize many of the larger quadrupeds, his frame is a perfect model of elegance and concentrated energy. Highly sensitive, yet exceedingly tractable, proud, yet persevering, naturally of a roaming disposition, yet readily accommodating himself to domestic conditions, he has been one of the most valuable aids to human civilization—associating with man in all phases of his progress from the temporary tent to the permanent city.

Delighting in the river-plain and open glade, the savannas of America, the steppes of Asia, and the plains of Europe, must be regarded as his headquarters in a wild state. There is no doubt expressed, however, as to the original locality of the horse. The wild herds of America are looked upon as the descendants of Spanish breeds imported by the first conquerors of that continent; those of the Ukraine, in Europe, are said to be the progeny of Russian horses abandoned after the siege of Azoph in 1696; and even those of Tartary are regarded as coming from a more southern stock. Naturalists, therefore, look to the countries bordering on Egypt, as in all likelihood the primitive place of residence of this noble animal; and there is no doubt that the Arabian breed, when perfectly pure, presents the finest specimen of a horse in symmetry, docility, and courage. Regarding the horse as of Asiatic origin, we now find him associated with man in almost every region of the habitable globe. Like the dog, ox, sheep, and a few others of the brute creation, he seems capable of accommodating himself to very different conditions, and assumes a shaggy coat or sleek skin, a size little inferior to that of the elephant, or not larger than that of an English mastiff, just as circumstances of climate and food require.

In a state of nature, the horse loves to herd with his fellows, and droves of from four to five hundred, or even double that number, are not unfrequently seen, if the range be wide and fertile. The numbers of these vast droves are inoffensive in their habits, and when not startled or hunted, are rather playful and frolicsome; now scouring the plain in groups for mere amusement, now suddenly stopping, pawing the soil, then snorting, and off straight as an arrow, or wheeling in circles—making the ground shake with their wild merriment. It is impossible to conceive a more animated picture than a group of wild horses at play. Their fine figures are thrown into a thousand attitudes; and as they rear, curvette, dilate the nostril, paw in quivering nervousness to begin the race, or speed away with erect mane and flowing tail, they present forms of life and energy which the painter may strive in vain to imitate. They seldom shift their stations, unless compelled by failure of pasture or water; and thus they acquire a boldness and confidence in their haunts which it is rather unsafe to disturb. They never attack other animals, however, but always act upon the defensive. Having pastured, they retire either to the confines of the forest, or to some elevated portion of the plain, and recline on the sward, or hang listlessly on their legs for hours together. One or more of their number are always awake to keep watch while the rest are asleep, and to warn them of approaching danger, which is done by snorting loudly, or neighing. Upon this signal the whole troop start to their feet, and either reconnoiter the enemy, or fly off with the swiftness of the wind, followed by the sentinel and by the older stallions.

They are seldom to be taken by surprise; but if attacked, the assailant seldom comes off victorious, for the whole troop unite in defense of their comrades, and either tear him to pieces with their teeth, or kick him to death.

COURAGE.

Courage and unshrinking firmness have ever been attributes of the horse. The magnificent description given in the book of Job, must be familiar to every one: "Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper?—the glory of his strength is terrible. He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength; he goeth out to meet the armed men. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword; the quiver rattleth against him—the glittering spear and the shield. He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage; neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet. He saith among the trumpets, Ha! ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting." It is asserted that horses with a broad after-head, and the ears far asunder, are naturally bolder than those whose head is narrow above the forelock. This assertion is in all probability correct, for there is no reason why cerebral development should not influence the character of a horse as well as that of a man; but much, too, depends upon judicious training. Some, says Colonel Smith, habituated to war, will drop their head, pick at grass in the midst of fire, smoke, and the roar of cannon; others never entirely cast off their natural timidity. We have witnessed them groaning, or endeavoring to lie down when they found escape impossible, at the fearful sound of shot, shrapnell-shells, and rockets; and it was painful to witness their look of terror in battle, and to hear their groans upon being wounded. Yet many of the terrified animals, when let loose at a charge, dash forward in a kind of desperation that makes it difficult to hold them in hand; and we recollect, at a charge in 1794—when the light-dragoon horse was larger than at present, and the French were wretchedly mounted—a party of British bursting through a hostile squadron as they would have passed through a fence of rushes.

The horse, though naturally afraid of the lion, tiger, and other feline animals, has often sufficient confidence in a firm rider and his own courage to overcome this timidity, and to join in the attack. This was conspicuously evinced in the case of an Arab possessed by the late Sir Robert Gillespie, and noticed in the Naturalists' Library. Sir Robert being present on the race-course of Calcutta during one of the great Hindoo festivals, when many thousands are assembled to witness all kinds of shows, was suddenly alarmed by the shrieks and commotion of the crowd. On being informed that a tiger had escaped from his keepers, he immediately called for his horse, and grasping a boar-spear from one of the bystanders, rode to attack this formidable enemy. The tiger, probably, was amazed at finding himself in the middle of such a number of shrieking beings, flying from him in all directions; but the moment he perceived Sir Robert, he crouched in the attitude of preparing to spring at him, and that instant the gallant soldier passed his horse in a leap over the tiger's back, and struck the spear through his spine. Here, instead of swerving, the noble animal went right over his formidable enemy with a firmness that enabled the rider to use his lance with precision. This steed was a small gray, and was afterward sent home as a present to the prince regent.

M. Arnauld, in his History of Animals, relates the following incident of ferocious courage in a mule. This animal belonged to a gentleman in Florence, and became so vicious and refractory, that he not only refused to submit to any kind of labor, but actually attacked with his heels and teeth those who attempted to compel him. Wearied with such conduct, his master resolved to make away with him, by exposing him to the wild beasts in the menagerie of the grand duke. For this purpose he was first placed in the dens of the hyenas and tigers, all of whom he would have soon destroyed, had he not been speedily removed. At last he was handed over to the lion, but the mule, instead of exhibiting any symptoms of alarm, quietly receded to a corner, keeping his front opposed to his adversary. Once planted in the corner, he resolutely kept his place, eyeing every movement of the lion, which was preparing to spring upon him. The lion, however, perceiving the difficulty of an attack, practiced all his wiles to throw the mule off his guard, but in vain. At length the latter, perceiving an opportunity, made a sudden rush upon the lion, and in an instant broke several of his teeth by the stroke of his fore-feet. The "king of the animals," as he has been called, finding that he had got quite enough of the combat, slunk grumbling to his cage, and left the hardy mule master of the battle.

As may be readily supposed, the intrepidity of the horse is often of signal service in the cause of humanity, commanding at once our esteem and admiration. We know of no instance in which his assistance was so successfully rendered as in that which once occurred at the Cape of Good Hope, and which is related by M. De Pages in his "Travels Round the World." "I should have found it difficult," says he, "to give it credit, had it not happened the evening before my arrival; and if, besides the public notoriety of the fact, I had not been an eye-witness of those vehement emotions of sympathy, blended with admiration, which it had justly excited in the mind of every individual at the Cape. A violent gale of wind setting in from north north-west, a vessel in the road dragged her anchors, was forced on the rocks, and bulged; and while the greater part of the crew fell an immediate sacrifice to the waves, the remainder were seen from the shore struggling for their lives, by clinging to the different pieces of the wreck. The sea ran dreadfully high, and broke over the sailors with such amazing fury, that no boat whatever could venture off to their assistance. Meanwhile a planter, considerably advanced in life, had come from his farm to be a spectator of the shipwreck; his heart was melted at the sight of the unhappy seamen, and knowing the bold and enterprising spirit of his horse, and his particular excellence as a swimmer, he instantly determined to make a desperate effort for their deliverance. He alighted and blew a little brandy into his horse's nostrils, when again seating himself in the saddle, he instantly pushed into the midst of the breakers. At first both disappeared; but it was not long before they floated on the surface, and swam up to the wreck, when, taking with him two men, each of whom held by one of his boots, he brought them safe to shore. This perilous expedition he repeated no seldomer than seven times, and saved fourteen lives to the public; but on his return the eighth time, his horse being much fatigued, and meeting a most formidable wave, he lost his balance, and was overwhelmed in a moment. The horse swam safely to land; but his gallant rider, alas! was no more."

Occasionally there is so much sagacity and affection combined with the intrepidity of the horse, that his conduct would do credit even to the bravest human nature. Like the dog, he has been known to swim to the assistance of a drowning creature, and this without any other impulse than that of his own generous feelings. Captain Thomas Brown, in his interesting Biographical Sketches of the Horse—a work to which we are indebted for several of the facts here recorded—mentions the following gratifying incident, which proves the possession of something more than mere unreasoning instinct: A little girl, the daughter of a gentleman in Warwickshire, playing on the banks of a canal which runs through his grounds, had the misfortune to fall in, and would in all probability have been drowned, had not a small pony, which had been long kept in the family, plunged into the stream and brought the child safely ashore without the slightest injury.

ATTACHMENT TO MAN.

In submission and attachment to man, the horse is equaled only by the dog and elephant. He soon learns to distinguish his master's voice, and to come at his call; he rejoices in his presence, and seems restless and unhappy during his absence; he joins with him willingly in any work, and appears susceptible of emulation and rivalry; and though frequently fierce and dangerous to strangers, yet there are few instances on record of his being faithless to those with whom he is domesticated, unless under the most inhuman and barbarous treatment. Colonel Smith relates the following affecting incident of attachment in a charger which belonged to the late General Sir Robert Gillespie: When Sir Robert fell at the storming of Kalunga, his favorite black charger, bred at the Cape of Good Hope, and carried by him to India, was, at the sale of his effects, competed for by several officers of his division, and finally knocked down to the privates of the 8th dragoons, who contributed their prize-money, to the amount of £500 sterling, to retain this commemoration of their late commander. Thus the charger was always led at the head of the regiment on a march, and at the station of Cawnpore was usually indulged with taking his ancient post at the color stand, where the salute of passing squadrons was given at drill and on reviews. When the regiment was ordered home, the funds of the privates running low, he was bought for the same sum by a relative of ours, who provided funds and a paddock for him, where he might end his days in comfort; but when the corps had marched, and the sound of the trumpet had departed, he refused to eat, and on the first opportunity, being led out to exercise, he broke from his groom and galloping to his ancient station on the parade, after neighing aloud, dropped down and died.

The affection of the horse is sometimes displayed in joyous gambols and familiar caresses like those of the dog, though, like the man in the fable who was embraced by his ass, one would willingly dispense with such boisterous manifestations. We are informed in the Sporting Magazine, that a gentleman in Buckinghamshire had in his possession, December, 1793, a three-year-old colt, a dog, and three sheep, which were his constant attendants in all his walks. When the parlor window, which looked into the field, happened to be open, the colt had often been known to leap through it, go up to and caress his master, and then leap back to his pasture. We have ourselves often witnessed similar signs of affection on the part of an old Shetland pony, which would place its forefoot in the hand of its young master like a dog, thrust its head under his arm to be caressed, and join with him and a little terrier in all their noisy rompings on the lawn. The same animal daily bore its master to school, and though its heels and teeth were always ready for every aggressive urohin, yet so attached was it to this boy, that it would wait hours for him in his sports by the way, and even walk alone from the stable in town to the school-room, which was fully half a mile distant, and wait saddled and bridled for the afternoon's dismissal. Indeed, the young scape-grace did not deserve one-tenth of this attention, for we have often seen old "Donald" toiling homeward with him at the gallop, to make up for time squandered at taw or cricket.

Occasionally equine attachment exhibits itself in a light as exalted and creditable as that of the human mind. During the peninsular war, the trumpeter of a French cavalry corps had a fine charger assigned to him, of which he became passionately fond, and which, by gentleness of disposition and uniform docility, equally evinced its affection. The sound of the trumpeter's voice, the sight of his uniform, or the twang of his trumpet, was sufficient to throw this animal into a state of excitement; and he appeared to be pleased and happy only when under the saddle of his rider. Indeed he was unruly and useless to every body else; for once, on being removed to another part of the forces, and consigned to a young officer, he resolutely refused to perform his evolutions, and bolted straight to the trumpeter's station, and there took his stand, jostling along side his former master. This noble animal, on being restored to the trumpeter, carried him, during several of the long peninsular campaigns, through many difficulties and hair-breadth escapes. At last the corps to which he belonged was worsted, and in the confusion of retreat the trumpeter was mortally wounded. Dropping from his horse, his body was found many days after the engagement stretched on the sward, with the faithful charger standing beside it. During the long interval, it seemed that he had never quitted the trumpeter's side, but had stood sentinel over his corpse, scaring away the birds of prey, and remaining totally heedless of his own privations. When found, he was in a sadly reduced condition, partly from loss of blood through wounds, but chiefly from want of food, of which, in the excess of his grief, he could not be prevailed on to partake.

INSTANCES OF REVENGE AND OBSTINACY.

Though Providence seems to have implanted in the horse a benevolent disposition, with at the same time a certain awe of the human race, yet there are instances on record of his recollecting injuries, and fearfully revenging them. A person near Boston, in America, was in the habit, whenever he wished to catch his horse in the field, of taking a quantity of corn in a measure by way of bait. On calling to him, the horse would come up and eat the corn, while the bridle was put over his head. But the owner having deceived the animal several times, by calling him when he had no corn in the measure, the horse at length began to suspect the design; and coming up one day as usual, on being called, looked into the measure, and seeing it empty, turned round, reared on his hind-legs, and killed his master on the spot.

In the preceding instance the provocation was deceit and trickery; the poor horse, however, often receives heavier incentives to revenge. Can we blame him when he attempts it in such cases as the following? A baronet, one of whose hunters had never tired in the longest chase, once encouraged the cruel thought of attempting completely to fatigue him. After a long chase, therefore, he dined, and again mounting, rode furiously among the hills. When brought to the stable, his strength appeared exhausted, and he was scarcely able to walk. The groom, possessed of more feeling than his brutal master, could not refrain from tears at the sight of so noble an animal thus sunk down. The baronet some time after entered the stable, and the horse made a furious spring upon him; and had not the groom interfered, would soon have put it out of his power of ever again misusing his animals.

It is told of a horse belonging to an Irish nobleman, that he always became restive and furious whenever a certain individual came into his presence. One day this poor fellow happened to pass within reach, when the animal seized him with its teeth and broke his arm; it then threw him down, and lay upon him—every effort to get it off proving unavailing, till the bystanders were compelled to shoot it. The reason assigned for this ferocity was, that the man had performed a cruel operation on the animal some time before, and which it seems to have revengefully remembered.

ATTACHMENT TO OTHER ANIMALS.

Gregarious when wild, the horse retains his sociable disposition undiminished by domestication and bondage. "My neighbor's horse," says White, of Selborne, "will not only not stay by himself abroad, but he will not bear to be left alone in a strange stable without discovering the utmost impatience, and endeavoring to break the rack and manger with his fore-feet. He has been known to leap out at a stable-window, through which dung was thrown, after company; and yet in other respects he is remarkably quiet." The same disposition characterizes less or more every member of the family. Many horses, though quiet in company, will not stay one minute in a field by themselves; and yet the presence of a cow, of a goat, or a pet lamb, will perfectly satisfy them. The attachments which they thus form are often curious and inexplicable.

A gentleman of Bristol had a grayhound, which slept in the stable along with a very fine hunter of about five years of age. These animals became mutually attached, and regarded each other with the most tender affection. The grayhound always lay under the manger beside the horse, which was so fond of him, that he became unhappy and restless when the dog was out of his sight. It was a common practice with the gentleman to whom they belonged to call at the stable for the grayhound to accompany him in his walks; on such occasions the horse would look over his shoulder at the dog with much anxiety, and neigh in a manner which plainly said: "Let me also accompany you." When the dog returned to the stable, he was always welcomed by a loud neigh—he ran up to the horse and licked his nose; in return, the horse would scratch the dog's back with his teeth. One day, when the groom was out with the horse and grayhound for exercise, a large dog attacked the latter, and quickly bore him to the ground; on which the horse threw back his ears, and, in spite of all the efforts of the groom, rushed at the strange dog that was worrying at the grayhound, seized him by the back with his teeth, which speedily made him quit his hold, and shook him till a large piece of the skin gave way. The offender no sooner got on his feet, than he judged it prudent to beat a precipitate retreat from so formidable an opponent.

The following singular instance of attachment between a pony and a lamb is given by Captain Brown: "In December, 1825, Thomas Rae, blacksmith, Hardhills, parish of Brittle, purchased a lamb of the black-faced breed from an individual passing with a large flock. It was so extremely wild, that it was with great difficulty separated from its fleecy companions. He put it into his field in company with a cow and a little white Galloway. It never seemed to mind the cow, but soon exhibited manifest indications of fondness for the pony, which, not insensible to such tender approaches, amply demonstrated the attachment to be reciprocal. They were now to be seen in company in all circumstances, whether the pony was used for riding or drawing. Such a spectacle no doubt drew forth the officious gaze of many; and when likely to be too closely beset, the lamb would seek an asylum beneath the pony's belly, and pop out its head betwixt the fore or hind legs, with looks of conscious security. At night, it invariably repaired to the stable, and reposed under the manger, before the head of its favorite. When separated, which only happened when effected by force, the lamb would raise the most plaintive bleatings, and the pony responsive neighings. On one occasion they both strayed into an adjoining field, in which was a flock of sheep; the lamb joined the flock at a short distance from the pony, but as soon as the owner removed him, it quickly followed without the least regard to its own species. Another instance of the same description happened when riding through a large flock; it followed on without showing any symptoms of a wish to remain with its natural companions."

We shall close this pleasing section of the horse's history with an extract from the "Biographical Sketches," which speaks volumes for the intelligence and affection of the brute creation: "My friend, Dr. Smith, of the Queen's County Militia, Ireland, had a beautiful hackney, which, although extremely spirited, was at the same time wonderfully docile. He had also a fine Newfoundland dog, named Cæsar. These animals were mutually attached, and seemed perfectly acquainted with each other's actions. The dog was always kept in the stable at night, and universally lay beside the horse. When Dr. Smith practiced in Dublin, he visited his patients on horseback, and had no other servant to take care of the horse, while in their houses, but Cæsar, to whom he gave the reins in his mouth. The horse stood very quietly, even in that crowded city, beside his friend Cæsar. When it happened that the Doctor had a patient not far distant from the place where he paid his last visit, he did not think it worth while to remount, but called to his horse and Cæsar. They both instantly obeyed, and remained quietly opposite the door where he entered, till he came out again."

POWER OF MEMORY.

Horses have exceedingly good memories. In the darkest nights they will find their way homeward, if they have but once passed over the road; they will recognize their old masters after a lapse of many years; and those that have been in the army, though now degraded to carter's drudges, will suddenly become inspirited at the sight of military array, and rush to join the ranks, remembering not only their old uniform, but their own places in the troop, and the order of the various maneuvers. Many interesting anecdotes might be recited under this head, which place the retentive powers of the horse in a highly pleasing and creditable light.

A gentleman rode a young horse, which he had bred, thirty miles from home, and to a part of the country where he had never been before. The road was a cross one, and extremely difficult to find; however, by dint of perseverance and inquiry, he at length reached his destination.

Two years afterward, he had occasion to go the same way, and was benighted four or five miles from the end of his journey. The night was so dark that he could scarcely see the horse's head. He had a dreary moor and common to pass, and had lost all traces of the proper direction he had to take. The rain began to fall heavily. He now contemplated the uncertainty of his situation. "Here am I," said he to himself, "far from any house, and in the midst of a dreary waste, where I know not which way to direct the course of my steed. I have heard much of the memory of the horse, and in that is now my only hope." He threw the reins on the horse's neck, and encouraging him to proceed, found himself safe at the gate of his friend in less than an hour. It must be remarked, that the animal could not possibly have been that road but on the occasion two years before, as no person ever rode him but his master.

In point of sagacity and memory, the ass is nothing inferior to his nobler congener, as is shown by the subjoined well-known anecdote: In 1816, an ass belonging to Captain Dundas, then at Malta, was shipped on board the Ister frigate, bound from Gibraltar to that island. The vessel struck on a sand-bank off Cape de Gat; and the ass was thrown overboard, in the hope that it might be able to swim to land; of which, however, there seemed little chance, for the sea was running so high, that a boat which left the ship was lost. A few days after, when the gates of Gibraltar were opened in the morning, the guard was surprised by the ass presenting himself for admittance. On entering, he proceeded immediately to the stable of his former master. The poor animal had not only swam safely to shore, but, without guide, compass, or traveling map, had found his way from Cape de Gat to Gibraltar—a distance of more than two hundred miles—through a mountainous and intricate country, intersected by streams, which he had never traversed before, and in so short a period that he could not have made one false turn.

GENERAL SAGACITY AND INTELLIGENCE.

It has been before remarked, that the horse is inferior to none of the brute creation in sagacity and general intelligence. In a state of nature, he is cautious and watchful; and the manner in which the wild herds conduct their marches, station their scouts and leaders, shows how fully they comprehend the necessity of obedience and order. All their movements, indeed, seem to be the result of reason, aided by a power of communicating their ideas far superior to that of most other animals. The neighings by which they communicate terror, alarm, recognition, the discovery of water and pasture, etc., are all essentially different, yet instantaneously comprehended by every member of the herd; nay, the various movements of the body, the pawing of the ground, the motions of the ears, and the expressions of the countenance, seem to be fully understood by each other. In passing swampy ground, they test it with the fore-foot, before trusting to it the full weight of their bodies; they will strike asunder the melon-cactus to obtain its succulent juice with an address perfectly wonderful; and will scoop out a hollow in the moist sand, in the expectation of its filling with water. All this they do in their wild state; and domestication, it seems, instead of deteriorating, tends rather to strengthen and develop their intelligence.

Professor Kruger, of Halle, relates the following instance of sagacity and fidelity, which we believe is not without parallel in our own country: A friend of mine was one dark night riding home through a wood, and had the misfortune to strike his head against the branch of a tree, and fell from his horse stunned by the blow. The horse immediately returned to the house, which they had left, about a mile distant. He found the door closed, and the family gone to bed. He pawed at the door, till one of them, hearing the noise, arose and opened it, and to his surprise saw the horse of his friend. No sooner was the door opened than the horse turned round, and the man suspecting there was something wrong, followed the animal, which led him directly to the spot where his master lay on the ground in a faint.

"It is not in perils and conflicts alone that the horse willingly co-operates with his master; he likewise participates in human pleasures. He exults in the chase and the tournament; his eyes sparkle with emulation in the course. But, though bold and intrepid, he suffers not himself to be carried off by a curious ardor; he represses his movements, and knows how to govern and check the natural vivacity and fire of his temper. He not only yields to the hand, but seems to consult the inclination of the rider. Uniformly obedient to the impressions he receives, he flies or stops, and regulates his motions entirely by the will of his master. He in some measure renounces his very existence to the pleasure of man. He delivers up his whole powers; he reserves nothing; and often dies rather than disobey the mandates of his governor." The feelings of that individual are little to be envied who draws a severe lash, or urges beyond his speed or strength an animal so willing and so obedient, and whose powers have been so essential to human progress as the horse.

Scripture Cabinet.

EXPEDIENTCY OF THE SAVIOR'S DEPARTING.—"It is expedient for you that I go away."—John xvi, 7.

"It is expedient;" that is, it is better for you that I should go away. And it was not only better for them, but it was better for the whole world in all coming ages. Why? Because "if I go not away the Comforter will not come." But still it may be asked, why the presence of the Holy Spirit was more valuable to them and to the world than the presence of the Savior himself? To this it may be answered,

1. That by his departure, his death, and ascension—by having these great facts before their eyes—they would be led by the Holy Spirit to see more fully the design of his coming than they would by his presence. While he was with them, notwithstanding the plainest teaching, their minds were filled with prejudice and error. They still adhered to the expectation of a temporal kingdom, and were unwilling to believe that he was to die. When he had actually left them, they could no longer doubt on this subject, and were prepared to understand why he came. And this was done. See the Acts of the Apostles every-where. It is often needful that God should visit us with severe affliction before our pride will be humbled, and we are willing to understand the plainest truths.

2. While on earth the Lord Jesus could be bodily present but in one place at one time. Yet, in order to secure the great design of saving men, it was needful that there should be some agent who should be in all places, who could attend all ministers, and who could at the same time apply the work of Christ to men in all parts of the earth.

3. It was an evident arrangement in the great plan of redemption, that each of the persons of the Trinity should perform a part. As it was not the work of the Spirit to make an atonement, so it was not the work of the Savior to apply it. And till the Lord Jesus had performed his great work, it was not proper, the way was not open, for the Holy Spirit to descend to perform his part of the great plan. Yet, when the Savior had completed his portion of the work, and had left the earth, the Spirit would carry forward the same plan, and apply it to men.

4. It was to be expected that far more signal success would attend the preaching of the Gospel when the atonement was actually made, than before. It was the office of the Spirit to carry forward the work only when the Savior had died and had ascended. And this was actually the case. See Acts ii. Hence it was expedient that the Lord Jesus should go away that the Spirit might descend and apply the work to the children of men. Yet the departure of the Lord Jesus was to the apostles a source of deep affliction. But had they seen the whole case, they would not have been thus afflicted. So God often takes away from us one blessing that he may bestow a greater. All affliction, if received in a proper manner, is of this description. And could the afflicted people of God always see the whole case as God sees it, they would think and feel as he does, that it was best for them to be thus afflicted.

VOL. XV.—4

I MUST WALK WITH GOD.—I must walk with God. In some way or other, whatever be my character or profession, I must acquire the holy habit of connecting every thing that passes in my house and affairs with God. If sickness or health visit my family, my eye must see and my heart must acknowledge the hand of God therein. Whether my affairs move on smoothly or ruggedly, God must be acknowledged in them. If I go out of my house or come into it, I must go out and come in as under the eye of God. If I am occupied in business all day long, I must still have the glory of God in my view. If I have any affair to transact with another, I must pray that God would be with us in that affair, lest we should blunder, and injure and ruin each other.

WHAT RELIGION IS.—Whatever definitions men have given of religion, I can find none so accurately descriptive of it as this—that it is such a belief of the Bible as maintains a living influence on the heart. Men may speculate, criticise, admire, dispute about, doubt, or believe the Bible; but the religious man is such because he so believes it, as to carry a practical sense of its truths on his mind.

THE BIBLE A GARDEN.—The Bible resembles an extensive and highly-cultivated garden, where there is a vast variety and profusion of fruits and flowers: some of which are more essential or more splendid than others; but there is not a blade suffered to grow in it, which has not its use and beauty in the system. Salvation for sinners is the grand truth presented every-where, and in all points of light; but the pure in heart sees a thousand traits of the Divine character, of himself, and of the world—some striking and bold, others cast as it were into the shade, and designed to be searched for and examined—some direct, others by way of intimation or inference.

THE ANCHOR OF THE SOUL.—"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast."—Heb. vi, 19.

The anchor of every true Christian was cast in the same foundry with that of Paul. And we should not lose confidence in our anchor when we feel the soul to be rocked with the storms of life.

A ship at anchor is quite a different thing from a ship fastened up in a dry dock. And a vessel at anchor is often more disturbed by the winds and the waves, than one that is left to ride at will over the billows; just as the person careless of right is less disquieted than the one who is striving to conform his conduct to the perfect rule of right.

FEELING AFTER GOD.—"If haply they might feel after God."—Acts xvii, 27.

Perhaps nothing can give us so strong an idea of the rich treasure we have in the Bible, as to enter into the thoughts, and reflections, and faith—if faith they can have—of those whose understandings have never been illuminated by this ray of heavenly light.

The following relation of the reflections of a heathen, as given to a missionary to whom he had listened while preaching the Gospel, we take from the New York Observer:

"Your views, O white man, are just what I wanted and sought for before I knew you. Twelve years ago I went, in a cloudy season, to feed my flock along the Tlotse, among the Malutis. Seated upon a rock, in sight of my sheep, I asked myself sad questions; yes, sad, because I could not answer them. The stars, said I—who touched them with his hand? on what pillars do they rest? The waters are not weary; they run without ceasing, at night and morning alike; but where do they stop? or who makes them run thus? The clouds also go, return, and fall in water to the earth. Whence do they arise? Who sends them? It is surely not the Barokas—rain-makers—who gave us the rain, for how could they make it? The wind—what is it? Who brings it, or takes it away, makes it blow, and roar, and frighten us? Do I know how the corn grows? Yesterday there was not a blade to be seen in my field. To day I return and find something. It is very small; I can scarcely see it, but it will grow up like to a young man. Who can have given the ground wisdom and power to produce it? Then I buried my forehead in my hands. Again, I thought within myself, and I said, we all depart, but this country remains; it alone remains, for we all go away. But whither do we go? My heart answered, perhaps other men live under the earth, and we shall go to them. But another thought arose against it, and said, these other men under the earth, whence come they? Then my heart did not know what more to think. It wandered. Then my heart rose and spoke to me, saying, All men do much evil, and thou, thou also, hast done much evil. Woe to thee! I recalled many wrongs which I had done to others, and because of them my conscience gnawed me in secret, as I sat alone on the rock. I say, I was afraid. I got up, and ran after my sheep, trying to enliven myself; but I trembled much."

DRINKING THE DUST OF THE GOLDEN CALF; OR, THE DEBASEMENT OF IDOLATRY.—"And he [Moses] took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strewn it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it."—Exodus xxxii, 20.

What, we may be asked, did Moses design by the strange action described in this text? Just to show the Israelites how deeply they had debased themselves in worshiping as a god a thing which might be swallowed with their food, and afterward cast out into the draught. This is the debasement to which every one, receiving the consecrated wafer at the hands of a Romish priest, subjects himself. He swallows down into his stomach the very thing which, a few moments before, he worshiped as a god.

"DINNA GANG THE SAME WAY."—The Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, formerly President of Princeton College, was once on board a packet ship, where, among other passengers, was a professed Atheist. The unhappy man was very fond of troubling every one with his peculiar belief, and broaching the subject as often as he could get any one to listen to him. He did not believe in a God and a future state—not he! By and by there came on a terrible storm, and the prospect was that all would be drowned. There was much consternation on board, but no one was so frightened as the professed Atheist. In this extremity he sought out the clergyman, and found him in the cabin, calm and collected, in the midst of danger, and thus addressed him: "O, Dr. Witherspoon! Dr. Witherspoon! we're all going; we have but a short time to stay. O, how the vessel rocks! We're all going; don't you think we are?" The Doctor turned to him with a solemn look, and replied in broad Scotch, "Nae doubt, nae doubt, mon; we're a' ganging; but you and I dinna gang the same way." The poor man was speechless; and the worthy Doctor, who had not said much before, then took the opportunity of setting before him the guilt and folly of his conduct.

JOHN RYLAND'S EXPOSITION OF THE STORY OF THE SYRO-PHœNICIAN WOMAN.—William Jay, in his "Reminiscences of some of his Distinguished Contemporaries," gives the following incident of John Ryland. They had taken tea together at the house of a Christian friend:

"At the domestic worship he said, 'You, Eusebius!—so he commonly called me, I know not wherefore—you shall pray, and I will for a few minutes expound.' (He was never tedious.) He took the story of the woman of Canaan. After commenting on her affliction, and application for relief, he came to her trial and her success—reading the words—'And he answered her not a word,' he said, 'Is this the benefactor of whom I have heard so much before I came? He seems to have had the dead palsey in his tongue.' 'And the disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away, for she crieth after us.' 'And why should we be troubled w' a stranger? We know not whence she is, and she seems determined to hang on till she is heard.' 'But he said, I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel;' and you know you are not one of them; and what right have you to clamor thus?' 'Then came she, falling at his feet, and cried, Lord help me!' 'But he said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs; and she said, True, Lord, yet the dogs can eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table.' 'What I want is no more to thee than a crum, compared with the immense provisions of thy board; and I come only for a crum, and a crum I must have; and, if thou refuse me a seat at thy table with thy family, wilt thou refuse me a crawl and a crum underneath? The family will lose nothing by my gaining all I want.' . . . Omnipotence can withstand this attack no longer; but he yields the victory—not to her humility, and importunity, and perseverance—but to her faith, that produced and employed all these, for 'all things are possible to him that believeth.' 'O, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' 'Lord, what was that you said?' 'Why, be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' 'Why, then, I will have my dear child instantly healed.' 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' 'Why, then, I will have my poor soul saved.' 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' 'Why, then, I will have all my sins pardoned and destroyed.' 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' 'Why, then, I'll have all my wants supplied from thy riches in glory.' 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt. Here, take the key, and go, and be not afraid to rifle all my treasures.'

"Now, Mrs. ———, this woman was a dog, a sad dog, a sinful dog, and if she had had her desert she would have been driven out of doors; and yet there is not a woman in this house comparable to her. Let us pray."

THE HANDFUL OF GRAIN.—Take a handful of grain. Lay it up by thee, and it profiteth thee not. Grind it to flour, and like her of Zarephath, make thee a little cake thereof, and it shall yield thee a moment's comfort and support. But sow it in the earth, and it shall bring thee forth a bountiful increase. So it is of wealth. Hoard it, and it yieldeth neither profit nor comfort. Spend it on thy pleasures; they are but for a moment. Bestow it on the poor, on the fatherless and widow, on the little ones of Christ, and he shall remember it with a plenteous reward.

REDEEM THE TIME.—"Redeeming the time, because the days are evil."—Eph. v, 16.

The startling words of the fourteenth verse must be linked with those of the sixteenth. It is expected of one who is "awake" and has "risen," that he should redeem the time. Sleepers may waste it; he must redeem it. Can we be awake, and yet not "redeem the time?"

It was an ancient custom to put an hour-glass into the coffin, as an emblem of time run out. "I stopped," says a writer of the last century, "in Clerkenwell church-yard to see a grave-digger at work. He had dug pretty deep, and was come to a coffin which was quite rotten. In clearing away the rotten pieces of wood, the grave-digger found an hour-glass close to the left side of the skull, with sand in it, the wood of which was so rotten that it broke when he took hold of it." A strange custom this, to notify the dead that their time was at an end! Of what profit could such a warning be, coming thus too late? It is to the living that we would present the hour-glass! It is the living that we would warn of the swift rush of time! Moments and years—moments and years! With what speed do they hurry away! O time, time, time, how soon will it be done! Men and brethren, look at that hour-glass, emptying itself grain by grain, with such un-staying eagerness. Living men, you will soon be the dead, or the last trumpet will be sounding; and where will you be, and what is your hope? But look at the apostle's words, "Redeem the time."

1. Buy it out of the hands of those who are casting it away. Time, like a wide fair garden of flowers, spreads out before the children of men; but they trample down its flowers. Time, like a vast treasure-house, opens its stores of gold and silver; but they throw them away. Buy them up! Lose nothing! Wasted time stands at the very head of the world's long catalogue of sins. Be warned! Men waste time; do you use it? They throw it away; gather it up. Whatever those that are asleep may do, those whom the apostle calls "fools"—verse 15—it becomes you, who profess to be awake, to use it well. Redeem the time!

2. Buy it up, so as not to lose a moment. As the reaper with his sickle carefully cuts down and binds up the corn of autumn, so do you with time! As the gleaner follows the reaper, picking up each scattered ear of grain, so do you glean up each moment of time! For each one is precious, too precious to be lost, or slept away, or laughed away, or danced away, or sported away, or talked away, or idled away. Gather up the very smallest fragment, that nothing may be lost; for each lost moment tells upon eternity. So many moments lost on earth, so many moments lost for heaven, and lost forever! Redeem the time!

3. Buy it up, so as to lay hold of each opportunity as it turns up: for the word "time" refers as much to "opportunity" as to time itself. Be on the eager watch for opportunities. Allow none to slip from you. Seize upon each one. Improve them all. It has been said that there is "a tide in the affairs of men," which must be taken at its height, or else all is lost. But in truth there is not one tide merely, but many. There may, in one sense and for certain things, be but one tide; but in another view there are tides not a few. Each day, each hour, has its tides, its critical moments, its opportunities, its seasons, which must be seized on at the moment, or lost forever. Might we not endeavor, each morning, to forecast a little, and consider what opportunities may lie before us, and be ready to seize each one as it passes; for it passes us as the winged lightning. Be ready to lay hold on it. Redeem the time!

4. Buy it up, so as to have all in readiness against the evil day. As Joseph bought up the corn in the land of Egypt, as generals draw together all manner of stores into some city or fortress against the day of war and siege, so do you. The evil day is at hand; nay, it has already begun. There is not a moment to be lost. Make ready for the worst. Remember that preparation for an evil day consists much in redeeming time. If this be neglected, then that day will not only come upon you unawares, but it will come as the avenger of your wasted hours. Redeem the time!

THE HAND THAT SAVES US.—Two painters were employed to fresco the walls of a magnificent cathedral; both stood on a rude scaffolding constructed for the purpose, some forty feet from the floor. One of them was so intent upon his work, that he became wholly absorbed, and in admiration stood off from the picture, gazing at it with intense delight. Forgetting where he was, he moved back slowly, surveying critically the work of his pencil, till he had neared the edge of the plank upon which he stood. At this critical moment his companion turned suddenly, and, almost frozen with horror, beheld his imminent peril; another instant, and the enthusiast would be precipitated upon the pavement beneath. If he spoke to him it was certain death; if he held his peace death was equally sure. Suddenly he regained his presence of mind, and seizing a wet brush flung it against the wall, splattering the beautiful picture with unsightly blotches of coloring. The painter flew forward, and turned upon his friend with fierce upbraidings; but startled at his ghastly face, he listened to his recital of danger, looked shuddering over the dread space below, and with tears of gratitude blessed the hand that saved him. Just so, we sometimes get absorbed upon the pictures of the world, and, in contemplating them, step backward, unconscious of our peril, when the Almighty, in mercy, dashes out the beautiful images, and draws us at the time we are complaining of his dealing, into his outstretched arms of compassion and love.

PANTING AFTER CHRIST.—"As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God."—Psalms xlii, 1.

Every soul in Christ hates sin—panting after holiness. Nothing makes him pant more after God than corruption striving within. Paul never prayed more earnestly than when he had the thorn in his flesh. The thorn in the flesh makes us pant after God. When a vessel is left by the tide lying dry upon the sand, it can not be moved—it is a helpless log. The mariners may try to draw it with ropes, but it only sinks deeper in the sand. They can do nothing but long for the tide, that it may again be lifted upon the waves, and sail into the harbor. So is it with a Christian. You are often like a vessel on the sand. You can not move. You attempt duties, but it is a heavy work. Without Christ you can do nothing. You wait and pant for Christ, for the full tide of the Spirit, to lift your soul above the waves, and carry you prosperously on toward the heavenly harbor.

Editorial Disquisition.

THE BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST;

OR, THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

Few subjects in the whole Bible have awakened deeper solicitude, or been the occasion of more speculation, than the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, or "the unpardonable sin," as it has been sometimes termed. The passage which has given rise to this question is found in Matthew xii, 31, 32: "Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." See also Mark iii, 28, and Luke xii, 10. The following modifications of the latter clause of the passage—namely, by Mark, "hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation;" by Luke, "it shall not be forgiven"—are highly explanatory of its import.

In its practical and experimental aspects, this subject has been the source of deep and painful anxiety to thousands. Many a soul, weighed down under the deep consciousness of guilt—feeling that God is afar off—has been led to inquire whether the mysterious line of demarcation between the pardonable and the unpardonable may not have been already transcended. Many others have gone still further, and, amid the distractions of an excited and morbid imagination, have settled down in deep and dark despair, under the conviction that they have incurred that guilt to which Heaven's mercy extends no forgiveness.

In its theoretical and speculative aspects, it has elicited an amount of discussion almost incredible. With regard to the nature of this "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost"—the thing, the act in which it consists—opinions have been various, incongruous, and contradictory. Some regard it as some sin peculiar to the age in which the Savior lived, but do not attempt to define its character; some suppose it to have been disbelieving against the evidence of the senses; others that it was some great sin, outleaping all the ordinary crimes of which men are guilty. St. Ambrose made it consist in denying the Deity of the Son of God; others in speaking against the Deity of our Lord as distinguished from his humanity; some in denying the Deity of the Holy Ghost; others in imputing the works of the Holy Ghost to the devil; and still others in blaspheming and renouncing God. Some extend it to heresy and schism in the Church of God; others make it consist in backsliding, or apostasy from God. Grotius thought it to be the sin of an impenitent, hardened, and insolent sinner, as Korah, Pharaoh, Simon Magus, and Ananias and Sapphira.

The more common opinion of modern commentators seems to be, that it was openly attributing the miracles wrought by Christ, in their presence, to the agency and power of the devil. Hence, they say, none in a subsequent age could be guilty of that fearful sin, as it was impossible for them to be personal witnesses of the miracles of Christ. Nor, according to this theory, could any in the time of Christ become guilty of this sin, unless they personally witnessed these miracles and then attributed them to the devil. Nay, some go even farther, and say none except such as witnessed these miracles, and, not only in their hearts, but also by word of mouth, attributed them to the devil, as did some of the Jews—can become guilty of the irremissible sin.

With this latter opinion accord substantially our own commentators. It is the only one that requires from us any serious consideration. Then, before indicating our own convictions upon the subject, let us point out a few of the insuperable objections to the more commonly received interpretation.

OBJECTIONS TO THE GENERALLY RECEIVED EXPOSITION.

1. Those who adopt the opinion that "the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" consisted in attributing, on the part of eye-witnesses, the miracles wrought by Christ to the agency of the devil, utterly fail to assign a reason why this sin should be so strikingly marked by the judgments of God. To ascribe these miracles to Satanic agency, notwithstanding all the evidences of their divine origin, was indeed a great sin. But was it so heinous a crime as that of crucifying the Lord of life and glory? Look at the subject. In that age the belief in witches, ghosts, demons, and manifest Satanic agencies was prevalent among the people. Jugglers performed astonishing feats, claiming for themselves the exercise of supernatural power, and thus filled the minds of the people with wonder. How natural, then, was it for the ignorant multitude to confound our Savior with jugglers, and to ascribe to him Satanic agency! But when they laid hands upon him and put him to death, they violated every dictate of conscience and religion. The one sin might have been committed ignorantly; but the latter, more violent and cruel in its character, was absolutely without excuse or palliation. Yet to the very murderers of our Lord salvation was distinctly and fully offered. Can any one tell us why he who murdered his Lord might have forgiveness, while he who simply witnessed his miracles and said they were wrought by Satanic agency, was placed beyond the possibility of pardon, either in this world or in the world to come?

2. Again: this exposition is based upon the supposition, that attributing the miracles wrought by Christ to the devil was a sin, not against Christ, but against the Holy Spirit.

Now, then, miracles were performed by Christ himself. "But if I, with the finger of God, cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you." Luke xi, 20. Christ said, "I do cures, cast out devils," etc. Luke xiii, 32. Are the sick healed? do the blind receive their sight? Are the deaf made to hear? and are the dead raised up? It is Christ that does the work.

These miracles also testified of Christ and not of the Holy Ghost. "The works that I do bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me," John v, 36; "The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me," John x, 25; "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. Though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him," John x, 37, 38. These miracles, then, were wrought by Christ; they also testified of Christ. The inevitable conclusion is, that to attribute them to the agency of the devil, is blasphemy against Christ and not against the Holy Ghost—a conclusion fatal to this interpretation of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost.

3. This interpretation assumes that they who ascribed the miracles of Christ to the agency of Satan, actually committed the irremissible sin.

A strong presumption—if not an absolute demonstration—that these individuals had not committed an irremissible sin, exists in the fact that the Gospel was afterward offered to them; that is, it was offered to the whole people, of whom these very persons constituted a part, without any reservation or exception whatever.

But—it will be objected—did not our Savior give this admonition, "Because they said, he hath an unclean spirit?" Precisely so. That was the occasion that called for this admonition. They were now blaspheming against him, and that led him to warn them, lest they should also blaspheme against the Holy Ghost. A father, whose son begins to manifest his fondness for the low associations of the dram-shop, will warn that son against the evils of intemperance and abandonment of character, even though those evils are seen only in the distance. So our Savior, finding the Jews rejecting his mission and office, makes it the occasion to warn them against the future sins to which the present would inevitably lead.

4. Another objection to this interpretation is, that it can not be reconciled with the obvious import of other Scriptures.

It is a sound principle of Biblical interpretation, that if we find a passage which is obscure and of doubtful interpretation, we should reject any interpretation that would conflict with the general character of the Gospel, or with the obvious and unquestionable meaning of other passages of Scripture. In fact, the obscure and ambiguous is to be interpreted in the light of the clear and the unambiguous. Now, this interpretation would make this passage say to a certain class, namely, those who had committed this unpardonable sin, "There is no salvation for you; you may repent, pray, weep, believe, but you can not be forgiven." Such a conclusion conflicts irreconcilably with the whole Gospel economy, which offers pardon to all without exception, without limitation. "God now commandeth all men every-where to repent," Acts xvii, 30; "Let the wicked [that is, all the wicked, of whatever character or however great his crimes] forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon," Isa. lv, 7.

No exception is made in the Gospel call. All men, every-where, are commanded to repent, and assured that their salvation from all their sins, and from all kinds of sin, is possible through our Lord Jesus Christ. This call and this assurance are utterly irreconcilable with the idea that a portion of the human family were absolutely and irreversibly excluded from all participation in the salvation provided in the Gospel, and to all intents and purposes were already everlastingly condemned. And especially does this absurdity become apparent, when we remember that the Gospel began to be proclaimed to the very people among whom these supposed unpardonable offenders were to be found. The offer of salvation was made to them and to their children. If a portion of these persons had already committed the irremissible sin, the offering of salvation to all of them seems to be a practical realization of the Calvinistic idea that God offers salvation to all, notwithstanding a part of them are irrevocably reprobated and doomed to everlasting woe. The genius and spirit of the Gospel require us to believe that there is no sin which may not be washed away in the atoning blood of Christ, and no sinner who may not be saved by his merit and intercession.

5. Another objection we have to this interpretation is, that it would make this sin an exception from the general mercy of the Gospel.

This has been distinctly admitted by the most philosophical men who have adopted the interpretation to which we object. Richard Watson not only speaks of it as "an exception from the mercies of the Gospel," but also declares that "it stands in direct opposition to the general character of the covenant of grace." A sad concession this for so profound and philosophical a mind! Sorely perplexed and bewildered must he have been to be forced to make such a confession concerning a theory he had adopted!

Now, we contend that, without the clearest warrant—a warrant resting upon something more than mere metaphysical hypothesis or even logical deduction—a warrant resting upon the plain and distinct "thus saith the Lord"—we are not justified in assuming that there are any exceptions in the merciful provisions of the Gospel. Before we can believe such a thing we must have clear and full authority—passages of Scripture clear and distinct in their declarations, and upon the exposition of which, as to their bearings upon this point, commentators are agreed. But here we have no such thing. A single passage in the whole Bible, and that of doubtful interpretation—as is evident from the fact that commentators have drawn out of it no less than a dozen different shades of meaning—is, in violation of the sound canons of Biblical interpretation, made to sustain a theory of most alarming character, being, according to Richard Watson, not only "an exception from the mercies of the Gospel," but standing "in direct opposition to the general character of the covenant of grace!"

6. A final objection which we urge against this interpretation is, that it is inconsistent with the mercy and goodness of God; and also with the principles on which he has ever dealt with our weak and sinful race.

If there be one sin so fearful in its guilt that Heaven can not extend mercy to it; so irremissible that no sorrow, or penitence, or faith can ever find relief from it, God would not have left man exposed to it without clear and distinct premonition. The sin would have been described, its character portrayed in so full, clear, and explicit a manner that no man could be in doubt as to the matter. The consequences of the commission of that sin would have been made known, with all the solemn sanctions of divine authority, that man might be deterred from it. To suppose that God has done differently from this is to impugn his wisdom or his goodness. The warning against sin in general would not meet the case; for other sins, when committed, may be forgiven, but for this—if we are to credit the interpretation adopted by so many—there is no forgiveness. But to permit men to commit that sin, and then to warn them of its irremissible character, as our Savior is here represented as doing, would be fearful mockery. Suppose a man ignorant that arsenic was a deadly poison, were by us, and we were seeking to instruct and counsel him, and professing to be his friend, and yet should permit him to partake of the deadly poison unwarned, would it consist with either mercy or justice? And if, after he had taken it, we commenced unfolding to him its deadly properties, would it not seem rather a mockery of his wretchedness than an admonition for his good?

But, if it be objected that no one is now exposed to the commission of this sin, we must reply that some once were; and, if we are to credit this interpretation, they actually committed the unpardonable offense. So far, then, as the interpretation impugns the character and government of God, it is liable to the same objection as if all men every-where were left in ignorance, exposed to the commission of the same sin.

These are some of the objections that fairly lie against the commonly received interpretation of this subject. To us they seem insuperable. We are compelled to reconsider and revise our opinions upon the subject. This view of it seems irreconcilable with the character of God, with the principles of the divine government, and with the genius of the Gospel. And then to base a principle so monstrous upon a single passage,^o and that of doubtful and disputed interpretation, is a violation of one of the most important principles of sound criticism.

THE KEY TO UNLOCK THIS MYSTERY.

In one single fact in the Gospel economy we find a key with which to unlock this mystery. That fact is simply this, that while the whole Trinity is engaged in the work of man's salvation, the work or agency of the Holy Spirit only is conditional.

1. The work of the eternal Father in that gracious covenant, in which he consents to open the door of reconciliation, was altogether without any condition requiring man's agency or co-operation. No act of wickedness or of impiety on the part of man could prevent the ratification of the everlasting covenant of mercy.

2. The part assumed by Christ was also unconditional. He would pay the "price." The consent of man to the atonement was no part of the condition on which it was made. No one could say, "I will have no part in this redemption." The blasphemer, however vile and wicked, rejecting Christ and despising his mission, would still be redeemed.

3. But the work of the Holy Spirit was conditional. While man could not prevent the ratification of the covenant between the Father and the Son, nor yet the work of universal atonement from being effected, he could resist the Holy Ghost. To him was committed the fearful power of annulling the agency of the Holy Ghost, so far as his personal salvation was concerned. God could open the way to his salvation, Christ could redeem him whether he would or not, but the Holy Ghost had no power to save him without his full and free consent. Effectual resistance, then, to the Holy Ghost was possible, and that resistance rendered forgiveness and salvation impossible.

Each person in the holy Trinity may be blasphemed. To blaspheme God is to use his name with irreverence, to malign his character and government, or to calumniate his providence and grace. The Son is blasphemed when his character and work are perverted, calumniated, or maligned. The Holy Spirit is blasphemed when its sacred offices are contemned and resisted through impenitence and unbelief, which, so long as they are continued, render forgiveness impossible.

THE ACT CONSTITUTING THIS BLASPHEMY.

We are brought to this conclusion, that "the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" consists not in any one sinful act, but in a course of continued willful and hardened opposition to its gracious influences.

1. This interpretation gives to our Savior's reproof a plain and practical meaning.

If, by the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, he meant some peculiar and anomalous sin—if the phrase was employed in some technical and abstruse sense, his reproof might excite wonder, but its force and application would hardly be realized. But they knew what it was to resist the Holy Ghost. Their fathers before them had been guilty of this sin, and had reaped its bitter consequences. When our Savior warned them against this sin, they, therefore, perfectly understood what he meant.

2. This interpretation harmonizes with all the circumstances connected with the case.

Christ had come. They were now blaspheming and rejecting him. Still he would redeem them. The Holy Spirit was soon to make his advent. Their present rejection of Christ would open the way to and prepare them for the rejection of the Holy Spirit also. Seeing this, our Savior raises a warning voice. He says to them, "You may blaspheme me, but I will redeem you; but beware when the Holy Spirit comes. If you reject and malign him as you are now rejecting and maligning me, you will cut yourselves off from the mercy of God and from the possibility of salvation."

3. The distinction between the sin against the Holy Ghost and other sins is natural.

There may be sins committed in times of great ignorance and prevailing darkness, which, by a merciful God, may be overlooked—"forgotten"—"winked at." But he that resists the Holy Ghost when it enforces the claims of God and the duty of repentance, sins knowingly; for he wars against conscience as well as against God. For him, then, there can be no excuse. He knowingly thrusts from him the boon of life, and tramples the mercy of God beneath his feet.

4. The Jews afterward actually incurred the guilt and suffered the consequences of this sin. Their subsequent resistance to the Gospel and rejection of it proves this. St. Stephen says to them, while in the very act of sin, "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost; as your fathers did, so do ye."

5. This interpretation accords, as we have already observed, with the office and work of the Holy Spirit.

It may be "grieved," resisted, and that resistance interposes an insuperable bar to the exercise of the functions of the Holy Spirit in our salvation. He that resists the Holy Spirit paralyzes the only agency that can make him holy and bring him to heaven.

6. It also accords with observation and experience. Multitudes of the most vile and blasphemous wretches upon the face of the earth have received forgiveness through repentance and faith. In revivals of religion, many, with vastly more light than the Jews had in the time of our Savior, have attributed the work of the Holy Spirit to the devil, but have subsequently become convinced of sin; and when they ceased to resist the Holy Spirit and came to Christ, their great sin interposed no obstacle to the cleansing power of his atoning blood.

7. Is it objected that this sin hath never forgiveness, and is, therefore, different from ordinary sins which may be forgiven? We reply that this strong expression must be interpreted in the light of other passages. It is said that "no drunkard shall inherit eternal life;" but this does not imply that the drunkard may not cease to be a drunkard and then inherit eternal life. It is said that

* The subject is mentioned by three of the evangelists; but they are only different versions of the same matter.

"the wicked shall be turned into hell;" but this does not imply that the wicked may not become righteous and then gain heaven. So he that is blaspheming against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness; but if he will repent and cease to blaspheme, he may have forgiveness and life; for "the wicked" and "the unrighteous," of every shade of character, are commanded to forsake their sins and return unto the Lord, who will crown them with abundant pardon.

8. The question, then, arises whether it is possible for the day of grace to terminate before death. No proof that such may be the case, so far as we know, exists. The object of our present life is probation; if probation cease, what further spiritual end can be accomplished by a longer life? The whole Gospel economy is against the supposition. It goes, with its provisions, with the offer of its mercy and of its salvation, down to the last hour of the sinner's life, and as he is about to take his fearful "leap in the dark" it still strives to woo him to Christ and heaven. Every presumption, then, is, that if in the case of any individual sinner his probation had come to its final and eternal end, that moment would be the last of his wretched earthly existence.

9. But is there not "a sin unto death?" Yes, verily, every sin unrepented of is a sin unto death. The apostle evidently borrows a figure from the Jewish law, in which a certain class of sins were "unto death;" that is, punishable with death—as idolatry, blasphemy, etc., while others might be repented of, atoned for, and forgiven. The sin unto death is the sin visited with temporal death, as in the case of Korah, Eli, Saul, the disobedient prophet mentioned 1 Kings xiii, 1-32, and Ananias and Sapphira.

We believe that such sins may be committed, and, perhaps, are often committed, in the present day—sins for which God strikes down the offender and brings him to judgment. How often is the blasphemer stricken down by death in the very act of blasphemy, and without any apparent cause! Among the active infidels who, some years since, were accustomed to meet in the city of New York, there was one remarkable alike for physical and moral deformity. He was a man of more than ordinary intelligence, and frequently participated in the public debates that were had among them. In one of his harangues he became more than ordinarily blasphemous; he defied the Almighty's power, and dared Jehovah to seal his lips. Suddenly he became confused, his tongue faltered, his language became incoherent, his friends took him away, and he died a raving maniac. Take another case. More than fifty years ago, while a revival was in progress in one of the towns in New Jersey, a meeting was gotten up by the wicked and profligate to burlesque the scenes of the religious meetings. In the midst of it a young and dissolute actress stood upon one of the benches, and, with mock solemnity, began to tell her pretended religious experience. At length she exclaimed, "Glory to God! I have found peace, I am sanctified, I am now prepared to die!" These words were hardly uttered before the wretched girl dropped senseless upon the floor and was taken up a corpse.

Cases of this character are almost innumerable. They stand out as admonitory facts to check the headlong course of iniquity, and to admonish men that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

But this sin unto death does not of absolute necessity involve the everlasting damnation of the soul. Eli, and Saul, and the disobedient prophet committed it, and suffered a sudden and violent death; but who shall say that their souls, having been washed and purified from all their stains by the blood of Christ, may not have found repose in heaven?

10. Finally, our interpretation presents the subject in a practical aspect. If the view we have taken of the subject be correct, it is not one sinner here and there, once in an age, who becomes guilty of the irremissible sin; but every obstinate and persevering sinner in the end becomes guilty of it. Every sinner is practically blaspheming the Holy Ghost. Every sin that he commits is but a link in the fearful series that shall constitute, when the day of probation has ended, his unpardonable guilt. It is but a link in that everlasting chain that shall bind him in the thralldom of despair and woe forever.

The tendency of both virtue and vice is to fixedness of character. The possibility of reaching, in this life, that point in our career when absolute and unalterable fixedness of character is attained is greatly doubted. But it is a fearful thought, and full of practical admonition to the wicked, that he is constantly approaching it. The stages of his approach may be so gradual as to be imperceptible, and the transitions from one to the other be almost unconsciously made. How terrible the condition of that soul which has become so totally estranged from God, so entirely the slave of vice, so thoroughly depraved in all its character, and so completely grounded and settled in wickedness that all hope of change is forever precluded! That condition, whenever and wherever reached, is hell. The transitions may be gradual, imperceptible, but the line of demarkation is certain and definite.

"There is a time we know not when—

A point we know not where,
That marks the destiny of man
To glory or despair.

There is a time by us unseen,
That crosses every path—
The hidden boundary between God's patience and his wrath."

Items, Literary, Scientific, and Religious.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT IN OHIO.—The number of members belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church in Ohio is about 80,000, and of effective ministers 450. The total amount paid these 450 ministers is not $120,000 annually; making the average salary of each man about $267 a year. Each member, it will be perceived also, contributes to this $120,000 a little over $1.25 a year.

The average amount paid for missionary and other purposes is less than forty cents per member; so that the whole amount paid yearly by each member for Church purposes is only about one dollar and three-quarters.

CALIFORNIA CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.—It appears that the city of San Francisco paid, during last year, about $18,000 for the support of the Romanist schools of that city.

They did not, however, succeed well, at least not in the qualities of a good name, and the grand jury took the matter in hand and pronounced the schools a nuisance. All history goes to show that the schools of the Romans, when carried out on genuine Roman principles, are superficial in character and pernicious in their moral influence.

PRESBYTERIANS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The statistics of Presbyterianism—Old School and New—in the principal of the United States cities, is as follows: Brooklyn, New York, Old School, five churches, 1,152 members; New School, four churches, 2,011 members: Philadelphia, Old School, twenty-three churches, 6,640 members; New School, fifteen churches, 4,798 members: Buffalo, Old School, one church, 580 members; New School, six churches, 1,577 members: Pittsburg, of both denominations, six churches, 1,399 members: Cincinnati, Old School, eight churches, 1,167 members; New School, four churches, 880 members: St. Louis, Old School, five churches, 1,046 members; New School, eight churches, 1,561 members. In New York city, where the population is near 600,000, there is but one member of the Presbyterian Church to every fifty-three of the population, and but one church edifice to each 16,000 souls. In Boston there are no Presbyterian Churches of any note, the Congregationalists having sway there and throughout New England.

EDUCATION IN BOSTON.—The amount of money invested in the school-houses of Boston is $1,500,000. The yearly appropriations for education are $1,200,000, while the amount raised for all other city expenses is but $870,000. The amount expended for instruction in the common schools of Massachusetts, last year, was $4.50 for each child between five and fifteen years of age.

OLDEST CHURCH.—The oldest church now existing in the United States, is one near Smithfield, Isle of Wight county, Virginia. It was built in the reign of Charles I, between the years 1630 and 1635. The brick, lime, and timber were imported from England. The timber is English oak, and was framed in England. The structure is of brick, erected in the most substantial manner. The mortar has become so hardened that it will strike fire in collision with steel.

BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.—The notes of the Bank of England, under a new process, not long since adopted, are signed by machinery. The engraving of the whole note is complete. Formerly the bank employed twenty clerks, at a salary each of £500 per annum, who did nothing else but sign their names to notes. The new mode of signing, it is supposed, will prevent counterfeiting.

DISTILLATION IN THE UNITED STATES.—By the census of 1850, the number of bushels of corn and grain consumed in the distilleries of the United States was 18,055,300; the number of gallons of rum and whisky distilled, 48,634,455; barrels of ale and beer, 1,777,924. At one cent a glass for the whole, it would amount to $65,265,292; about three dollars a head—say fifteen dollars for each family. Saying nothing about imported liquors, this tax of fifteen dollars on every head of a family is gouged out of the bread and clothing of women and children who can not help themselves.

FARMS AND FARMERS.—Farms occupy two-thirds of the land of England. The number of the farms is 225,318; the average size is 111 acres. Two-thirds of the farms are under that size, but there are seven hundred and seventy-one of above 1,000 acres. The large holdings abound in the south-eastern and eastern counties; the small farms in the north. There are two thousand English farmers holding nearly 2,000,000 acres; and there are 97,000 English farmers not holding more. There are 40,650 farmers who employ five laborers each; 16,501 have ten or more, and employ together 811,707 laborers; 170 farmers have about sixty laborers each, and together employ 17,000.

CINCINNATI SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—Connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Cincinnati are twenty-five Sunday schools, six hundred and twenty-seven teachers, and thirty-eight hundred and seventy-two scholars; with the Presbyterian Church, eighteen schools, three hundred and forty-five teachers, and twenty-one hundred and eleven scholars; with the Congregationalist, three schools, sixty-two teachers, and three hundred and fifty-five scholars; with the Episcopal Church, three schools and six hundred and forty scholars; with the Baptist Church, eight schools, and thirteen hundred and seventy-eight scholars; and with all other denominations, thirty schools, four hundred and fifty teachers, and about thirty-five hundred scholars—making the grand total for the city of some eighty-seven schools and twenty-six thousand Sunday school scholars. Forty-eight of the schools take up each Sabbath a missionary collection, the total amount for the year past being $3,141. The largest sum contributed—$402.61—was by the Christie Chapel Methodist Episcopal Sunday school, for "missions and Sunday School Union."

COOKING COD-LIVER.—Cod-liver and cod-liver oil having become quite an article of modern medicine, and the latter being unpleasant to take, they have adopted a plan of cooking the liver. It is in this wise: Take a pound of fresh cod-liver, peel and steam two pounds of good flavory potatoes; cut the liver in four pieces, place it over the potatoes, and then steam them, letting the oil from the pieces of liver fall on the potatoes. Make some incisions in the liver with a knife to extract the remaining oil, and dish the liver up and eat with a little melted butter and anchovy sauce. Serve up the potatoes with a little salt and pepper. Both dishes will be found to eat extremely well; and any one who will eat regularly of such preparation for a few months, will, from a state of leanness, become quite hearty and fat.

THE OLIVES OF GETHSEMANE.—In Turkey every olive-tree which was found standing by the Moslems when they conquered Asia, pays a tax of one medina, or about one quarter of a cent, to the treasury, while each of those planted since the conquest pays half its produce: now, the eight olive-trees of Gethsemane pay only eight medina, or only two cents. Dr. Wild describes the largest as being twenty-four feet in girth above the root, though its topmost branch is not above thirty feet from the ground. M. Bove, who traveled as a naturalist, asserts that the largest are at least six yards in circumference, and nine or ten yards high—so large, indeed, that he calculates their age at 2,000 years.

UNIVERSITY OF NORTHERN PENNSYLVANIA.—This institution is now under the patronage of the Wyoming annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has as its President Rev. Nelson Rounds, D. D. Connected with the University is a Biblical department and also a teachers' class, the former furnishing gratis, to those who desire it, systematic and competent aid in the critical study of the Scriptures, and the latter, under the supervision of Dr. Rounds, affording all needed instruction to those persons who may be desiring to become common school teachers.

PROPERTY IN UTAH.—In Utah, on the death of a man, his property descends to the Mormon Church, his wives and children not being recognized as heirs. The Church is the sole heir of all property.

COLORING GLASS.—As an instance of the benefit which practical men may derive from scientific research, we may mention a fact interesting to gardeners and seed-merchants, in connection with colored light. Recent discovery has shown that remarkable effects could be produced on plants by interposing colored glass between them and the sun. Blue glass accelerates growth; and Messrs. Lawson, of Edinburgh, have built a stove-house glazed with blue glass, in which they test the value of seeds for sale or export. The practice is to sow a hundred seeds, and to judge of the quality by the number that germinate; the more, of course, the better. Formerly, ten days or a fortnight elapsed while waiting for the germination of the seeds; but in the blue stove-house, two or three days suffice—a saving of time worth, so say the firm, £500, or $2,500.

SCHOOLMASTERS' WAGES.—Fifty years ago Boston had seven schoolmasters, whose salaries were $865.65 per annum. The ushers had $433.33 a year. The whole amount paid for salaries to teachers, and the incidental expenses of the schools, was only $16,687.11, of which sum $6,295.12 was required for a new school-house. The expenses of schools now are $356,800.20. The salaries of all the teachers were $7,256.46; now they are $193,039.41. There is a perceptible difference in the figures.

SCUMS FOR SMOKERS.—Estimating the cost of good cigars at one dollar a week, and computing compound interest at seven per cent. from the age of fourteen, the cost at twenty years of age would be $397.12; at thirty, $1,537.88; at forty, $3,807.89; at fifty, $8,324.70; at sixty, $17,201.32; at seventy, $34,995.51; at eighty, $70,341.65. The cost to health and morals can not be computed. Why not let the chimneys, and furnaces, and locomotives do the smoking?

ASTRONOMY'S CONQUESTS IN 1854.—Professor Challis announces, as the conquest of astronomy during the past year, four new planets, and the same number of new comets; none of the latter having been, as yet, identified with any of their predecessors, which, unfortunately, is also the case with respect to the planets—the number of which, instead of being the mystic seven, bids fair to increase to seventy; equally to the inconvenience of astronomers and the juvenile students of astronomical catechisms.

STATISTICS FOR THE PEOPLE.—The population of New York is 600,000, of which 30,000 may be classed as floating population. Of the 6,000 persons who are criminals, or in charge of the governors of the alms-house, three-fourths of the whole number are foreigners, and almost every one of these foreigners are Roman Catholics. In the year 1853, there were committed to the prisons of that city for ninety-three specified offenses, 28,405, of whom 22,291, or nearly four-fifths, were foreigners. Of 7,075 liquor-sellers, 6,597 are foreigners. In that city are 50,000 German infidels, with their poisonous publications; 200,000 Roman Catholics, governed wholly by a bigoted priesthood; 250,000 who are wholly destitute of any means of grace; 43,000 families are without a copy of God's word.

PAPER.—The number of paper mills in the United States is 750, with 3,000 engines, and a daily product of 900,000 pounds, or 270,000,000 a year, of the value of $27,000,000. Rags to the amount of 405,000,000 pounds are consumed, value at four cents, $16,200,000. The cost of labor is $3,375,000. A reward of £1,000 is offered by a London newspaper for the discovery of some substitute for rags in the manufacture of paper. Who will gain it?

THE AFRICAN INSTITUTION IN PARIS.—An association for the diffusion of civilization and Christian light in Africa, has recently issued a circular, which shows that the number of blacks held in slavery in different countries is seven and a half millions, of which 3,003,000 are in the United States, 3,250,000 in Brazil, 900,000 in the Spanish colonies, 85,000 in Dutch colonies, 140,000 in the Republics of Central America, and 80,000 in European establishments in Africa.

RESEARCHES IN PALESTINE.—The Palestine Archaeological Association believe that some of the stones set up for memorials, as recorded in Scripture, are still standing, and they propose to search for them: among these may be mentioned, Joshua's monolith at Shechem, and the twelve stones he set up at Gilgal. The ancient tombs, also, are to be sought for and explored: there is the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried; and as the latter "was embalmed in Egypt, and the body was placed in a coffin, or sarcophagus, after the custom of the Egyptians, there is every reason to conclude," so runs the report, "that it still lies undisturbed." There is, moreover, the tomb of Joseph, who, as viceroy of Egypt, must have been buried with all the precautions due to high rank; and the tombs of the kings, besides sepulchers of remarkable individuals, in which, as is known, "scrolls of the law" were sometimes deposited. This is but a part of what the association propose to accomplish—their scheme embraces further examination of what is known, as well as discovery of the unknown; and if they can only carry it out, their expectation of finding something to illustrate ancient Jewish history has a reasonable chance of being gratified.

THE WONDERS OF PHOTOGRAPHY.—At a concertation at the Polytechnic Institute in Paris, a curious illustration was given of the capabilities of photography in experienced hands. Two photographs were exhibited, one the largest and the other the smallest ever produced by the process. The first was a portrait the full size of life, and the last was a copy of the front sheet of the London Times on a surface scarcely exceeding two inches by three. Both pictures were exceedingly perfect, the portrait, it is said, being more pleasing and far more correct than those usually produced, while the copy, notwithstanding its exceeding minuteness, could be read without the aid of a magnifying glass.

CHILDREN IN BAVARIA.—The King of Bavaria has decreed that no children, aged less than ten years at least, and who have not received elementary and religious instruction, shall be employed in manufactories; that they shall not be occupied more than nine hours a day, and that of these three shall be passed at school; that the children shall be continually under surveillance, and that, if possible, the two sexes shall be kept separate.

AN HONORED INSTITUTION.—Princeton College, in New Jersey, has educated more than six hundred clergymen, and more than two hundred judges, statesmen, and members of Congress.

NEW BOOKS.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF REV. WILLIAM JAY.—This work contains not only the memoir of the distinguished author, but also reminiscences of some distinguished contemporaries, as John Newton, John Ryland, William Wilberforce, Hannah More, Rowland Hill, Richard Cecil, Robert Hall, John Foster, Lady Maxwell, John Wesley, and fourteen other celebrities. It contains, also, selections from the correspondence of Mr. Jay, and his literary remains. The work has the rare advantage of the joint editorship of George Redford, D. D., LL. D., and John Angel James. It is full of variety and richness. An excellent sketch of the biography will be found in the preceding papers of this number. New York: Carter and Brothers. 2 vols., 8vo., pp. 413, 336. For sale by Moore, Wiltach & Keys, Cincinnati.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES. By George Ticknor Curtis. New York: Harper & Brothers. The first volume of this work is now before us. The second volume will complete it. In his preface, Mr. Curtis states the object of his work: "How the Constitution of the United States came to be formed, from what circumstances it arose, what its relations were to institutions previously existing in the country, what necessities it satisfied, and what was its adaptation to the situation of these states, are all points of the gravest importance to the American people, and all of them require to be distinctly stated for their permanent value." These points he has kept steadily in view. This, we believe, is the first systematic effort to write a history of the Constitution; and it has been so thoroughly done—the sources of information have been so completely exhausted, and the materials put together with such artistic skill and such sound judgment—that there is no danger of the work being soon eclipsed by a successor. The style of Mr. Curtis is well adapted to such a composition—precise, lucid, and yet descriptive and flowing. The portraits of the principal actors among the framers of the Constitution, with which the volume closes, is no insignificant feature of the work. These portraits are drawn with a master hand, and evince a profound study of their originals on the part of their author. We regret that our space will not admit of a more extended review. The student of American history is laid under great obligations to Mr. Curtis for his admirable work. For sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

ARMAGEDDON; or, The Overthrow of Romanism and Monarchy.—This is a new exposition of prophecy, by S. D. Baldwin, A. M. In addition to the results indicated above, Mr. Baldwin finds "the existence of the United States foretold in the Bible; its future greatness; invasion by allied Europe; annihilation of monarchy; expansion into the millennial republic; and its dominion over the whole world." He believes the United States to be "Israel restored," and believes that we are to annex peaceably or by force nation after nation, till our republic embraces the entire earth. Whatever we may think of the conclusions of the author—and we confess we give but little credit to them—we can not but admire the earnestness of his spirit and the boldness of his speculations. He spends but little time in combating the theories of other authors, but applies himself to the development of his own. It is a curious work, and we commend it to the attention of the curious. "Young America" ought to "go in" for its wide circulation. It makes a thick 12mo. volume of 480 pages, and is gotten up in fine style by Applegate & Co., of Cincinnati.

WOOD'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1854. 12mo. Pp. 5".—This work bears internal evidence that its author loved his work, and prosecuted it con amore. A work on natural history, of a popular character, with a correct classification and with proper explanations of the meanings and derivations of scientific words for the benefit of the common student, has long been felt. This want is here supplied. Scattered through the work are no less than four hundred and fifty-three illustrations from original designs. We recommend the work to all our young friends who are interested in the study of natural history; and also to parents, as an excellent work for them to put into the hands of their children. For sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

THE want of a work composed of judicious selections from the Bible, and adapted to common school purposes, has long been felt by many practical educators of youth. This want is now supplied, and well supplied, so far as we can judge, by THE BIBLE READING-BOOK, prepared by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published by Lippencott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia. It contains portions of the history, biography, poetry, prophecy, precepts, and parables of the Old and New Testaments, such as form a connected narrative, in the exact words of Scripture, and in the order of the sacred books. It is not a mere skeleton of the Scriptures, but rather the heart of the holy book, and is, therefore, more likely to interest the heart of childhood. We believe all the miracles and all the prophecies relating to our Savior are here selected. The arrangement of the book is excellent; and we have no hesitation in saying that, for school purposes, it is preferable to the Bible in full. It may be had at the bookstores generally.

THE "ancient philosophers," taken as a whole, were a queer set of men; and their manners and habits, their whims and oddities, and their wit, wisdom, and folly furnish a few unique pages in the world's history. From these fields of inquiry Rev. Joseph Banvard has filled a 12mo. volume of 408 pages: WISDOM, WIT, AND WHIMS OF DISTINGUISHED ANCIENT PHILOSOPHERS. Published by Sheldon, Lamport & Blakeman, of New York. The work also contains many incidents in their personal history, and anecdotes of their intercourse among men, as well as their apothegms, proverbs, and pithy replies to different and curious questions. The work contains a great amount of curious and instructive information, not hitherto accessible to the general reader. For sale by Applegate & Co., Cincinnati.

PALEY'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY, with Notes and Additions, by Charles Murray Nairne, A. M., is a very fine edition of this standard work. It is by the same publishers, and also for sale by Moore, Wiltach & Keys, Cincinnati.

JEANNIE MORRISON; or, the Discipline of Life.

MARY DUNDAS; or, Passages in Young Life.

THE BROTHER AND SISTER; or, the Way of Life.

The above form a valuable addition to the series of works for the young, that are being issued from the press of the Carters. They are attractive in their character and healthful in their influence. For sale by Moore, Wiltach & Keys, Cincinnati.

THE CITY SIDE; or, Passages from a Pastor's Portfolio. Gathered by Cara Belmont. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co.—This is said to be an interesting work of the Sunny Side and Shady Side series; but we have not found time to read it. For sale by Applegate & Co., Cincinnati.

LIFE IN THE CLEARINGS VERSUS THE BUSH. By Mrs. Moodie. New York: Dewitt & Davenport.—This is a sort of companion or sequel to a former work by the same author: "Roughing it in the Bush." It abounds in gossip and anecdote, and has some amusing descriptions of scenes and characters. Moore, Wiltach & Keys, Cincinnati.

MERTON MERRIVILLE, by Paul Croyton, is now completed. Published by Phillips, Sampson & Co., Boston, and for sale by the booksellers generally.

PEARSON ON INFIDELITY.—This work, the octavo edition of which we noticed some time since, has been issued by the Messrs. Carter in a neat 16mo. volume. We reiterate our former high estimate of the work, and trust that, in the west as well as the east, it may have an extensive circulation. Moore, Wiltach & Keys, Cincinnati.

CHRISTIANITY DEMONSTRATED BY FACTS, by William P. Strickland, D. D., is a neat duodecimo volume of over 400 pages, which religious readers will find exceedingly useful in enlarging their views and strengthening their belief in regard to the validity and profuseness of the arguments and facts in favor of our holy Christianity.

THE AMERICAN RAILWAY GUIDE for the United States, published monthly by Dinsmore & Co., No. 9 Spruce-street, New York, is the only reliable work of the kind, and is an indispensable vademecum to every traveler.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE, for November, is a sterling number. We give the list of articles, and recommend the work cordially to all in pursuit of a first-class foreign monthly magazine: Turkey and its Population; Civilization—The Census; The Secret Agent; Color in Nature and Art; Latin Versification; The Influence of Gold upon the Commercial and Social Condition of the World—Part I; Peace and War; The War and the Ministry. Leonard Scott & Co., republishers, 79 Fulton-street, New York. Terms, $3 a year.

MINUTES OF THE CINCINNATI ANNUAL CONFERENCE, for the year 1854, show a total membership in the bounds of the conference of 32,266. This is an increase of about 100 for the year.

MINUTES OF THE SOUTH-EASTERN INDIANA CONFERENCE, for the year 1854, exhibit a Church membership of 22,500, an increase of about 1,800 for the year.

MICHIGAN ANNUAL CONFERENCE.—The Minutes of the nineteenth session of the Michigan annual conference for 1854, show a membership of 19,200, Church property to the amount of $246,000, and parsonages of $47,000. The sum of $3,449 was raised for missions, $119 for the Sunday School Union, $511 for the Tract Society, and $457 for the American Bible Society.

THE TWENTY-NINTH ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF THE WESLEYAN ACADEMY, Wilbraham, Mass., Rev. Minor Raymond, D. D., Principal, exhibits a list of 342 gentlemen pupils and of ladies 291—total, 263. The aggregate, by terms, shows for the year 900 names. Dr. Raymond manages the institution with great prudence and skill.

THE NEWBURY SEMINARY AND COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, Newbury, Vt., Rev. Henry S. Noyes, A. M., Principal, has had an average attendance for the year of 500 pupils. The total attendance for the year was 804.

THE FORT WAYNE FEMALE COLLEGE AND FORT WAYNE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, Rev. Samuel Brenton, A. M., President, has had an attendance, for the year 1854, of ladies 159, and of gentlemen 97—total, 256. The Institute, now in the seventh year of its existence, is enjoying a fine state of health and prosperity.

DISCOURSE ON THE OCCASION OF THE DEATH OF MISS EMILY P. WILKINSON, of Bloomington, Ill., from the pen of Rev. Professor Goodfellow, portrays the character of one who, though young in years, was ripe in the Christian graces.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER, a quarto, weekly, agricultural, literary, and family newspaper, is one of the best weekly journals in the country. Each number is embellished with engravings, illustrative of some agricultural or other topic under discussion. Terms, $2 a year. Published at Rochester, New York.

THE HOME JOURNAL, edited and published by George P. Morris and N. P. Willis, has maintained undiminished, during the year, its character for variety, life, and attractiveness. Its bill of fare for the ensuing year promises well. Published at New York, at $2 a year.

THE METHODIST ALMANAC, for 1855, maintains its former high character for fullness of Church statistics and general religious information. Its embellishments are numerous and tasteful.

Notes and Queries.

IS SALT GOOD FOR ANY THING?—Some of our agricultural exchanges have been discussing this question to a very decided extent. One of them, editorially and by correspondent, has struggled hard to make the impression that salt is always and invariably injurious to men and animals, taken with or without their food. "At the creation," runs a specimen of their logic, "there were no salt-troughs placed before cows or horses, or before animals of any sort." May be not; but is it positively certain that there were no salt springs near? "We believe that no animal would ever touch salt unless trained to it." Ah! indeed. Did no body ever hear of the "deer licks" of the west, or spots where salt water oozes out of the earth, and to which deer, buffalo, etc., are in the habit of resorting to lick the ground for hours? Certainly they were not trained to it! In Big-Bone Lick, Kentucky, the bones of innumerable species of living and extinct animals have been found. These certainly did not go there for the pleasure of killing themselves in the mire, but to obey an instinct of their nature. The Indians, who do not show many signs of intelligence above supplying their animal wants, knew the use of salt, even before they had any communication with white men, and would go to almost any length to obtain it; assuredly they were not trained! Salt, in our opinion, is good, and ought to be used. An incident is just now fresh in our memory. Several years ago an experiment was made in a penal establishment in Europe, where several convicts were kept on food without a particle of salt, till some of them died of worms, and the rest were only saved by giving it to them.

WHAT IS "LIE TEA?"—A vast amount of stuff which the knowing ones among the Chinese call lie tea, and a vast quantity of which is used, both in Europe and America, is made thus, according to an account furnished by John Lindley, F. R. S., Professor of Botany in University College, London: "The Chinese take a tub, into which they put a quantity of sand and similar substances, pounded leaves, vegetable dust, or any thing containing vegetable matter, with apparently some gypsum; this they sprinkle with rice-water. The rice-water, being of a glutinous nature, collects the composition into small balls, which hold together, and by degrees, by dexterous manipulations, the tubfull of this fraudulent material acquires the form of myriads of globules. In the next place these globules are faced and blacked with black lead, and then tintured green with a mixture of Prussian blue and chromate of lead. As to tea, there is not a particle in the whole mixture." This information may be of special interest to some of the lady tea-drinkers of the United States of North America.

SLEEPING AFTER DINNER.—Quite a variety of opinion prevails in regard to the safety and healthfulness of taking a nap immediately after dinner or a full meal. Dr. John C. Warren, Emeritus Professor of Anatomy and Surgery in Harvard University, in discussing the point, takes the ground that apoplexy has sometimes followed as a consequence of napping after dinner, and thinks, especially after a heavy dinner, the practice is very dangerous. Going to sleep on the back, or in an easy chair, the full stomach compresses the diaphragm and heart and prevents the free reception of blood, and causes an accumulation and compression of blood on the brain. By sleeping on the side little or no apprehension, as to the result, need be felt; for the lateral posture takes off the pressure of the loaded stomach from the heart and great bloodvessels, and leaves their circulation free.

DR. EDWARD YOUNG.—The North American Review, for October, has an article on Young, the poet, which runs over with a curious mixture of blame and praise. It concedes, in winding up, however, that the Doctor was considerable of a wit, besides being a solemn man and plous; and in illustration of this gives numerous examples, one of which is these two lines:

"Like cats in air-pumps, to subsist, we strive
On joys too thin to keep the soul alive."

Of the similes of Young the Review thinks the following very beautiful, picturesque, and scientifically accurate, wherein pleasure is compared with quicksilver:

"Pleasures are few, and fewer we enjoy;
Pleasure, like quicksilver, is bright and coy;
We strive to grasp it with our utmost skill,
Still it eludes us, and it glitters still;
If seized at last, compute your mighty gains;
What is it, but rank poison in your veins!"

WHAT IS SUNSHINE MADE OF?—In a paper published by the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on the "Mechanical Energies of the Solar System," Professor W. Thomas takes up certain views which have already been put forward, and, arguing them out, finds reason to believe the source of solar heat to be "undoubtedly material." This material consists in the countless meteors wheeling round continually in space—a tornado of shooting-stars, stragglers from which occasionally appear in our own atmosphere, but of which we see the main body in the zodiacal light. These, says the learned Professor, are gradually caught by the sun's attraction: "each meteor thus goes on moving faster and faster, and gathering nearer and nearer the center, till at some time, very suddenly, it gets so much entangled in the solar atmosphere as to begin to lose velocity. In a few seconds more it is at rest on the sun's surface, and the energy given up is vibrated in a minute or two across the district where it was gathered during so many ages, ultimately to penetrate as light the remotest regions of space." The objection, that we should see an augmentation in the bulk of the sun, is answered by the fact, that although the sun might grow a mile in diameter in eighty-eight years, yet forty thousand years would elapse before the apparent diameter to us would be increased by one second: and with what instruments shall we measure such a rate of progress? The sun may have gone on increasing in dimensions ever since the creation of man, quite undetected by us. For it to grow in reality as much as it appears to grow from winter to summer, would take 2,000,000 years.

COUNTRY CHURCH-YARDS.—"I went out," writes a correspondent, "one Sabbath, last November, along with a clerical friend, to fill an appointment at a Methodist chapel not one hundred miles from the city. The day was fine, the air bland and bracing, and I felt a good flow of exuberance and joyful satisfaction. By the time we reached the church, however, my spirits, like the mercury in a barometer at the approach of foul weather, suddenly fell. Why? There was the show of a fence around the church and the church graveyard, but the hogs were busy. The gate had long since gone to destruction, the lower boards of the fence were missing in more places than one, and there was an appearance of distress everywhere showing itself. The porcine quadrupeds aforesaid were unceasing in their efforts to root up the green sod of the graves, and, alas! they were altogether too successful in their work of destruction. How did I preach? Words came, but my heart was chilled by my view of the way in which the Lord's children keep the Lord's house and property. Is there no remedy, Mr. Editor, for such slovenliness? can not religion be made to help the habits of such Christians? and is not neatness, as Mr. Wesley has told us, 'next to godliness?' "

LEE VERSUS ISE.—"Mr. Editor,—I see you are going to give a little space to Queries and Notes. Well, sir, I intend to ply you with a few 'queries,' and leave you to supply the 'notes.' I have a lot of queries in relation to the orthography of the English language. One I will ask now. Why do certain words terminate with ise, as Christianize, civilize, brutalize, while others terminate with ies, as compromise, advertise, enterprise? and by what rule shall we determine whether the termination shall be ise or ies in any given word?"

To assign a reason and to give a rule are two very different things. We should be very reluctant to commit ourselves to the task of assigning a reason for all the peculiarities of English orthography. The reason for those peculiarities is sometimes to be found in the original source from which the word was derived, sometimes in the medium through which it was transmitted, and sometimes in causes incidental and hidden from the search of the keenest philologist. As to the rules in the case, we have heard the following suggested:

Rule I. When a complete word would remain after leaving off the termination, ise should be used, as realize, civilize, modernize, etc.

Rule II. When a word be incomplete without the termination, ies should be used, as demise, comprise, surmise, advise, enterprise, etc.

We apprehend, however, that these rules are liable to many "exceptions." Among them may be noted criticize, advertise, etc., from which, if the suffix ise be taken, complete words would remain; also recognize, dogmatize, alkalize, syllogize, deputize, etc., from which, if the suffix ies be taken, incomplete words would remain.

Our friend may find himself engaged in "The Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," but we hope he will persevere.

ENGLISH ORTHOGRAPHY.—"Query.—To what may the diversities in the orthography of the English language be attributed?"

Note.—These diversities, for the most part, reach back into the Anglo-Saxon. The following are probably the leading causes to which they may be attributed: 1. The original dialectic differences among the ancient Saxons, Angles, and Jutes. 2. The different local dialects that would inevitably spring up in an age where there was no printing, and among a people who were distributed into petty and distinct kingdoms, having comparatively little intercourse with, and little affinity for each other. 3. The introduction of Scandinavian terms from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. 4. The influence of the Norman conquest, and the consequent fusion or commingling of Saxon or Norman words. 5. The carelessness of early writers who attached but little consequence to orthography. In the Anglo-Saxon a single word was often spelled in as many as fifteen or twenty different ways. It is a curious fact that the name of Shakespeare is spelled in at least two different ways in his will. 6. Local and incidental causes, which will always exert more or less influence over a living language, whether written or spoken. These diversities in orthography Johnson termed "spots of barbarity;" and for a time it was claimed that he had removed them, and in his Dictionary had settled "the external form of the English language." But, alas! for the pride of human learning, these "spots" bid fair to outlive even the work of the great English lexicographer.

Mirror of Apothegm, Wit, Repartee, and Anecdote.

SABLE SERMONIZING.—The black minister was closing up his prayer when some white boys in the corner had the ill-manners to laugh, so that the sable suppliant heard them. He had said but a moment before and very earnestly, "Bress all dat is human," when the laugh occurred; and commencing again, just before the "amen," the pious old negro said: "O Lord, we are not in the habit of adding postscripts to our prayer, but if the 'spression, 'Bress all dat is human,' won't take in dese wicked white fellers, den we pray dat de Lord will bress some dat ain't human, also, besides!"

DWIGHT AND PUTNAM.—On the surrender of Burgoyne, General Putnam, overjoyed at the news, immediately spread it through the army, and shouts and firing of cannon signalized the glorious event. The Rev. Timothy Dwight, a chaplain in the army, preached a sermon at headquarters the next day, from the text, "I will remove far off from you the northern army." Never was a sermon so listened to before by the officers and troops. Putnam could not refrain from nodding, winking, and smiling during the discourse at the happy hits with which it was filled, and at its close was loud in his praises of Mr. Dwight and the sermon, though, to be sure, he said there was no such text in the Bible—the chaplain having coined it to meet the occasion. When shown the passage he exclaimed, "Well, there is every thing in that book, and Dwight knows just where to lay his finger on it."

FOLLOWING THE HOUNDS.—The Bishop of Oxford was rebuking one of his clergy for following the hounds. "My lord," replied the clergyman, "every man must have some relaxation, and I assure your lordship I never go to balls." "Ah," said the Bishop, "I perceive you refer to my having been at the Duchess of Sutherland's party; but I give you my word I never was in the same room with the dancers." "My lord," responded the clergyman, "my mare and I are getting old, and we are never in the same field with the hounds."

DR. M'NEILE AND DRUNKENNESS.—Rev. Dr. M'Neile issued a general invitation to the worshippers at St. Paul's, Liverpool, to a lecture on the evils of drunkenness. Some wag, well acquainted with the church-goers who like a glass, got the notice printed as a circular, and then sent it round among them, with the words, "Mr. ——— and friends are affectionately invited to attend." Great was the indignation at the Doctor, and especially in quarters that might seem most in need of the lecture.

CANDOR.—Marivaux, a celebrated French writer of romances, who flourished in the first half of the last century, having one day met with a sturdy beggar, who asked charity of him, he replied, "My good friend, strong and stout as you are, it is a shame that you do not go to work." "Ah, master," said the beggar, "if you did but know how lazy I am." "Well," replied Marivaux, "I see you are an honest fellow, here is half a crown for you."—Severard's Anecdotes.

THE ORPHAN'S REPLY.—A little boy, who was poorly clad, was tauntingly asked by a rude young man "if his mother knew he was out?" The little fellow looked at the interrogator a moment, while his bosom heaved and tears gathered in his eyes, and replied, "Sir, my dear mother is dead."

A METAPHYSICIAN.—Entering upon an argument with a metaphysician is like getting into an omnibus—you know where you start from, but it is impossible to tell where it will carry you.—Punch.

THE MOON.—The Mohammedans believe that the cavities which the telescope reveals in the surface of the moon are made by blows from the wings of angels. Quite the opposite, but hardly less fanciful, is the opinion of the sententious poet, Martin Farquhar Tupper, who locates hell in the moon, because, as astronomers inform us, not a drop of water is to be found on its surface.

STANLEY AND BROUGHAM.—Lord Stanley once alluded to Lord Brougham as "the noble lord who had just taken his seat;" but chancing to look round, and seeing the ex-chancellor jumping about like a cricket, begged pardon, and said he meant his noble friend who "never took his seat."

A ROSE AND ITS THORNS.—When Milton was blind he married a shrew. The Duke of Buckingham called her a rose. "I am no judge of colors," replied Milton, "but it may be so, for I feel the thorns daily."

BEN JONSON AND THE LORD.—Lord Craven was very desirous to see Ben Jonson, which being told to Ben, he went to the lord's house; but being in a very tattered condition, the porter refused him admittance with some saucy language, which the other did not fail to return. My lord happening to come out while they were wrangling, asked the occasion of it. Ben, who stood in need of nobody to speak for him, said he understood his lordship desired to see him. "You, friend!" said my lord, "who are you?" "Ben Johnson," replied the other. "No, no," quoth his lordship, "you can not be Ben Jonson, who wrote the 'Silent Woman;' you look as if you could not say boo to a goose." "Boo," cried Ben. "Very well," said my lord, better pleased at the joke than offended at the affront; "I am now convinced you are Ben Jonson."

RETOUR COURTEOUS.—Bethel, an Irish barrister, was the opposing counsel in a case in which M'Nally, the celebrated witty barrister was employed. Bethel made several rude personal observations on M'Nally, who, on that account, interrupted his opponent in his speech. Bethel, vexed at this, at last exclaimed, "Brother M'Nally, you have taken the liberty of forcing your remarks in the middle of my statements, and have several times broken the thread of my discourse." "Brother Bethel," said M'Nally, "why didn't you seize it better?" Bethel's father was a shoemaker, and his son was ashamed of him.

GRAY HEAD AND GRAY BEARD.—Cardinal Richelieu one day said to M. de Sart, a celebrated physician, "I am gray-headed, yet my beard is black; and your head is black, and your beard gray. Can you account for these appearances, doctor?" "Easily," replied de Sart; "they proceed from exercise—from labor of the parts; your eminence's brains have worked hard, and so have my jaws."

CHURCH-RATES AND THE QUAKER.—A collector of Church-rates in England called upon a Quaker, who kept a dry goods store, for the usual sum; the latter said, "Friend, is it right that I should pay, when I never attend the Established Church?" "The church is open to all," answered the collector, "and you might have attended if you had a mind to." The Quaker paid the money, and on the next day sent the collector a bill for broadcloth. The man came immediately, and, in great passion, asked the meaning of it, declaring that he never had a single article from his store. "O," said the Quaker, rubbing his hands, "the store was open for thee, and thou mightest have had the cloth if thou hadst a mind."

BANGOR GRAVEYARD.—The following inscription is on a tombstone in the church-yard at Bangor, Ireland. On the stone, which appears to be of red marble, there is the family arms with the motto,

"Fortis non Ferox."

The inscription is in Latin, thus:

"Hic atavis, abavis et avo sic patre creatus
Presbyteris, sanctis, Presbyter ipse jacet
Annos si spectes juvenis hos exiit, at si
Aut studis aut moras transiit ille senex."

The above may be freely translated as follows: "Here lies one who was himself a Presbyter, and sprung from a father, grandfather, great-grandfather, and remoter ancestors, who also were Presbyters. If you regard his years, he died young; but if either his attainments or his character, he passed from earth in a good old age."

A NATURAL MISTAKE.—A boy called a doctor to visit his father, who had the delirium tremens. Not rightly recollecting the name of the disease, he called it the devil's trembles—making very poor Latin, but very good English.

THE WORTH OF ELDERS.—A minister being asked of what use elders were in a Church, replied that, "It was to give power to ministers; he was a unit, the elders, ciphers—placed upon my right hand, they increase my power; but my elders have got on the wrong side, and reduce me to a fraction."

ONE LETTER.—The Glasgow Herald says of a deceased gentleman, "He was not more respected in public than revered in private." A cotemporary, in quoting the paragraph, completely reversed its signification, by dropping a single letter, and writing, "He was no more respected in public than revered in private." One letter does sometimes make a great difference.

HUMBUG.—Humbug, which is in universal use, comes unquestionably from Hume of the Bog, a Scotch laird, so called from his estates, who was celebrated in Edinburgh society, during the reign of William and Anne, for the marvelous tone of his stories, in which he indulged so commonly that they became proverbial; and thus a very long shot was always designated "a regular Hume of the Bog." Hence, by simple contraction, humbug.

THE NEW VOLUME.—With the present number we commence the fifteenth volume of the Ladies' Repository. The continued increase of public patronage has induced the publishers to enlarge the work from forty-eight to sixty-four pages, and to make sundry other improvements—all of which will, no doubt, be perceived and appreciated by our patrons and friends.

It is an interesting fact that the Repository will, this year, contain just double the number of pages it contained in 1840, when first issued, and also, that we have now monthly two steel engravings, in addition to a beautifully engraved title-page, for January, when in the first volume there were only four engravings inserted for the whole year: yet the work is now published at the same price. The large increase of circulation has enabled the publishers to make these improvements, so advantageous to our patrons. As our friends last year gave us the greatest increase to our circulation ever realized in a single year, we now repay them by making the greatest improvement ever made in any one year.

The editor, too, would take the opportunity to present his congratulations to his old friends, and trusts that he will still be permitted to make his monthly visits to their home circles. Heaven's blessings be upon you, dear friends, young and old! "May your shadows never be less!" as saith the old proverb.

To his new friends, timidly and modestly, would he make his best bow—hoping that his acquaintance with them may be long continued and productive of mutual good.

ARTICLES IN THIS NUMBER.—We have rarely presented so great a variety, both as to style and matter, in any one number as in this. "The Inspired Man," from the terse and vigorous pen of J. D. Bell; the "Life and Times of William Jay," from the sprightly pen of Erwin House; "Moral Education," from the smooth and classic pen of Dr. Thomson; the touching incident in the life of Bishop Hedding, so illustrative of his character, from Dr. Pad-dock; and the fine article on the Daughters of China, from Dr. Wiley, are worthy of special attention from every reader. We have also some articles of a briefer and lighter character, some poetic gems, and also some carefully prepared selections to complete our circle of adaptation. Various as may be the tastes and turns of our readers, we endeavor to serve a dish for all.

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—The New Cover.—The new engraving we have had for our cover will be among the first objects that will arrest the attention. Some will look upon it just as the chubby, bright-eyed, dimple-cheeked, curly-headed child at the left of the base views it—simply as a picture. See, his eye is turned outward as though he would attract attention—his hand pointing where he would direct that attention, and his face wreathed in smiles, as much as to say, "Ain't that a pretty picture?" Such, we trust, will be the verdict of all who look at it simply as a picture.

Others will wish to study it more fully, to examine its artistic execution. Such will find a delightful blending of the symbols of "literature and religion." Music is represented by the harp, the guitar, and the piano; painting by the portfolio, the pallet, and the easel; science by the telescope and the globe; literature also by its appropriate insignia. In the female figure on the left, learning and literature are connected with woman. The artist has done well to put a pen in her hand; for in these days the pen in the hand of woman is exerting a transcendent influence. In the figure on the right religion is also appropriately connected with woman; she sustains the cross, and her clear intellectual and spiritual eye pierces to the highest summits of heaven-born faith.

St. Louis.—We here present our readers with another of our splendid views of American cities. It is from an original drawing, and was engraved expressly for the Repository. St. Louis is one of the prominent cities of the west. It is situated on the west bank of the Mississippi, twenty miles below the mouth of the Missouri, and nearly two hundred above that of the Ohio. It is nearly equidistant from New Orleans to the Falls of St. Anthony, each being about eleven hundred and fifty miles distant. It is the great commercial metropolis of Missouri, and was formerly the capital of the state. Its site is elevated above the river, so as to protect it from being submerged by any of its floods, and it is also protected by a limestone bank extending along the shore nearly two miles. These are rare advantages. The city extends along the bank of the river about three miles, and the streets cross each other at right angles—running either parallel with the river or at right angles to it. The bank in the rear is some forty feet higher than the first level, and overlooks the city, the river, and the surrounding country. The population of the city is about 90,000. There are some fifty churches. The Catholics have a strong hold here, having a splendid Cathedral and a well-sustained college. The city is admirably situated for trade, and its trade surpasses that of any other city on the river except New Orleans. Steamboats ply from this place, in almost every direction, and the number of arrivals in a single year have amounted to nearly a thousand. It has also become a large manufacturing place.

St. Louis was first settled in 1664 by a company of merchants, to whom the Dictator-General of Louisiana had given a grant for the exclusive trade with the Indian tribes on the Missouri. In 1770 there was a French garrison here and about forty private houses. Ten years later an expedition of one hundred and forty British and fifteen hundred Indians was sent out from Mackinaw to capture the place. It, however, was successfully defended against their attack.

For the past thirty years the city has enjoyed a very rapid growth. It is the natural depot of the vast and fertile regions watered by the Upper Mississippi, the Missouri, the Illinois, and their numerous tributaries. It can hardly fail to become, in time, one of the great cities of the new world.

Bishop Janes.—Our engraver, Mr. Jones, has been remarkably successful in the production of this likeness. As it regards fidelity of expression and artistic skill in the execution, we think it will be ranked among the very best of the many portraits he has engraved.

Bishop Janes was a native of Salisbury, Litchfield county, Connecticut. He was a school-teacher in his earlier days, and, at the time of his entrance upon the ministry, we believe he was principal of an academy in New Jersey. He was received on trial in the Philadelphia conference in 1830, and stationed at Elizabethtown, New Jersey. In 1834 he was appointed agent for Dickinson College, then in its infancy. In this agency he continued two years, and was then stationed in Fifth-Street Church, Philadelphia. In 1839 he was transferred to the New York conference, and stationed in Mulberry-Street Church. In 1841 he was elected Financial Secretary of the American Bible Society. In this capacity he traversed nearly or quite all the states of the Union, eloquently and successfully pleading the cause of the Bible.

At the General conference of 1844 he was elected a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. All will pronounce the accompanying a truthful portrait.

Title-Page.—A charming little picture, too, the engraver has given us for our title-page. Children and flowers—how beautiful the association!

ARTICLES DECLINED.—"Thoughts on Education" evinces considerable vigor of mind, but there are some crude expressions and defective figures which indicate inexperience. Take the following from the very first sentence: "The old man whose hoary locks are tottering on the verge of time." Steps, not locks, totter.

We are sorry to disoblige our friends, but we can hardly find place for the following articles: "Charles Lee," "A Tribute to my Departed Mother," "Woman's Sphere," "We may Live," "Bunyan's Times"—the author will pardon the editor, but it appears to have been rather carelessly written—"Autumnal Reflections"—albeit the fair authoress has vigor of mind, and if she will prune her compositions of some of their overloaded foliage they will bear print yet—and also "A Contrast."

"The Primrose," early flowering plant though it be, seems to have blossomed prematurely. Some of its lines are little more than half-grown; others are of an uncomfortable length. It reminds us of the following stanza which we have somewhere seen:

"There are, it is true, some crippled lines, namely,
That have too few feet and crawl lamely;
But then, as a compensation for that, you will meet
Many others that run along on a superabundance of feet."

EXCERPTA FROM CORRESPONDENCE.—Our preparations under this head we have been compelled to omit for want of room.

MISCELLANY.—The Best Sign of a Call to the Ministry.—William Jay mentions the case of a young man who thought he was called to the ministry. The thought originated with himself; neither his pastor nor the Church knew anything about it. The young man, however, must needs consult somebody, and calling upon Mr. Jay he was directed to an "older authority." This was a man of blunt, straightforward manner. The young man sought an interview with him; told him that he had been for some time satisfied of his call to the ministry, and asked his aged adviser what he deemed the best sign or evidence of a Divine call to the work. "Sir," said the sage, "what I should deem the best sign or evidence would be a man's not thinking of it, but considering himself the last person in the world God would select for this purpose; and who, if God came for him, would be found like Saul, 'hid among the stuff,' and requiring an effort to draw him out." We commend this incident to the attention of those who imagine themselves called to the ministry, while no corresponding conviction seems to be wrought in the Church.

The Woof of Scandal.—Mr. Wilberforce relates that at one time he found himself chronicled as "St. Wilberforce" in an opposing journal, and the following given as "an instance of his Pharisaism." "He was lately seen," says the journal, "walking up and down in the Bath Pump Room reading his prayers, like his predecessors of old, who prayed in the corners of the streets to be seen of men." "As there is generally," says Mr. Wilberforce, "some slight circumstance which perverseness turns into a charge or reproach, I began to reflect, and I soon found the occasion of the calumny. It was this: I was walking in the Pump Room in conversation with a friend; a passage was quoted from Horace, the accuracy of which was questioned, and as I had a Horace in my pocket I took it out and read the words. This was the plain bit of wire which factious malignity sharpened into a pin to pierce my reputation." How many ugly pins have been manufactured out of even smaller bits of wire than even that!

STRAY GEMS.—Every body complains of his memory—nobody of his judgment. . . . Phoebus endows the weak poet, like the statue of Memnon, only with sound. . . . By so much the more are we inwardly foolish, by how much we strive to seem outwardly wise.—St. Gregory in Mor. . . . Those who understand the value of time treat it as prudent people do their money—they make a little go a great way.—Hawkey. . . . If you do not keep pride out of your souls, and your souls out of pride, God will keep your souls out of heaven.—Dyer. . . . There is a greater depravity in not repenting of sin when it has been committed than in committing it at first. To deny, as Peter did, is bad; but not to weep bitterly, as he did, when we have denied, is worse.—Pygson. . . . Peter stood more firmly after he had lamented his fall than before he fell, inasmuch that he found more grace than he had lost.—St. Ambrose in Ser. ad Vincula. . . . He who is always his own counselor will often have a fool for his client.—Hunter. . . . Temptations are a file which rub off much of the rust of self-confidence.—Fenelon. . . . The most mischievous liars are those who keep just on the verge of truth. . . . Gravity is the ballast of the soul. . . . Learning hath gained most by those books by which the printers have lost. . . . Contentment consisteth not in adding more fuel, but in taking away some fire. . . . Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl chain of all virtues. . . . Scorn no man for his poverty; honor no man for his wealth.—Turkish Prov.

ANOTHER WORD TO THE FRIENDS OF THE REPOSITORY.—Will you, dear friends, bear another word of exhortation from your friend, the editor?

Of our brother ministers we would inquire, Have you done all you could to promote the circulation of the Repository among the members of your congregations? Has effort been made—prompt, energetic effort? Has the congregation—nay, the whole neighborhood—been canvassed by yourselves, or by agents appointed by you, to obtain subscribers? Now is the time for action; not a moment is to be lost. Continue, brethren, to roll up our subscription list.

Will not our old and present subscribers help us? You receive the work to your own home and give it a hearty welcome; but may you not be the instrument of sending it to the HOME OF YOUR NEIGHBOR? Show this number to him, to his wife, to his daughter, and invite them to subscribe for the volume. Let them see the work, its contents, its engravings, the beauty of its mechanical execution, and tell them all this is to be had for two DOLLARS. They will hardly be able to resist the temptation to subscribe. Your pastor will be ready to receive it and transmit the money.

LITERARY WOMEN OF AMERICA.

BY THE EDITOR.

MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

A NEW era has opened in the literary history of woman. One of the striking characteristics of the present age is the great number of female writers that have appeared, the wide celebrity they have attained, and the transcendent influence their writings are exerting upon the taste, the morals, the heart, and the intellect of the age. That this is a true development of womanly nature is evident from the fact, that, with some slight exceptions, their productions are addressed to the moral and religious sentiments, and contain healthy aliment for each. More spiritual and refined in her sensibilities than is the opposite sex, she has a keener and a more truthful perception of all that pertains to our emotional nature, and her delineations often prove more just and natural. We hail this development of woman's talent as one of the most auspicious indications of the time—betokening the dawn of a brighter and purer day in the world of literature.

This new development, so strongly marked, especially in American literature, is worthy the attention of the journalist, not only as an event characteristic of the age, but on account of its influence on the present and its promise for the future. The astronomer marks the progress of the sun through the heavens by the movement of its light upon the sun-dial. So would we mark the progress of this movement across the horizon of literature. Each one of the characters that appear furnishes a point of observation, and marks a new stage of progress. To this end, as well as for the interest and profit of the reader, as we pass along, we propose a series of sketches of the literary women of America.

Whether we consider the length of time she has been recognized in the world of literature, the steady growth and permanent character of her fame as a writer, the wide celebrity she has attained, both in the new and the old world, and, above all, the number, variety, and usefulness of her productions, we know not of a more appropriate name with which to commence this series than that of Mrs. Lydia Huntley Sigourney.

The town of Norwich, Connecticut, is honored as being the birthplace of Miss Huntley, afterward Mrs. Sigourney. The first inhabitants, who settled here at an early date, planted themselves in a narrow valley by the side of the little river Yantic. From this spot, however, the tide of population and business has been diverted to more convenient localities in its immediate vicinity. It is called the Old Town, to distinguish it from the parts that have more recently become populous. The place is described as being one of romantic interest. Seated in a basin formed by surrounding hills, it looks up and around upon an almost endless variety of natural scenery. Here craggy rocks, gray with age and beaten by the storms and blasts of centuries, tower above the quiet village. There sloping greens, and limpid streams, and landscape beauty greet the eye and inspire the imagination. It seemed a place designed by nature to develop the powers of the soul—to render the mind vigorous, self-reliant, and strong—and to fire the imagination with conceptions of the beautiful, the grand, the sublime. In the most picturesque part of "Old Town" Miss Huntley first breathed the vital air, September 1, 1791. Her parents were in moderate circumstances; her father devoted himself to agricultural avocations, but had not, at that time, any proprietorship in the soil. Fortunately for the genius of the daughter, while their situation was such as to beget refinement of taste and manner, it was also such as to make "industry necessary, beneficence practicable, luxury impossible." Mr. Huntley was of Scotch descent, and for some time served his country as a soldier in her struggle for independence. He was a man of great probity and integrity of character, of fervent piety, of warm and earnest benevolence, and of unbroken equanimity of disposition. He pursued his daily labors with that contented and happy spirit which made his life's thread run smoothly. The genial sunshine of his heart, which beamed on all around him, continued to grow without abatement, and accumulating years had so little effect upon him, that in his eighty-eighth year it was said of him, "His mind was clear, and his step elastic. Age had sprinkled no snow upon his head or his heart. Life was bright and warm with lingering affections, yet with 'loins girt and lamp burning' he serenely waited the summons of his Lord." The maiden name of her mother was Wentworth; and her line of descent is traced back to the old Tory governors who were so highly honored for their loyalty to the crown of England. She possessed strong powers of mind, a remarkable memory, a vivid imagination, and a warm heart. Her educational opportunities had been limited, and her education was consequently defective. But the best efforts of her strong natural powers were devoted, with exceeding care and tenderness, to the nurture of her only child—the subject of this sketch. The daughter was not spoiled by overweening fondness and indulgence, but sedulously trained to habits of systematic order and persevering diligence in the tasks and duties assigned to her.

The situation in which we find the young poetess placed in early childhood—the natural scenery that surrounded her—the character and position of her parents, were admirably adapted to the development of her native powers. Even her being an only child, inducing, as it did in her case, the substitution of intellectual pleasures and pursuits for the common sports of childhood, exerted a powerful influence upon her early—almost premature development. Her precocity was remarkable. At the age of three she could read her Bible fluently and correctly. At seven the indications of her genius began to appear more distinctly, and she was often found composing verses for her amusement. One year later she had become "a scribbler of rhymes." At nine she began a fictitious work in the epistolary style, and at eleven commenced keeping a regular daily journal. Into this journal she incorporated her verses and other writings as though they were a part of the record of her life and feelings. All these scribbles, however, were kept sacredly private. So fearful was she that some one might discover them, that she resorted to various methods of concealment. Having neither lock nor key in her possession, she would hide them under piles of books, or carefully place them away in some spot where no intruder would be likely to discover the hidden treasure.

Another circumstance connected with her early history, and exerting a powerful influence upon her whole character and subsequent career, is found in her early connection with Madam Jerusha Lathrop, widow of Dr. Lathrop, of Norwich, and daughter of Hon. John Talcott, Governor of the state from 1735 to 1741 inclusive. She was truly "a noble lady of the olden time." Mr. Huntley became her steward, and his family lived in the fine old mansion. Madam Lathrop had lost her own children while they were yet young, and she now became tenderly attached to this young and timid child that nestled beneath her roof. The attachment was mutual, and so strong did it become while Lydia Huntley was yet a child, that the two became almost inseparable companions. At this period of her life, says one, "What mind, however sagacious, would have recognized in this young girl, remarkable for the delicate richness of her cheek and the sweet docility of her disposition—as she sat in her little chair, reading aloud to her beloved benefactress from Young's Night Thoughts or Bishop Sherlock's Discourses—or curiously conning her own rude rhymes at eight years of age—or running in glee over the turf of the court-yard in front of the mansion, decked with roses and sweet-brier, of Madam Lathrop—or rushing through the spruce-arched gateway—or sweeping floors with elaborate skill—or trying to iron—or steadying the young fruit-tree that her father was planting—or dropping the garden-seeds behind him—or spinning upon her mother's great wheel—ever accompanying her industry with a happy song—who would have ever recognized in this girl the future 'Hemans of America?' Who would have guessed that she would in later years be the admirer of the great—the confidential correspondent of Hannah More—the friend of Joanna Bailie and the Countess of Blessington—the recipient of costly gifts from royalty in honor of her muse—and the most famous of the female bards of her country?"

In the house of Madam Lathrop she enjoyed many advantages which the straitened condition of her parents could never have afforded her. Intercourse with one so noble could not but tend to beget a corresponding nobleness of mind and gentility of manner. Here, too, she became acquainted with many of the distinguished personages of the time, for the princely mansion of Madam Lathrop was a favorite resort for such persons. And, perhaps, above all, here she had access to a library of select books, and was surrounded by all the blandishments of refined and chastened culture. And, besides all this, even her own mother scarcely watched over the unfolding genius of the young girl with deeper interest than did this noble Christian woman. When the timidity of the young poetess had been so far overcome, her benefactress was the constant critic to whom all her productions were submitted; and her smile of approbation and words of encouragement were the highest rewards that the young aspirant had ever conceived.

This association continued with unabated interest till Miss Huntley had attained the age of fourteen years, when she was deprived of her benefactress by death. This was the first great sorrow that had pierced her young heart, and long and sincerely did she lament it. "Nor has her mind ever lost the influence of this early association. It has kept with her through life, and runs like a fine vein through all her writings. The memory, the image, the teachings of this sainted friend seem to accompany her like an invisible presence, and wherever the scene may be, she turns aside to commune with her spirit, or to cast a fresh flower upon her grave. In the lines upon planting slips of constancy on the grave of a friend, found in her first publication of poems, she says:

'Seven times the sun with swift career
Has marked the circle of the year,
Since first she pressed her lowly bier:
And seven times sorrowing have I come,
Alone, and wandering through the gloom,
To breathe my lays upon her tomb.'

Being an only child, Miss Huntley was the object of the tender and yearning affection of her parents; all their earthly hopes centered in her; and all their plans of life seemed to have almost exclusive reference to her. In turn, her affection for them was no less unceasing and ardent. When, subsequently, she became the wife of a wealthy merchant in Hartford, and the mistress of a noble mansion, her parents were made the partakers of her own home; and here, beneath the roof of their loved and cherished daughter, blessed by her filial love, both of them peacefully closed their eyes in their last and long sleep.

After the death of Madam Lathrop, her young protegee found an equally true friend and an equally faithful benefactor in her nephew, Daniel Wadsworth, of Hartford, a man of great wealth, and of equal refinement and benevolence of character. To him she had been commended by her benefactress, and from him did she constantly receive protecting care and encouragement.

Miss Huntley's early ambition was to become a teacher. Referring to her childhood's days, she says, "My own predominant desire, lowly yet persevering, and coeval with the earliest recollections, was to keep a school. In the most cherished and vivid pencilings of fancy, I was ever installed in the authority and glory of a school-mistress, counseling, explaining, or awarding premiums, always listened to, regarded, and obeyed. Nor were these dreamings quite destitute of vitality. As they created a deeper indwelling in the profession which I had secretly chosen, they gave also some practical preparation for it." How often it is that in these predilections of childhood, "coming events cast their shadows before," with reference to the coming life of activity! It is said that the favorite sport of Hannah More, in her childhood, was, in her coach manufactured by her imagination out of a chair, "to go up to London and see bishops, and booksellers." That of Mrs. Sigourney was "to keep school."

When she became of sufficient age, she was sent to "the district school," which consisted of some seventy scholars. Here she was distinguished for the ease and thoroughness with which her lessons were acquired. Her love of study was passionate, and her devotion to it unremitted and intense. Only a few years since Mrs. Sigourney said, "I now recall with fresh pleasure the intense industry of that period of life, when, after the close study of a long winter evening, my books were laid under the pillow at retiring, as sentinels, lest the newly acquired ideas should chance to escape. They were also consulted at the dawning light, if, in the solitary recitation of lessons to myself as a teacher, aught of doubt or of hesitation occurred." Another writer, referring to the early period of her school-training, says, "Then the sexes were not, contrary to the law of nature as developed in the family, penned up apart, to take away from one the stimulus of masculine strength, and from the other the softening influences of female delicacy. We remember that we once heard Mrs. Sigourney say, that one of the most profitable periods of her early culture, was that in which she, with several other young ladies, successfully struggled to retain their places with honor in a class containing several young men of talent, who were pursuing at school the studies of the first year in Yale College." One of the young gentlemen of this class was Jabez W. Huntington, afterward a judge of the Supreme Court of the state, and also a member of the senate of the United States. Another was the Hon. Henry Story, an eminent lawyer in the same state. It is doubtful which sex derived the greatest advantage from this spur to industry and intellectual activity.

Her first attempt at school-teaching was in a private room in the apartments of her parents, and her school consisted of two young ladies. She spent six hours daily with them, being as thorough and rigid in her instructions and examinations as though a whole class were profiting by her labors.

Having now satisfied herself of her mission as a teacher, she was desirous of acquiring a more thorough preparation for her work. For this purpose, in company with a dear female friend, Miss Ann Maria Hyde, she spent some time in Hartford, and at the close of her term she returned to Norwich, and, in company with her friend, opened a school for young ladies. Here the two met with great success. A large class was gathered under their instruction. "Into this circle," says one who enjoyed their instructions, "they cast not only the affluence of their well-stored minds, and the cheering inspiration of youthful zeal, but all the strength of their best and holiest principles. Animated, blooming, happy, linked affectionately, arm in arm, they daily came in among their pupils, diffusing love and cheerfulness, as well as knowledge, and commanding the most grateful attention and respect. Pleasant it is to the writer of this sketch, to review those dove-like days—to recall the lineaments of that diligent, earnest, mind-expanding group; and to note again the dissimilarity so beautifully harmonious, between those whom we delighted to call our sweet sister-teachers—the two inseparables, inimitables." This school enterprise was continued two years, when the two parted to pursue the same occupation, indeed, but in different spheres. A year or two later Miss Hyde was taken away in the midst of her usefulness and promise. Her memory was sacredly cherished by her companion, and often has her pen been employed to honor her virtues and her talents.

In 1814, on the invitation of Mr. Wadsworth, Miss Huntley transferred her residence to Hartford, and under his auspices she opened a school for young ladies. Her residence here was in the mansion of Madam Wadsworth, the mother of her patron, where she enjoyed every advantage of refined society, and every means of intellectual culture. Her habit of composing verses was observed by Mr. Wadsworth, and at his instance her fugitive pieces were gathered together—both himself and his estimable wife assisting in their preparation for the press—and published in 1815, under the title of "Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse." The publication, under the excellent management of Mr. Wadsworth, was quite successful, and, it is said, yielded a larger profit than she ever realized from a single edition of any one of her subsequent works. The entire sum was presented to her aged and straitened parents, as the first-fruits of the genius they had so carefully cultivated.

In 1819 Miss Huntley was married to Mr. Charles Sigourney, a merchant of Hartford. Mr. Sigourney is descended from a Huguenot family, who emigrated to this country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In his earlier life, it is said, he possessed strong predilections for literature, and cultivated it with great ardor. He had been for many years a successful man of business, an active member of the Episcopal Church, and a zealous friend and patron of the Trinity College, located in Hartford. The beautiful spot where the favored couple made their home, was long known as "the Sigourney Place," and perhaps is to the present day. It was a place where the muses might delight to make their visits, and their inspiration would be felt to be in harmony with the scene.

Mrs. Sigourney had now fairly entered upon her literary career. Her second work was a biographical sketch of, and a just tribute to, her early and worthy companion, Miss Hyde. In 1822 she published her "Traits of the Aborigines of America," a poem in five cantos, and, two years later, a prose work, "Connecticut Forty Years Since." From that time forward her prolific pen has been busied in contributions, not merely to American, but also to English literature; for her works early found their way across the Atlantic, and, in spite of the ill-natured and ill-mannerly growling of some of John Bull's bull-dog critics, found considerable favor among the English people. Her productions, in both prose and poetry, are numerous—numbering now not less than forty-one volumes. Aside from her poems, her books for children, her "Letters to Mothers," "Letters to my Pupils," and "Letters to Young Ladies" are among the most popular of her productions.

Of the latter work the following anecdote, showing the wide extent of her usefulness and the appreciation in which her productions are held where it would have been but little expected, is worthy of being placed upon record. The story is on this wise. Some eight or ten years since, an American gentleman was traveling in a stage-coach through a rustic part of Scotland. "His compagnon du voyage chanced to be a young Scotch lassie of considerable vivacity and intelligence. A stage-coach acquaintance was the natural result of circumstances, and the gentleman was soon known to be an American. The first question put by the young girl, after she had made this discovery, was, 'Have you ever seen Mrs. Sigourney?' The gentleman claimed the honor of an acquaintance with the American authoress, and a lively conversation ensued respecting her. The young lady expressed her ardent admiration of her works; but the gentleman was somewhat surprised to find that that admiration was founded as much on her 'Letters to Young Ladies' as on her poetry. The genial kindness expressed in that little volume had touched the young girl's heart, and its author was her beau idéal of a woman."

In 1840 she visited England and the continent of Europe. Here she spent a year, passing the summer in England and Scotland, and the winter in Paris. In London she published two volumes—one containing her selected poems superbly illustrated—which were highly spoken of by the critics, and well received by the British public. She was well received in the literary circles of the old world, and treated with marked distinction. While in Paris she wrote a piece "in honor of the magnificent celebration of the return of Napoleon's remains from St. Helena." It attracted much attention, and American genius was honored with the present of a magnificent bracelet from the Queen of France. After her return to this country, Mrs. Sigourney gave an account of her tour, and of her impressions of persons and things in the old world, in a volume entitled, "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands." About the same time her "Pocahontas and other Poems" was also given to the world.

When she was about setting sail for Europe, before bidding her children farewell, she took them to the graves of their grandparents, and there pledged them to protect and cultivate the flowers she had planted upon the sacred spot. The poem composed on the occasion is so full of tender pathos, so expressive of natural and holy feeling, and, at the same time, so touchingly plaintive, that it finds an open door into the innermost soul of every one capable of appreciating such sacred sentiments. Taken in connection with the circumstances of its origin, it gives such a beautiful illustration of the pure and holy sentiments that pervade her own heart, and give tone and character to her muse, that our readers will be pleased to see it entire:

"We've set the flow'rets where ye sleep,
Father and mother dear,
Their roots are in the verdure deep,
Their petals bear a tear.
The tear-drop of the dewy eve
Each trembling casket fills,
Mix'd with that essence of the heart
That filial love distills.

Mother! above thy lowly couch
I've set thy favorite flower,
The bright-eyed purple violet,
That decked thy summer bower;
The fragrant camomile, that spreads
Its tendrils, fresh and green,
And richly broiders every niche
The velvet turf between.

I kiss'd the timid violet,
That drooped its stranger head,
And called it blees'd, thus to grow
So near my precious dead.
And when my ventures path shall lead
Across the deep, blue sea,
I bade it in its beauty rise
And guard these graves for me.

Mother! there was no other hand
To do this deed for thee;
No other nursing claimed thy care,
Or fondly climbed thy knee.
And, father! that endearing name,
No infant lip but mine
E'er breathed, to wake thy tender prayer
At morn, or eve's decline.

O! spare to pluck these sacred plants,
Ye groups that wander nigh,
Where summer sunsets fire with gold
The gorgeous western sky,
That when your sleep is in the dust,
Where now your footsteps tread,
Some grateful hand the rose may train
Around your peaceful bed!"

The noble and generous Wadsworth was gathered to his fathers, at the ripe age of seventy-seven, in 1848. Her Monody on his death is a noble tribute to his memory—alike celebrating the virtues of his character and evincing the lofty genius of his protegee. We can not resist the temptation to append the following stanza:

"O friend! thou didst o'er-master well
The pride of wealth, and multiply
Good deeds not alone for the good of man,
But for heav'n's judging pen,
And clear, omniscient eye.
And surely where 'the just made perfect' dwell,
Earth's voice of highest eulogy
Is like the bubble of the far-off sea;
A sigh upon the grave,

Scarce moving the frail flowers that o'er its surface wave."

In 1850 Mrs. Sigourney was called to suffer the great bereavement of her life. She was the mother of two children, a son and a daughter. Her son, Andrew M. Sigourney, was a child of early and promising development. And childhood's early promise was just beginning to be realized in early manhood, when he was stricken by disease and death. Of this son Mrs. Sigourney has published an affecting memorial, entitled, "The Faded Hope." He died leaving behind him evidences of a pious and holy trust in God. Only a parent who has been thus bereaved, can realize what blighting of hope and what anguish of heart were comprised in that sad and great bereavement. But "she who brought him into the world, and loved him as her own soul, was strengthened to kiss the cold damps from his forehead, and close his unquivering eyelids. Over the immovable features there came afterward an exceeding beauty, such as they had never worn while he was a dweller in these tents of clay. Lifelike, and untinged by 'decay's effacing fingers,' it seemed to speak the glorious liberty of the sons of God." The incidents of his childhood, the methods adopted for the early development of his mind, and the right training of his heart by a devoted mother, his own youthful thoughts and scribbles, as well as plans and aspirations, and the touching incidents of his decline and death, make the "Faded Hope" alike interesting and suggestive.

Mrs. Sigourney is still ardently devoted to literary pursuits, as is evident from the fact that she is not only a contributor to some of the best magazines of the day, but within the past two years no less than four volumes from her diligent pen have been given to the public, and one—"Sayings for the Little Ones and Poems for their Mothers"—at the time of this writing, is just being issued from the press. Her literary correspondence is very large, and necessarily occupies a considerable portion of her time. Indeed, we have noticed that in a single year her correspondence required of her the writing of nineteen hundred letters. Great industry, method, and punctuality are striking traits of her character, and reveal the secret of her being able to accomplish so much in so short a time and with so little apparent injury to her bodily health and elasticity of spirits.

Yet even these literary labors have not engrossed her whole time. She gives practical demonstration that genius and literature are not incompatible with the proper discharge of the indispensable duties of the mother and the mistress of a household. She devoted herself personally to the education of her children—not even committing her son to the superintendence of another till he was ten years of age; and the mother became convinced that it would be salutary for him "to acquire somewhat more self-reliance than the sheltering indulgence of domestic nurture is wont to teach." It has been well said of her that "she has sacrificed no womanly or household duty, no office of friendship or benevolence for the society of the muses. That she is able to perform so much in so many varied departments of literature and social obligation, is owing to her diligence. She acquired in early life that lesson—simple, homely, but invaluable—to make the most of passing time. Hours are seeds of gold; she has not sown them on the wind, but planted them in good ground, and the harvest is consequently a hundred fold." Worthy of double honor is our noble country-woman, who has thus given to all lady aspirants to the walks of literature a beautiful example of the harmony that may subsist between the highest development of genius and the daily exercise of womanly duties.

We had intended to give some critical remarks upon the genius and writings of Mrs. Sigourney along with this sketch, but our article has already grown to such a length that we must defer them to our next number. We will close for the present, then, with a personal notice of this distinguished woman, written some five or six years since; but as appropriate now, for aught we know, as when first written. "She has now arrived at full maturity of age, yet her complexion still retains a soft, ruddy glow, and her brown hair has not a speck of gray. Her profile is unusually classical. Her eyes are of a light gray. Her expression is the soul of amiability, and years have not affected the freshness of her spirit or the sparkle of her mind. Summery and genial as the air of June, her disposition is such as to win the stranger and attach friends to her as with cords of steel. May she live long to honor—by her character and genius—the women of America!"

WHAT THERE IS IN HISTORY.

MAN is in history—its most wonderful, and often its most perplexing phenomenon. Angels are in history—opening its mysterious seals, sounding its awful trumpets, and pouring forth its dreadful vials. Satan is in history—ever active to suggest what is evil, arrest what is good, or overthrow what is holy, pure, permanent, divine. Yes, God is in all history, whether he be seen or not; in its minutest winding, in its gentlest ripple, and in its roaring cataracts, in its longest chapter and in its shortest paragraph, at your festivals and funerals, beside the baby's cradle and above the monarch's throne.

TO MY WIFE,

ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF MY BIRTHDAY.

BY A. HILL.

I'm thirty-nine to-day, love,
 And stand in manhood's prime,
 And pause upon my way, love,
 To mark the flight of time.
 One-half, and that the best, love,
 Of my brief life is past;
 It used to seem too slow, love,
 But now it flies too fast.

I've traveled up the hill, love,
 And cull'd life's sweetest flowers;
 I've wandered through the vale, love,
 And passed some happy hours.
 I've angled in the stream, love,
 And sailed upon the sea,
 And many precious hours, love,
 Have whiled away with thee.

I've frolick'd in my youth, love,
 Upon the village green;
 But that was long ago, love,
 And years have rolled between.
 My mates have passed away, love,
 But few of them remain;
 Yet I would not go back, love,
 To be a boy again.

Of kindred, some remain, love,
 To cheer me on my way;
 While others in their graves, love,
 Have slept for many a day.
 I seem to see their faces, love,
 Those dear ones of my heart,
 And feel again the pang, love,
 Compelling us to part.

They come at memory's call, love,
 And group around me here;
 Their voices are so sweet, love,
 I'm pleased to have them near.
 A gentle mother's eyes, love,
 Seem beaming from on high,
 And brothers, sisters, father, love,
 Await me in the sky.

I've felt the pang of grief, love,
 And know the thrill of pain;
 But find a sweet relief, love,
 In friends that still remain.
 And when the world goes hard, love,
 Amidst its din and strife,
 I have thee by my side, love,
 My noble-hearted wife.

I'm thirty-nine to-day, love,
 And in the noon of life;
 I have a cherub child, love,
 And home, so free of strife.
 And not the least of all, love,
 For which my thanks are given,
 Are blessings like to these, love,
 To help me on to heaven.

I'm thirty-nine to-day, love,
 My locks are coming gray,
 And other marks of age, love,
 With each successive day;
 But my heart is young as ever, love,
 And thou as dear to me,
 As when, a humble suitor, love,
 I gave myself to thee.

I'm hoping for a place, love,
 In yonder blissful clime,
 When we have passed away, love,
 Beyond the bounds of time.
 The "race" is very short, love;
 The "fight" will soon be o'er,
 God grant that we may meet, love,
 On that delightful shore!

THE SKATER.

BY G. M. KELLOGG, M. D.

On glittering fields of glassy ice,
 In the merry Christmas days,
 The skater buckles his skates in a trice,
 And skims through the morning haze;
 He shakes each clod of earth from his limbs,
 And sweeps like a tireless wing,
 As a bird through the summer ether swims,
 And cuts as true a ring.

From clear cut lines he may not swerve—
 Like the swallow's is his flight;
 Or he swings in the eagle's mighty curve,
 As it stoops from its mountain height;
 Now he girds himself for a keener race—
 A race with the arrowy wind;
 Like a furnace glows his eager face,
 For he leaves it far behind.

His trim young waist, so supple and neat,
 And lithe as a poplar now,
 Inclines to the spring of his winged feet,
 With many a swing and bow;
 And full is he of muscular grace,
 As he swiftly turns his reel,
 And fanciful figures can airily trace,
 As he spins on his whirling heel.

Like an arrow shot from a bow of might,
 He cleaves the icy air;
 Like a meteor shot across the night,
 His course is fleet and fair.
 With the tempered steel to his flying heel,
 He cuts before the breeze,
 While nerves in his glowing body feel
 The tension of ecstasies.

With his swaying form his course he speeds,
 Like the hawk on high, still wing,
 And on to the goal the way he leads,
 As he floats in an easy swing.
 As Christmas king long, long ago,
 The skater's brow was bound;
 Old Winter gave him a wreath of snow,
 With icy spangles crowned.

I'LL RISK IT.

BY REV. M. N. OLMSTED.

ONE fine Sabbath morning in the spring of 1853, as one of the pilgrims of Zion was journeying to the house of God, to join with others in the worship of his sanctuary, he observed a neighbor cultivating his garden. As every Christian should, he kindly admonished him of the fearful responsibility of deliberately transgressing one of the commands of the decalogue, which says, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," pointing him onward to the hour of death and to the judgment scene, where his sin would surely find him out and visit him with merited punishment. "Well," said the man, "I'll risk it." Few would dare to utter such fearful language in word, but in practice there are thousands who do it every day.

Behold that miser with his bags of shining gold. He counts their contents over and over again. He rises early, and toils late, and deprives himself of almost every comfort for the sake of gold. The frosts of many winters have whitened his locks; time has furrowed his once fair cheek, his step falters, his eye grows dim, his intellect fails, and a voice from the word of God admonishes him that he "can not serve God and mammon," and that he must renounce the world or sink to endless perdition. But he clutches the golden treasure, exclaiming, "I'll risk it!"

Look at that man of noble bearing entering that gilded saloon, where the "wine is red, and giveth his color in the cup, and moveth itself aright." He quaffs the poisonous beverage, while the relentless habit daily increases upon him. Each draught is as the additional web of the spider thrown around its victim. He is solemnly admonished by the word of God of the horrors of a drunkard's grave. A beloved wife or sister weeps over him, pointing to the end of some of his comrades, expressing fears that his course will result in a similar fate, and that "at the last it will bite like a serpent and sting like an adder." But he breaks away from the expostulation of his dearest friends, and madly rushes to the intoxicating cup, exclaiming, "I'll risk it!"

See that young man entering that scene of amusement. Enchanting music invites, and the gayety of the scene charms him onward. Merry feet trip lightly to the sound of the viol. Anon a volley of mirth and laughter bursts forth and rises amid the group, and mingles with the striking of the midnight clock, which rings out the death knell of another murdered hour. As the sound dies away, Conscience whispers in his ear, in the language of Solomon, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." But he stops his ears and dances along, singing, as he goes, "I'll risk it."

Gaze for a moment at yonder votary of fashion. The Creator has endowed her with a most graceful form and well-turned features—with a brilliant intellect, capable of abundant usefulness; yet she labors incessantly to improve her person. How well she succeeds may be seen in her pale features, her languid eye, and distorted figure. Occasionally the hectic flush sits upon her cheek, her appetite fails, and other symptoms of a kindred character appear as precursors of a speedy dissolution. The physician and loved friends caution her to abandon the follies of fashion. She is admonished by the early victims which have fallen around her, as well as by the word of eternal Truth, that that frail tenement, however much it may be decorated, will soon become food for the unfeeling worm, while the neglected soul, in all its naked deformity, must soon stand before the eternal Judge and meet its final doom. But, like the butterfly, she flits along, exclaiming, "I'll risk it."

Once more. Behold that gathering crowd at the sanctuary. One exclaims, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." Another, burdened with sin, and writhing under the lashes of a guilty conscience, cries out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" while a giddy throng sport with eternal things, and laugh to scorn those who worship the living God. The man of God delivers his message, inviting all to the fountain of mercy, where the chief of sinners may obtain complete redemption, and "beseeches them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God." He closes his address with a thrilling warning to those who trifle with, or even "neglect this great salvation." But as the multitude retires the shrill notes of this giddy throng peal forth, bidding defiance to the claims of God and the terrors of perdition, "I'LL RISK IT."

GHOST STORIES.

BY ALICE CARY.

NUMBER II.

NEARLY a year was gone since the time of our meeting Amos in the sugar-camp, and the narration of his curious story. He was done enacting tricks, done telling stories to frighten and bewilder his listeners; and if there was any truth in him he was come to it, for he was gone to that country whence no traveler returns—gone to the presence of the Searcher of hearts. Let us hope he found that mercy which here he bestowed not upon himself; for surely he was his own worst enemy, dealing always harder by himself than he was dealt by.

One way and another he had been the cause of much ill-feeling and ill-fortune in the neighborhood, and yet, as I have before intimated, he was guiltless of premeditated evil.

If he met a timid school-boy he could not resist the temptation of telling him it was an hour or two later than it really was; that he had just passed the school-house and seen the master cutting a switch big enough to goad an ox, and looking in the very direction the belated boy might be expected; or some similar fabrication he would make to send the child needlessly hurrying and fretting on his way. For such boys as loved bird-nesting, he had always some wonderfully pleasing account; and though his character for story-telling was well known, he had ever some new device to deceive the listener, and make him think he, of all the world, was the one Amos best liked—the person selected by him as the repository of his truth-telling.

I remember once when we were gathering nuts in the woods a little way from the school-house, watching for the rap of the master on the window-shutter, for it was nearly time for the afternoon school to begin, Amos Hill came suddenly among us. He was holding his hands tightly against his forehead when we first saw him, and, approaching, said, "O dear, children, how sick I am!" After a little he sat down on the grass and then lay down, drawing himself up as one in pain, and groaning and moaning to himself piteously.

We all crowded around and asked what was the matter, and, pressing his hand now on his head, now on his side, and now striking them together as one in terrible misery, he told us he had nearly killed himself, he believed, by falling from a tall tree a mile and a half away, in which he had climbed to get a nest of red-birds; that an old woman of the neighborhood, whom we all knew, named Ann Stacy, had offered him ten dollars for a pair of red-birds, and that he had been at great pains to find them.

We all knew the tree, for it was the tallest one for miles about, and was known by the name of the high oak, and we knew Miss Ann Stacy was a great lover and collector of birds; and, besides, how could we doubt the truth of a man suffering as Amos was! He professed himself a little easier presently, but said he didn't care for the birds nor for any thing else, if he could only live to get home; and that if any of the boys were a mind to go and carry the birds to Ann Stacy, they were welcome to the price of them; he had laid the nest at the root of the tree, and that there were two birds in it nearly large enough to fly. Feeling in his pocket he seemed not to find his handkerchief, upon which he said, "O, I forgot! I spread it over the nest to keep the birds safe; it was a good handkerchief, but the boy that gets there first may have it."

A number of the boys now looked wistfully at the school-house and whispered one to another, that if it were not so near school-time they would go.

Hearing this, Amos said it was no where near the time for school to begin; that as he passed Squire Smith's saw-mill a few minutes before, the men were just going to dinner, and that we could tell by the shadows it was not near school-time. As he talked he groaned, wishing it was later, so the market people would be returning from town, and some of them take him up and carry him home.

A dozen boys set off at once eager to secure the birds, and racing for the sake of the handkerchief, which Amos had said was a very good one. They were no sooner out of sight than the young man said to us who were left with him, that he felt greatly worse, and believed he was going mad, upon which he began to bite at the grass and the air, and then in a hideous tone warned us to fly from him, as he believed he should eat some of us up in a minute more. Afraid of our lives we ran, one over another, and Amos after us, snapping his teeth together and growling like a mad dog.

In the hollow near the school-house he fell down to die, as we supposed, and with hair wildly tossed and teeth chattering we gained the master's protection just at the right moment. A stern, hard man was our master; and when we told him Amos was dying in the hollow, he said nobody would be the loser, and went on with the lessons as though nothing had chanced. The girls whose brothers had gone for the birds, suffered not a little in view of their protracted absence, and the long, limber switch which lay on the master's desk, and which he eyed occasionally as though it gave him great satisfaction.

I need scarcely say that Amos betook himself to his feet, and went home elated with the uncommonly good joke he had played off, and they—the boys—returned at a late hour—having found neither birds nor handkerchief—trembling and sweating, more from the fear of the rod than any thing else.

I remember once the father of Amos, a good and worthy man, when about making a journey, ordered a new coat to be made at the village tailor's, for the old one had quite served out its time. When the day of departure came, and all else was in readiness, Amos was dispatched in great haste to bring home the new coat; but hour after hour the carriage waited at the door, and not a little impatient the good old man waited too. At last came a boy with a bundle, sent by Amos, as he said. It was enough like the young man to keep his father waiting so, but no further annoyance was suspected, and carefully packing away the parcel supposed to contain the new coat, the old gentleman set out on his journey, and not till the time came when he wished to appear unusually well was the discovery made that the graceless son had appropriated the new coat, and sent home his own old one to his father. But I need not instance more of his tricks, or dwell further on the general worthlessness rather than wickedness that characterized him.

Nearly a year, as I said, had gone since our meeting him in the sugar-camp: it was middle winter—a bright moonlight and pleasant for the time of year. The cows were in their sheds, the chickens on the roost, and we children sitting before a great blazing fire of hickory logs wishing for snow to fall, and that a new sled would make itself and stand right before the door in the morning, with a nice bed full of straw, and having a fine coverlid over all. But the wish was no sooner perfected than we amended it by wishing the sled might turn into a sleigh, painted green or red, and having a great brown buffalo-robe over the seat; and further, that the seat might prove a money box, full of gold as it could be, and that we might go to town and buy new dresses at the cost of a thousand dollars per yard, and that the box might still be just as full, and, in fact, never get any the lower, though we should buy a million of things at equally extravagant charges. Our pleasant fancies were pleasantly interrupted by a loud rapping on the door, and presently by the entrance of Nathan Baxter and his wife, Jenny Baxter—or uncle Nat and aunt Jenny, as they were familiarly called by the young folks of the neighborhood. They were come to pass the evening and take supper at our house, as was, with country people, the custom of the times. They were not formal calls, which the neighbors made upon each other in those days, and in dress for the finest effect without any reference to comfort; nor did a few formal phrases, for the concealment of feeling and not the expression of it, make up the conversation. All was genuine. What had been seen, and felt, and thought, was given in exchange for what had been seen, and felt, and thought.

What a glad surprise their coming was to us all, and with what a cordial sincerity aunt Jenny smiled and said she had been wanting to come for the last six months, but that for one while she had no dress that was really nice, and then she waited for a new cap; for that when she got one nice thing she wanted another to wear with it, and that having the cap at last her shoes were given out, and so one thing after another had kept her home, greatly against her will, and that she was come at last without every thing she would have liked to have. All this she said and a great deal more, as she untied her close-fitting, white satin bonnet, and unpinned and folded her drab-colored shawl. Not that aunt Jenny was a Quakeress; she simply wore this plain dress as most becoming to her years and position. A smiling, rosy face she had, and a smooth, white brow, that had never seen a wrinkle of care or sorrow; for she regarded this world as a very good sort of place, and esteemed herself as in a good degree necessary to the general well-being of things; not that her self-esteem was so inordinate; it is probable, however, that Mrs. Jenny Baxter had, at various times and on various occasions, whispered Mrs. Jenny Baxter, that she was the chief pillar of the Church, and the leader of the neighborhood society. I am not sure but this comfortable assurance which Mrs. Baxter had made Mrs. Baxter tended to make her all the pleasanter companion and more useful woman.

That so much responsibility rested upon her, caused her to weigh and consider things before action or utterance, and gave to her manner a kind of pomposity which I am sure was quite unaffected. At any rate she was to me one of the pleasantest visitors we ever had, and the white ribbons of her cap, and the white kerchief, neatly pinned across her bosom, and her smoothly ironed black flannel dress gave me real pleasure. There was an appropriateness in whatever she assumed, whether her garment were of wool or silk, that made some less fortunate people call her proud and stylish.

Plainer, by a good many degrees, was uncle Nathan, and older by a good many years—a little bent man with a wrinkled face and thin white hair he was, and the father of half a dozen children that aunt Jenny was not the mother of; and why so pretty a young woman married an old widower was a matter of some curious speculation when she first came into the neighborhood. I do not pretend to have understood this matter better than other people; but that she was a good and faithful wife to uncle Nathan was certainly true. He grew straighter and stronger, smiled more and sighed less after she became his helpmate, and lived at least a dozen years longer with than he would have done without her.

The fire was replenished, the candle snuffed and another one lighted by way of welcoming and honoring our visitors, and our nearest neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Claverel, were sent for.

Uncle Nathan keeping his broad-brimmed hat on his head, which, by reason of baldness, was always cold, drew up close to the fire, and, leaning on his stout walking-stick, engaged in conversation about the weather and the facilities the fine moonlight afforded for visiting, the prospects for wheat, the general health of the neighborhood, etc.

Aunt Jenny was warm enough and rather drew away from the fire, as she took from her work-basket some blue and white spotted yarn, and began the knitting of a small stocking for one of the afore-mentioned half dozen children. She had thought at first she would make the yarn red and white, she said, as she had always admired red stockings for children; but on further consideration she had feared the red would fade and look worse in the end than the blue. She had knitted the mate of the one she proposed then to make, she told us, while watching a few nights before with the corpse of Amos Hill. At the mention of this watch uncle Nathan groaned loud and long; we could not understand why at first, for Amos was not one to be much mourned for, certainly not by those in no way connected with him.

"It was the awfulest thing I ever saw," he said, directly. "I always expected the devil would get him, but I did not expect to see him come for him as I did."

"Well, Nathan, the old fellow has got his match, if he has got him," said aunt Jenny, and here came in all the history of the young man's life, each one recounting the tricks and falsehoods they had known him to be guilty of up to the time of his death, which had been sudden and violent. Whether in his last moment any thought had reached itself out toward heaven was unknown, for he had died and made no sign. Mr. and Mrs. Claverel now came in, and the circle about the fire was widened, and after an interval devoted to the interchange of gladness and good wishes, the talk about Amos was taken up again; for in the country a death in the neighborhood darkens, for a time, the sunshine of every household.

"I thought Amos was not long for this world for some time before he died," said uncle Nathan.

"Why so?" asked my father, "he looked healthy enough."

Uncle Nathan, who was a firm believer in dreams, and omens, and ghosts, and the like, replied, that one night during the last summer he had dreamed of seeing Amos ride a white horse through the air, and that standing still to look at him he vanished away. Mr. Claverel, who was in no way given to mysticism, laughed outright at this, but said he himself had had a token more curious than the dream. A week previous to his death he had met Amos as he was going to market, and the young man had told him where he could dispose of the load of oats he was carrying to town on advantageous terms, and that calling at the place indicated he had found the information correct.

Mrs. Claverel, who wore a mourning-ribbon on her cap, and an apron of black silk, in memory of a blue-eyed little girl who the last fall had gone out to play with her sisters and never come back alive, looked all the more grave for the light words of her husband, and said she doubted not but there were such things as warnings, both in dreams and out of dreams. "You know, Samuel," she added, "about the 'land' you missed last year."

Mr. Claverel looked grave, too, now, adding, "Well, Dolly, I don't know, may be there are such things."

"Had you any premonition previous to the demise of your little one?" asked aunt Jenny, precisely and formally, but not the less kindly.

And Mr. Claverel here explained that in sowing his oats the spring past he had missed a "land," which, to own the truth, had caused him some uneasy sensations, and the more for that his little daughter, Adeline, had said one day, seeing the bare ground in the midst of the green grain, that she believed it was a real true sign some body was going to die.

The field of grain had grown opposite our house, and often and often, by one and another, the land missed in sowing had been remarked, and the superstition attaching to such a mistake dwelt upon, so that we had come to regard it almost as an augury, and the death of little Adeline, shortly after the harvest was gathered, as its fulfillment.

The graveyard where she was buried was not more than a quarter of a mile from Mr. Claverel's house; and when good Mrs. Claverel told how their watch-dog had gone there day after day all the past summer, and howled so loud and so lonesome, and that she had felt it a confirmation of her previous fear, uncle Nathan said the howling of a family dog, without any unusual provocation, was a sign of death which he had never known to fail.

All merriment was effectually subdued by the allusion to little Adeline, for all of us had remarked the howling of the dog and the missed land, and all had known, too, the pretty little girl whose death had been, as her mother believed, thus distinctly foretold. The candles and the fire grew dim without notice being taken of them, and the wind moaned at the windows in keeping with the solemn tone of the conversation.

Uncle Nathan related how the night on which his first wife died he was sitting by her bedside at midnight, when there fell a loud knocking on the door of the parlor, which surprised him not a little, inasmuch as it was not the door at which people were accustomed to seek entrance; and that taking with him the candle he opened the door, but found no one there. "It was the wind likely, or Amos Hill at most, feigning to be a ghost," said my father, who had small faith in those impersonal creatures.

"I wish I could think so," said uncle Nathan, and he went on to tell us that he had not only seen ghosts with his own mortal eyes, but that he had heard their footsteps and other more fearful and unmistakable evidences of their proximity. Here he groaned a believing and lamenting groan, and said he wished we could all have seen what he saw, watching with the corpse of Amos. Of course there was a good deal of anxiety expressed to know what uncle Nathan had seen, upon which, with a manner of the utmost sincerity, he related the following.

"It was about midnight, and I sat half asleep by the fire, and trying to drown, with good thoughts, the wicked talk of the two men who watched with me—comrades of the dead they had been, and are, I believe, more lost than he, if possible—when all thought of sleep was driven away by the noise of loud shuffling, and opening my eyes I saw, to my horror and astonishment, that they had turned back the lid of the coffin, leaving the dead man's face exposed, and were actually dealing cards upon it. My blood stood still, and I besought them to leave their dreadful trade and go away; that I would rather a thousand times watch alone than have them with me. They replied by laughter, coarse jests, and such oaths as I will not repeat, asking me tauntingly if I was not afraid. I said yes, I was afraid, and had just opened the Bible when there came such a rattling of chains as caused me to let it fall. The reckless fellows were evidently not much less frightened—they forgot what the trump was; and when the slow dragging of the chain was heard again, they left their playing, and, jumping from the open window, ran as fast as they could. I trembled violently, for I still kept hearing the rattling and dragging of the chain, and it was plain enough that the evil one was come to carry off Amos, body and all. I managed to gather up and burn the cards, and for the rest of the night I stood in the open door ready to run, and I am not ashamed to own it," concluded uncle Nathan, wiping the sweat from his forehead.

Mr. Claverel laughed immoderately at the conclusion of the story, and told uncle Nathan that if he had looked out into the moonlight he would have seen in the field next Mr. Hill's house his old kicking cow, on whose leg he had fastened a heavy chain, to cure her of her bad habit; for that he had no doubt but this was what Mr. Baxter had heard.

"Blame it all!" exclaimed the old man, more irritated than pleased, "some folks could explain away the very airth if you would listen to them."

"Nattie, Nattie, my dear," said aunt Jenny, in half-reproachful, half-coaxing accents, "there is one ghost even Mr. Claverel can't explain away," and she patted his withered hand with her plump white one.

"What is it? what is it?" we all asked at once, and winding up her yarn, and having smoothed the gray hair of her husband, and said he was not always a coward, she turned the wedding ring on her finger and began: "When I was fifteen or thereabouts, my mother died, leaving me alone in the world, for my father had been dead longer than I could remember. We had no money, and, of course, not many friends. There was no alternative for me. I must go out to service, and it was not long till a situation presented itself, which was to assist in the housework of a country tavern in a lonesome neighborhood, a hundred miles from where I was born. My fellow-worker proved to be an old woman, very superstitious, and of a marvelous experience, if her narrations were to be relied upon. There was no other public house within a dozen miles of us, so that we had a good many travelers to entertain—not unfrequently more than we could accommodate, for to say truth we had but three guest chambers. From the first I had noticed an upper room fastened with a padlock, and supposed it to be a store-room, till passing it one day with my workmate she stooped her ear to the door and listened attentively. I inquired what she expected to hear, but she motioned me to keep silence, and presently glided away on tiptoe. Often we must make beds on the floor and resort to other inconvenient means for the accommodation of our guests, which led me to prosecute my inquiries relative to the disused apartment. Tired of my importunity the landlord one day told me the room was haunted, and that he had wished the fact kept from me, inasmuch as not one girl in twenty would remain in the house after learning it. I laughed at the story; said I was not afraid; and getting possession of the key went in to examine the premises, assuring the landlord that I would air and fit it up for use. The sunshine streamed brightly in as I dusted the furniture, made the bed with clean sheets, filled the pitcher, and placed some flowers on the table to make all cheerful. I found it much the prettiest and pleasantest room in the house, and told the landlord, on leaving it, that I would answer for any harm that should happen the guest who slept there that night.

"Toward sunset travelers began to drop in, and two or more had been assigned to each room, leaving only the haunted chamber, when my good man, Nattie here, rode up to the door and requested supper and lodging. Supper was prepared, at which I presided, receiving from the tired stranger more than the share of civilities which I was accustomed to receive.

"Shortly after the meal was concluded the traveler desired to be shown to his room, when, moved by compassion, the landlord informed him that he must choose between the floor and a haunted chamber, to which Nathan replied that he preferred the bedroom, haunted or not, and was accordingly shown up.

"‘Remember your promise,’ said the landlord, ‘and if we find the man strangled in his bed in the morning, expect to be arrested for the murder.’

"There was so much concern in his manner that the words weighed upon me; and when our work was concluded and we retired for the night, I asked my assistant how the chamber happened to be haunted. After expressing much alarm for the safety of the guest she said, ‘It is ten years ago since that room was shut, and for my life I would not sleep in it, nor be the means of any one else sleeping there.’ I felt my hand tremble a little as I unclosed the shutter and looked out to be sure all was quiet. The sky was completely overcast, and the winds blowing up through the leaves of the great wood near by, gave a gloomier effect to the distant thunder.

"‘Mercy! mercy! the ghost will come to-night,’ continued the old woman, ‘and if you don’t get pulled out of bed by the hair for opening that room it will be a wonder.’

"The rain began falling now, so we were obliged to close the window; and with the lightning flashing right in our faces and the wind driving the little candle flame about, the woman huddled close against me as I sat on an old chest, and went on with the story. She had been an inmate of the house for about twenty years, and for the first ten the haunted chamber had been the favorite room of all travelers. One night, as black and stormy as that, two travelers had called late and asked for entertainment, which was given them. No register was kept, and no names were given or required. One of them was a young and beautiful woman, the other a man, much older, silent mostly, and seemingly stern. They lodged together in the haunted chamber, the woman going thither supperless and tearful, the man leading the way and offering no support or soothing words to the wife, if so she were. Their manners and dress indicated persons of refinement and used to all luxury, and it was a matter of much regret, said the woman, that we could not give them better accommodation.

"‘In the morning,’ she went on, ‘the strange gentleman left before the house was astir, though the rain was still falling and the roads almost impassable. The lady was not able to rise, and on attending her with breakfast I found her pale, tearless, and as one struck into stone. She neither ate, nor drank, nor smiled, nor in any way noticed my presence. I combed her long hair, bathed her face, and in all ways did for her all I could, for I could not but think her case a very sad one. Two or three days went by, and she had not yet left her room nor spoken, when, on opening her door, I found her in bonnet and shawl; and on asking her what she proposed, she said, “Walk to the post-office.” I told her that was six miles away, and she did not look strong enough to walk across the room, and that if she would wait till the evening, or, at furthest, the next morning, I was sure a boy might be spared to do the errand for her.

"Then there is a post-office at the cross roads five or six miles from here?" she said, as though glad to be confirmed in what she had only in part believed till then. For a moment she seemed quite happy, smiled and said she would wait; but that if the messenger could go just then she would be so glad—two hours would be so long to wait. I said I would see, and as I left the chamber turned and asked what name should be inquired for.

"The white cheek clouded with crimson, and after a moment she said, "Never mind, I will go myself." I tried hard to dissuade her, but could not, and with a quick stop and an energy that seemed almost superhuman she went away.

"It was late at night when she returned, looking more like one who had got up out of the grave than a living woman. When I asked if her quest had been successful, she shook her head mournfully, and seating herself at the window overlooking the road, never got up again. All my entreaties could not prevail on her to lie down; with her eyes straining away to the distance and her lips breathlessly apart, she sat hour after hour and day after day. At last I persuaded her to allow me to go to the office, which I did, inquiring for a letter for Mary H——. Such was her direction. I received none, and shall never forget the look of despair that settled in her face when I told her so. Once, and only once, she groaned as if her heart was breaking—I think it was—and motioning me to leave her I did so; and on going next to the chamber I found her still sitting upright at the window, but dead.

"When we dressed her," continued the old woman, "we found a picture in her bosom, which we recognized as that of the man who had brought her to our house.

"She was placed in a coffin and the door of her chamber locked; for how or where to bury her could not be decided at once. It was a little after sunset when an old man, who seemed more bowed with grief than years, stopped at the house and requested to be shown to a particular room—indicating the one in which the dead lady lay. On being told that it was occupied, he said he knew it; that it was his daughter who had the room; that he saw her sitting at the window, and she beckoned him to come in. We told him that was quite impossible; that the lady was dead and in her coffin; but he persisted in saying he had seen his child alive not half an hour before; that she had beckoned him to come in, and that he must see with his own eyes whether or not she were there. So great was his importunity that the chamber was opened, but only the dead lady, and she in her coffin, was found; but no sooner had the old man seen her than he exclaimed, "My sweet Mary, my child, my child!"

"That night he carried her away, and we never saw or heard any thing as to who they were or what became of them."

"The old woman further told me," said Mrs. Baxter, "that many a time since then the lady had been seen sitting at the very window where she watched so long, sometimes gazing intently on a picture, and sometimes with a little child in her arms; and that, as often as any guest had been given the haunted chamber, the ghost of a woman had been seen walking up and down the floor as one in great distress, and sometimes taking possession of the bed, and sometimes groaning aloud; that one or two persons had been nearly strangled by her; so the chamber had been finally abandoned; but still steps were often heard there, and the door carefully secured at night would be found wide open in the morning.

"The wind blew furiously," Mrs. Baxter went on, "the rain still fell, and altogether it was as dismal a night as ever I saw, and at the conclusion of the old woman's story I confess to some misgivings as to the safety of the person I had caused to sleep in the haunted room. I went to bed, however, and I suppose eventually fell asleep, with much uneasiness as to our guest weighing on my mind. And now, Mr. Baxter," she said, turning smilingly to him, "you may as well tell the rest."

The old gentleman drew himself up, and looking proudly on his wife took up the thread of the story by saying: "Having been told my room was haunted, I looked about carefully on going into it, closed the windows, and placing some chairs against the door, for I found no key, I retired, leaving the light burning. I was tired and soon fell asleep, but not very soundly I suppose, for some time in the night a little noise about the door awoke me; it was like some one softly trying the key, and raising myself on my elbow I listened close, and became shortly convinced that some one or something was there, for the door now began to be pushed against the chairs. Presently a hand was thrust through the aperture, the chairs removed, and a figure, clothed in white, came noiselessly into the apartment. The light had burned down, and I could not tell distinctly whether it were ghost or woman, and I confess to some shrinking, as it approached the bed and began feeling across it. I was not long in doubt, for the hand no sooner touched my face than I knew it to be a mortal, and a very pretty one, too, and could not resist the temptation of holding it very closely, and afterward of putting my arm around the ghost's neck and waking it—for it was evidently asleep—with a kiss; you can judge of the surprise of Jenny, for it was she, on finding herself in so novel a situation. What the acquaintance, so curiously begun, led to, you all know; but, notwithstanding this pleasant experience in a haunted chamber, I am no less a believer in ghosts."

This story tended to create cheerfulness, and the remainder of the evening was as merry as the opening had been somber. Even Mrs. Claverel smiled, and in the cheerful conversation that was kept up till midnight took her part, and when the ample supper was spread all had appetites to do it justice. Mrs. Baxter "toed off" her little stocking as she talked, for her work did not suffer on account of the pleasant stories she had to tell, in all of which she had figured prominently.

It was midnight, as I said, before the work was put by and the shawls and bonnets brought forth, and when the party separated it was with kindly feeling stirred up, and hearts strengthened and steadied for the work and the warfare of life. Among my pleasantest memories are those of visitors of winter evenings in the country; and if ghost stories were told, so much the better.

LITTLE AMY—A GERMAN TALE;

OR, THE BEAUTY AND REWARD OF DOING GOOD.

THE following story was gleaned from an old German pocket-book. It is in itself beautiful, and, moreover, teaches a beautiful lesson:

One Sunday afternoon, in summer-time, the village children went into the church to be taught their catechism. Among them was Amy, the shepherd's step-daughter, some seven years old. She was a tender-hearted child; and when the clergyman, after speaking of our duty toward our neighbor, said, "All people who would please God, must do good according to their means, be those means ever so little," she could not refrain from weeping.

For Amy was very poor, and felt innocently persuaded that she had no power whatever to gladden by her love or kindness any earthly creature; not even a lamb, or a young dove. She had neither, poor child.

So Amy came out of church with sadness in her heart, thinking that God would take no pleasure in her, because—but that was only her own idea—she had never yet done good to any one.

Not wishing that her eyes, now red with weeping, should be seen at home, she went into the fields, and laid herself down under a wild rosebush. There she remarked that the leaves of the shrub, untarnished with dust, were dry and drooping, and that the pretty pink blossoms looked pale and faded; for there had been no rain for a very long time.

She hastened to a brook that flowed by at no great distance, drew water in the hollow of her hand—for cup she had none—and thus toilfully and by slow degrees, often going and as often returning, she washed the dust away from the languishing rose-bush, and so refreshed its roots by the timely moisture, that soon it reared itself again in strength and beauty, and joyfully and fragrantly unfolded its blossoms to the sun.

After that little Amy wandered on by the side of the brook in the meadows, whence she had obtained the water. As she gazed upon it, she almost envied the silver stream, because it had been able to do good to the rose-tree.

On what she herself had done, she did not bestow a single thought.

Proceeding a little way further, she observed a great stone lying in the bed of the narrow brook, and so choking up the channel that the water could only struggle past it slowly; and, as it were, drop by drop. Owing to this obstacle, all the merry prattle of the stream was at an end. This grieved Amy on the water's account; so with naked feet she went into the stream and shook the heavy stone. Some time elapsed before she could move it from its place; but, at length, by tasking all her strength, she rolled it out, and got it to remain on the top of the bank. Then the streamlet flowed merrily by, and the purling waves seemed to be murmuring thanks to the gentle child.

And onward still went Amy, for at home she knew there was no one who cared to inquire after her. She was disliked by her step-father, and even her own mother loved the younger children much better than she loved her. This constituted the great sorrow of Amy's life.

Going far about, and ever sad because she had done good to no one, she at last returned to the village. Now, by the very first cottage she came to, there lay, in a little garden, a sick child whose mother was gone to glean in the neighboring fields. Before she went, however, she had made a toy—a little windmill put together with thin slips of wood—and had placed it by her little son to amuse him, and to make the time appear shorter to him during her absence.

Every breath of air, however, had died away beneath the trees, so that the tiny sails of the windmill turned round no more. And the sick child, missing the playful motion, lay sorrowfully upon the green turf, under the yellow marigolds, and wept.

Then Amy stepped quickly over the low garden hedge, heedless that it tore her only Sunday frock, kneeled before the little windmill, and blew with all her might upon its slender sails. Thus impelled, they were soon in merry motion, as at first. Then the sick child laughed, and clapped his little hands; and Amy, delighted at his pleasure, was never weary of urging the sails round and round with her breath.

At last the child, tired out by the joy which the little windmill had given him, fell fast asleep; and Amy, warned by the evening shadows which began to gather round her, turned her steps toward home. Faint and exhausted was she, for since noon she had eaten nothing.

When she reached the cottage door, and stopped there for a moment with beating heart, she heard her step-father's voice, loud and quarrelsome, resounding from within. He had just returned from the ale-house, and was in his well-known angry humor, which the least cause of irritation might swell into a storm. Unfortunately, as Amy, trembling, entered the room, her torn frock caught his eye. His passion was kindled at the sight. Roused to fury in a moment, he stumbled forward, and, with his powerful fist, struck the poor little child on the forehead.

Then Amy bowed her head like the withered roses in the field; for the blow had fallen on her temple. As she sunk, pale and dying, to the ground, her mother, with loud lamentations, sprang forward and kneeled beside her. Even the stern and angry man, suddenly sobered by his own deed, seemed for a moment shocked, and became touched with pity.

So both the parents wept and mourned over Amy, and laid her upon her little couch in the small inner chamber, and strewed round her green branches, and various kinds of flowers, such as marigolds and many-colored poppies; for the child was dead!

But while the parents bitterly reproached themselves, and wished they had been kinder to poor Amy, behold a wonder!

The door of the chamber gently opened and the waves of the Brook which Amy had set free, came gently rippling by, in the stillness, and sprinkled the mouth and eyes of the dead child. The cool drops flowed into her veins, and once more set the arrested blood in motion.

Then she again unclosed her eyes, which so lately had been dim and motionless, and she heard the soft waves, like gentle voices, murmuring these words in her ear:

"This we do unto thee, in return for the good thou didst unto us."

Yet a little while and the chamber was again stirred by the presence of some kindly power which seemed hovering around.

This time it was a gentle Breeze which entered with softly fluttering wings. Tenderly it kissed the forehead of the child, and lovingly it breathed its fresh breath into her bosom.

Then Amy's heart began to thrill with quicker life, and she stretched out her hand to the many-colored flowers, breathed their delicate odors, and rejoiced in their beauty.

And the Breeze softly said:

"I bring thee back the breath which thou didst expend upon the sick child's pleasure!"

Then Amy smiled, as if she were full of bliss.

When the Breeze had ceased to murmur its soft words, an angel came gliding in through the low door of the little chamber, and in his hand he held a garland of fresh, fragrant roses. These he laid against the cheek of the pale child; and, lo! they restored to it the hues of life, and they bloomed again. And the flowers seemed to whisper:

"This we do unto thee in return for the good thou didst unto us!"

And the angel kissed Amy on the forehead, eyes, and mouth; and then came life back to her in its strength.

And the Angel said to her:

"Forasmuch as thou hast done good according to thy means, and thou knewest it not, therefore shall a tenfold blessing rest upon thee!"

THE BIG RIVER.

BY JAMES FUMMILL.

I.

MURMUR on, thou noble river!
Like old Time, pursue thy way!
Down to ocean rolling ever,
Hold thy course, at night and day!
Gently, and with graceful motion,
Glide along through countries fair,
To the wild and trackless ocean—
Lave thy weary waters there!

II.

Roses smile at morn, and wither
Ere the night dews bathe their cheeks;
Buoyant clouds that glow in ether
O'er the twilight mountain peaks,
Melt to tears ere bright Aurora
Lifts the curtains of old Night;
But, sky-born stream, with ancient glory
Thou dost revel still in light!

LITERATURE AND LABOR.

BY WILLIAM T. COGGESHALL.

LITERARY, like all other success, depends on labor—is the result of hard work. Books that are dashed off may have temporary notoriety, but those only win permanent places in the world's esteem which are complete; and to complete any work—a book, a picture, a statue, a house, a shop, an edifice, an instrument of handicraft, an article of dress or ornament—labor is required.

The writers of the century which precedes ours were men who wrote, and pruned, and polished, and polished, and pruned, and wrote with assiduous care. The authors of America, who are to-day most highly regarded, and whose prospects for regard by posterity are fairest, are men who work, not only to write books, but who have other occupations to which they regularly devote their energies. Particularly is this the fact of our younger writers, and so is it particularly true, also, of the younger writers of Europe. There are fruitful lessons to American working-men and women in the early history of the latter-day authors whose stars are now ascendant in Europe. The opinion, which has been orthodox, that to write a great poem, or produce a great history, or a great statue, a man must wholly devote his energies to the poem, the history, or the statue, is not surely founded. To be sure, time is required, and the world may receive fewer of a great man's works if he is driven to practical toil for daily bread; but if he have resolution as well as talent, he will not fail to accomplish something higher than bread-getting.

Edward Lytton Bulwer is one of the few successful authors of this age, who, by ancestral fortune, are relieved from the necessity of labor; but his experience is a lesson to every man who works for his daily bread, and to every boy and every girl preparing so to work.

When he began his career he composed with the utmost difficulty, and often wrote his fictions twice over; yet—though a politician as well as a poet and a novelist—he has been one of the most voluminous writers of the day. The secret of his success he divulged in a lecture before a literary society in England: "Many persons seeing me so much engaged in active life, and as much about the world as if I had never been a student, have said to me: 'When do you get time to write all your books? How on earth do you contrive to do so much work?' I shall perhaps surprise you by the answer I make. The answer is this: 'I contrive to do so much, by never doing too much at a time.' A man, to get through work well, must not overwork himself—or, if he do too much to-day, the reaction of fatigue will come, and he will be obliged to do too little to-morrow. Now, since I begun really and earnestly to study, which was not till I had left college and was actually in the world, I may, perhaps, say, that I have gone through as large a course of general reading as most men of my time. I have traveled much—I have mixed much in politics and in the various business of life, and, in addition to all this, I have published somewhere above sixty volumes, some upon subjects requiring much special research. And what time do you think, as a general rule, I have devoted to study—to reading and writing? Not more than three hours a day; and when Parliament is sitting, not always that. But then, during those hours I have given my whole attention to what I was about."

Settled determination, early in life, to accomplish distinction in some honorable sphere rarely fails to elevate a young man. He need only pursue his purpose with unflinching watchfulness and unflagging industry, and according to his capacity for work and his ability for management must success reward his efforts. Benjamin D'Israeli, now a leading man in England, was a poor boy of despised origin. It is related of him that when at school, he was asked by a companion, who is now a respectable tradesman, what course of action he meant to adopt in order to make his way in society. The young aspirant promptly replied, "I mean to write a book which will make me famous; when I have purchased fame, I mean to get a seat in Parliament; and when once in Parliament, I shall be determined to become a right honorable." All this has been fulfilled. In his first romance he suggested a possibility that the chief character might become chancellor of the exchequer of England. He spoke for himself in "Vivian Grey," and the possibility has been developed into a certainty. If his life be spared he will yet rise higher in the employment of the English Government.

Pierre Dupont, a pastoral, political, and philosophical poet, whom the people of France love, was the son of a poor artisan, and the spectacle of constant work had its effect in forming the mind of the youth. In a singing song for workmen, which is sung with spirit in the workshops of France, Dupont wrote:

"Tis our unresting arms that from the earth
And jealous ocean wrest those hidden treasures
Which feed with pomp the idle pride of birth,
Rich meats and clothing, and all selfish pleasures.
Gems, metals, diamonds, pearls from the deep,
Fruits from the hill, corn from the level plain,

We win for kings. We are the hapless sheep . . .
 What mantles from our wool the masters gain!
 From us her trade,
 Her wealth, her wonders, doth the world derive;
 But when the golden honey-store is made,
 The master burns the bee within the hive!"

This is too often true; but the sentiment gains, however, that the honey and the bee may be saved together. The bee-hunter has learned that it is too great a sacrifice to destroy the workers of a hive in order to obtain what they have hoarded, and society is learning that its noblest prosperity depends upon the encouragement and protection of its artisans and laborers. Therefore do these classes ascend the scale of humanity, and thereby are easier avenues to distinction opened.

Hugh Miller, the literary stone-cutter, of Scotland, with his hammer and pen has opened a way to respect and renown, in which American youths may honorably tread. He was born in October, 1802, in Cromarty, a small fishing town on the north-eastern coast of Scotland. His father was a shipmaster, and the owner of a small sloop, which he principally employed in trade with the Hebrides. In 1807 he perished at sea. His son, after attending the school of his native village, at the age of seventeen was apprenticed to the business of stone-mason in the sandstone quarries of Cromarty, an occupation which he followed steadily for fifteen years. It was a cold morning in February when he took to the hard task of earning his bread in a stone-quarry. His first day's experience made him a geologist. A nodule of blue limestone, broken by a stroke of his hammer, revealed to him a world of science, conjecture, and imagination, and from that day forward, in the language of an American admirer, "the world was richer in the possession of a man of genius whose science was embellished by his imagination, and his imagination restrained and controlled by his science." Geology is indebted to Hugh Miller for the discovery of the fossiliferous nature of the old red sandstone, and the record of his observations, experience, and reflections is written in that pure style and genial manner, which can attract and charm the general reader to the most frigid subject. He says he could not avoid being an observer; and that the necessity which made him a mason, made him also a geologist. In the winter months, during which mason work is generally suspended in country places, he occupied his time with reading, sometimes with visiting country friends—persons of an intelligent caste—and often he strolled away among old Scandinavian ruins and Pictish forts, speculating about their origin and history.

He made good use of his leisure. And when spring came round again, he would set out into the Highlands to work at building and hewing jobs with a squad of other masons—working hard, and living chiefly on oat-meal broth. One of his companions once said to him, "Ah, Miller, you have stamina in you, and will force your way; but I want strength; the world will never hear of me." It was the stamina which Hugh Miller possessed by nature, that were born in him, and were carefully nurtured by his parents, that enabled him as a working man to rise, while thousands would have sunk, or merely plodded on through life, in the humble station in which they were born. It was common for working men to drink ardent spirits. Miller was taught, when overwrought and in a depressed mood, to regard spirits as high luxuries. On one occasion he was induced to drink a gill of whisky. When he returned home, he found that if he attempted to read a pocket edition of "Bacon's Essays," which he often carried to his work, the letters danced before his eyes. On this experience he says: "The condition into which I had brought myself was, I felt, one of degradation. I had sunk, by my own act, for the time, to a lower level of intelligence than that on which it was my privilege to be placed; and though the state could have been no very favorable one for forming a resolution, I in that hour determined that I should never again sacrifice my capacity of intellectual enjoyment to a drinking usage; and, with God's help, I was enabled to hold my determination." A young working mason, reading "Bacon's Essays" in his by-hours, must certainly be regarded as a remarkable man; but not less remarkable is the exhibition of moral energy and noble self-denial in the instance we have cited.

While Miller had been quietly discharging his duties as a workman, and industriously pursuing his studies, he had been doing what was better than either cutting tombstones or writing poetry; he had been building up his character, and thereby securing the respect of all who knew him. When a branch of the Commercial Bank was opened in Cromarty, and the manager cast about him to make selection of an accountant, whom should he pitch upon but Hugh Miller, the stone-mason? This selection was made simply because of the excellence of the man's character. He had proved himself a true, and a thoroughly excellent and trustworthy man in a humble capacity of life; and the inference was, that he would carry the same principles of conduct into another and larger sphere of action. Hugh Miller hesitated to accept the office, having but little knowledge of accounts, and no experience in book-keeping; but the manager knew his pluck and determined perseverance in mastering whatever he undertook; above all, he had confidence in his character, and he would not take a denial. He was sent to Edinburgh to learn his new business at the head bank, and he acquitted himself to the entire satisfaction of his employers. About the time that he was installed as a bank officer at Cromarty, his career as an author fairly began. He had previously published poems and a few newspaper articles. First appeared "Scenes and Legends in Scotland," then, in 1841, "The Old Red Sandstone." Soon afterward the Free Church movement drew him out as a polemical writer; and a "Letter to Lord Brougham on the Scotch Church Controversy" excited so much attention, that the leaders of the movement in Edinburgh invited him to undertake the editing of the "Witness" newspaper, the organ of the Free Church party; he accepted the invitation, and still holds the position of editor of that paper. Since he has been an editor he has published "First Impressions of England and its people," "Footprints of the Creator," and "My Schools and Schoolmasters." The latter work is an autobiography, from which the materials for this sketch of his career are drawn.

Throughout life Miller seems to have invariably put his conscience into his work. Speaking of the old man with whom he served his apprenticeship as a mason, he says, "He made conscience of every stone he laid." He takes a cheerful view of the lot of labor. While others groan because they have to work hard for their bread, he says that work is full of pleasure, of profit, and of materials for self-improvement. He holds that honest labor is the best of all teachers, and that the school of toil is the best and noblest of all schools—a school in which the ability of being useful is imparted, and the spirit of independence communicated, and the habit of persevering effort acquired. He is even of opinion that the training of the mechanic, by the exercise which it gives to his observant faculties, from his daily dealings with things actual and practical, and the close experience of life, which he invariably acquires, is more favorable to his growth as a man, emphatically speaking, than the training which is afforded by any other condition of life. He declares that his purpose in telling the story of his education is to awaken an increased attention among working men to the importance of self-culture. He says: "They will find, that by far the best schools I ever attended are schools open to them all; that the best teachers I ever had are—though severe in their discipline—always easy of access; and that the special form at which I was, if I may say so, most successful as a pupil, was a form to which I was drawn by a strong inclination, but at which I had less assistance from my brother men, or even from books, than at any of the others. There are few of the natural sciences which do not lie quite as open to the working men of Britain and America as geology did to me."

When a bank officer, he found himself less able and willing to pursue study than he had been in his former situation. "The unintellectual toils of the laboring man," he writes, "have been occasionally represented as less favorable to mental cultivation than the semi-intellectual employments of that class immediately above him, to which our clerks, shop-men, and humbler accountants belong; but it will be found that exactly the reverse is the case, and that, though a certain conventional gentility of manner and appearance on the side of the somewhat higher class may serve to conceal the fact, it is on the part of the laboring man that real advantage lies. The mercantile accountant or law clerk, bent over his desk, his faculties concentrated on his columns of figures, or on the pages which he has been carefully engrossing, and unable to proceed one step in his work without devoting to it all his attention, is in greatly less favorable circumstances than the plowman or operative mechanic whose mind is free though his body labors, and who thus finds, in the very rudeness of his employments, a compensation for their humble and laborious character. And it will be found that the humbler of the two classes is much more largely represented in our literature than the class by one degree less humble. Ranged against the poor clerk of Nottingham, Henry Kirk White, and the still more helpless Edinburgh engrossing clerk, Robert Fergusson, with a very few others, we find in our literature a numerous and vigorous phalanx, composed of men such as the Ayrshire Plowman, the Ettrick Shepherd, the Fifeshire Foresters, the sailors, Dampier and Falconer—Bunyan, Bloomfield, Ramsay, Tannahill, Alexander Wilson, John Clare, Allan Cunningham, and Ebenezer Elliot."

Let the working men of America take courage from Miller's career. The humblest one has as fair a chance in the world as had the self-instructed Geologist, whose reputation is now world-wide. Neither poverty, nor hardships, nor the pressure of various occupations diverted him from the pursuit of his favorite science, and from the accumulation of an amount of miscellaneous knowledge which men of far greater advantages of education might envy. It is to his credit that his well-earned eminence has only served to increase his sympathy with the humble class from which he derives his origin, as well as his activity in promoting whatever measures appear to him adapted to advance their interests and to raise them to the level on which his own exertions have placed him. He was never vainglorious in his success, nor, as many self-raised men are, was he spoiled by the praise which his works called forth. "There is," he says, "no more fatal error into which a working man of a literary turn can fall, than the mistake of deeming himself too good for his humble employments; and yet it is a mistake as common as it is fatal. I had already seen several poor wrecked mechanics, who, believing themselves to be poets, and regarding the manual occupation by which they could alone live in independence as beneath them, had become in consequence little better than mendicants—too good to work for their bread, but not too good virtually to beg it; and looking upon them as beacons of warning, I determined that, with God's help, I should give their error a wide offing, and never associate the idea of meanness with an honest calling, or deem myself too good to be independent." He showed his self-denial, too, in waiting for a wife till he could afford to keep one in respectable comfort—his engagement lasting over five years, before he was in a position to fulfill his promise. And then he married, wisely and happily. The practical common sense which guided Hugh Miller was what was wanting to save many an able writer of earlier times from direful poverty in a garret.

"O youth! flame-earnest, still aspire,
With energies immortal!
To many a heaven of desire,
Our yearning opens a portal!
And tho' age wearies by the way,
And hearts break in the furrow,
We'll sow the golden grain to-day—
The harvest comes to-morrow.

Build up heroic lives, and all
Be like a sheathen saber,
Ready to flash out at God's call,
O chivalry of labor!
Triumph and toil are twins; and aye
Joy suns the cloud of sorrow;
And 'tis the martyrdom to-day
Brings victory to-morrow."

These lines were written by Gerald Massey, a poet of England, who became known to the world within the last year. He is now—1854—only twenty-six years of age. From a biographical sketch, with which he introduces his volume of poems, we learn that he was born in the lowest depths of poverty. His father was a canal-boatman in the interior of England, earning a scanty subsistence by toilsome labor, and unable to write his own name. He lived in a wretched stone hut, the roof of which was so low that a man could not stand in it upright, for which he paid the rent of but one shilling a week. In this state of destitution, the children of the family were obliged not only to shift for themselves, but to contribute by their petty earning to the support of their parents. When only eight years old, Gerald was sent into the silk-mill, and compelled to work in its rank, stifling atmosphere from five o'clock in the morning till half-past six in the evening, unable to catch a glimpse of the sun, except through the dingy windows of the factory. The mill was burned down, and the boy was released from his prison. He regarded the event with the liveliest gratitude. Standing for twelve hours in the wind, and sleet, and mud, he watched the progress and effects of the conflagration with the joy of a liberated captive.

His joy was brief. He was put to the business of straw plaiting, which was no less toilsome and more unwholesome than his work in the factory. In a marshy district, with no chance of exercise, the plaiters were exposed to severe attacks of fever and ague. Young Massey was tortured with the disease for three years, while the other members of the family, including the mother, were often so ill as to be unable to help each other, even with a cup of cold water. His own account of his early days is enough to make the blood run cold. "Having had to earn my own dear bread," he says, "by the eternal cheapening of flesh and blood thus early, I never knew what childhood meant. I had no childhood. Ever since I can remember, I have had the aching fear of want, throbbing in heart and brow. The currents of my life were early poisoned, and few, methinks, would pass unscathed through the scenes and circumstances in which I have lived; none, if they were as curious and precocious as I was. The child comes into the world like a new coin with the stamp of God upon it; and in like manner as the Jews sweat down sovereigns, by hustling them in a bag to get gold-dust out of them, so is the poor man's child hustled and sweated down in this bag of society to get wealth out of it; and even as the impress of the Queen is effaced by the Jewish process, so is the image of God worn from heart and brow, and day by day the child recedes devilward. I look back now with wonder, not that so few escape, but that any escape at all, to win a nobler growth for their humanity. So blighting are the influences which surround thousands in early life, to which I can bear such bitter testimony."

He had been taught to read at a penny school. The Bible and the Pilgrim's Progress afforded the first food to his boyish imagination. He committed many chapters of the former to memory, and devoured the whole of Bunyan's quaint allegory as a veritable history. Robinson Crusoe came next, and then some religious tracts left at the cottage by zealous Methodists. These were the only books he had read when he went to London as an errand boy at the age of fifteen. For the first time in his life he met with plenty of books. He read all that came in his way, from the simplest manuals of education to the standard works on Greek, Roman, and English history. "Till then," he says, "I had often wondered why I lived at all—whether 'It was not better not to be,

I was so full of misery.'

Now I began to think that the crown of all desire, and the sum of all existence, was to read and get knowledge. Read! read! read! I used to read at all possible times, and in all possible places; up in bed till two or three in the morning—nothing daunted by once setting the bed on fire. Greatly indebted was I also to the book-stalls, where I have read a great deal, often folding a leaf in a book, and returning the next day to continue the subject; but sometimes the book was gone, and then great was my grief. When out of a situation, I have often gone without a meal to purchase a book. Till I fell in love, and began to rhyme as a matter of consequence, I never had the least predilection for poetry. In fact, I always eschewed it; if I ever met with any, I instantly skipped it over and passed on, as one does with the description of scenery, etc., in a novel. The first verses I ever made were upon 'Hope,' when I was utterly hopeless; and after I had begun I never ceased for about four years, at the end of which time I rushed into print."

His first attempts at verse were published in a country newspaper. Shortly after a small volume was brought out in his native town, which found but a quite limited circulation.

The poems in the volume from which we have quoted have reached a third edition, which may be considered a remarkable success in London. They have also been republished in New York. Massey writes with ringing energy, but with temperate judgment, of social wrongs; and knowing what it is to "suffer and be strong," he will yet produce poems which the world will gratefully preserve. He was employed last year as advertising agent for the "Westminster Review;" and when his volume was published—which was first done at his own expense—he was Secretary to the London Society for the Protection of Italy.

We trust that he may not fail to fulfill what is written in his own hopeful words: "The crowns of poetry are not in the keeping of critics. There have been many who have given some sign of promise—just set a rainbow of hope in the dark cloud of their life—and never fulfilled their promise; and the world has wondered why. But it might not have been matter of wonder if the world could have read what was written behind the cloud. Others, again, are songful in youth, like the nightingales in spring, who soon cease to sing, because they have to build nests, rear their young, and provide for them; and so the songs grow silent, the heart is full of cares, and the dreamer has no time to dream. I hope that my future holds some happier fate. I think there is a work for me to do, and I trust to accomplish it."

"If thou art worthy, truly brave, thou shalt make the hardest circumstance a helper or a slave," wrote Alexander Smith, the poet, who rose comet-like last year. He has tasted the bitterness of oppressive want and hopeless care. His father was a pattern-drawer for muslin work, and Alexander learned his father's trade. His first poems were published in a newspaper of Ayrshire, Scotland. The success of his "Life Drama" won him the post of Secretary to the University of Edinburgh, where he may elaborate a poem that will win him permanent fame.

Hugh Miller, Massey, and Smith are representatives for England of a literature for the people, which contradicts the flat assertion, that our age of progress is wholly utilitarian. They have noble compeers in America.

A FIRM FAITH.

If I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, said Sir Humphrey Davy, I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing; for it makes life a discipline of goodness, creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish, and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay calls up beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture and shame the ladder of ascent to paradise; and, far above all combination of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions, palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blessed, the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and the skeptic view only gloom, decay, and annihilation.

SEA MOSSES.

BY E. GEORGE ADAMS, A. M.

Ye delicate fabrics of an almighty Hand, Magnificent in your minuteness! He Who wove the curtain of the rainbow; he
Who hangs the gauze-like garment of the mist
Upon the mountain's shoulders, and lets down
From the white stars the drapery of the night;
Who edges sunset's clouds with fringe of gold,
And limns upon the unimpressible glass
The weird-like tracery of the frost, and brings
From the cold mine of Winter the white pearls
To deck with feathery beauty Nature's trees,
And lifts the columns of Aurora up
In the far north, till rosy temples rise,
Then fade away like canvas of a dream—
He made you with your beauty floating out
Through the clear waves of ocean; as a veil
He hangs ye o'er the rocks, and in the depths
Of the far sea your foliage weaves, till wild
And weird-like arches festoon all that world
Hid by a cloud of waters.

Foot ne'er trod

That wilderness of beauty, nor has bird
Shaken with music the light branches, nor
Has moonlight or the flame-enveloped stars
Weaved silver threads into that web of boughs;
But the gay fish is there, of varied hue,
Peopling that solitude, and making bright
The darkness of those waters, and all shells,
Of such commingled hues, as they were dipped
In sunset's glow, and yet they never caught,
In their recess, the light of sun or moon;
But there they lie, like blush on maiden's cheek,
Trembling in their own beauty; and there, too,
The huge leviathan of the deep spouts up,
Through the thick net-work of the vine-like moss,
His foam, that, in a cloud of silver spray,
Falls back like snow, wind-shaken from the pines,
Where first it lighted as it came from heaven.
But though no mortal eye hath seen that world,
The dead are there: down through the waters blue,
From the wrecked ship, or from the giddy mast
Thrown, dizzy, off, or by mischance exposed
To the wild gulf, they sink, and the fair moss
Weaves round their forms a shroud more beautiful
In texture and in colors than the loom
Of Tyre, that city by the sea, erst wove
For the great Solomon.

THE ADORATION OF THE WISE MEN.

BY F. W. TABER.

A STAR hath arisen the nations to save,
A morning hath dawned to illumine the grave;
Messiah appeareth—a Savior is near,
The fetters to sunder, the captive to cheer.
All meekly adoring the sages shall fall
At the feet of the child, the Redeemer of all;
And empires and kingdoms hereafter enthrone
This child as a Savior, this Savior their own.

THOUGHTS ON THE SEA.

BY JAMES M. MARTIN.

At the close of the day, when the sun bids "goodnight"

To heaven and earth, with a smile of delight,
And the shadows of eve creep slowly and pale
O'er the woodland and city, the hill and the vale,
There comes a sweet voice, in the twilight, to me
From the distant east, from the sounding sea.

The sea, the sea, the wide, wide sea,
Where the rippling waves, all joyous and free,
Make melody.

That voice is e'er heard in the din of the day,
In the silence of eve and the mild zephyr's play;
And memory wakes, in the halls of the soul,
Those undying notes, whose magical roll,
Borne by the night-wind, broke on the shore,
From the harp of the ocean in the days of yore.

O the sea! the sea! the rolling sea,
Whose music so stirring, and wild, and free,
Gives ecstasy!

How lovely the scene that enraptures the sight,
When night sits enthroned in her mantle of light,
And her curtain of ebony drops from the sky,
Tissu'd with gold-beams from Luna's bright eye,
And the high-rolling blue wave nestles to rest,
Fanned by the zephyrs in the ocean's broad breast!

The sea, the sea, the beautiful sea,
Whose pulsating heart beats gently and free—
Affectionately!

In fancy's wild dream the scenes of the past,
Like the blushes of morn, come brightening fast;
And the proud, gallant ship, with its snowy-white sails,

Like a spirit, sweeps on with the driving gale;
While the foaming waves roll wildly alone,
And seemingly dash to the foot of the throne.

O the sea! the sea! the grand old sea!
In calm or in storm it is ever to me
All majesty.

And often, when sorrow has preyed on the heart,
And the soul groaned with feelings I could not impart,
Have I turned from the world to the lone, lone shore,
And found sweet relief in the torn billows' roar.
O! a season like this, how magic its power!
Ay, it centers the bliss of a life in hour.

The sea, the mighty, endless sea,
It seemeth an image of thee, of thee,
Eternity!

TRUTH.

MUCH learned dust
Involves the combatants, each claiming Truth,
And Truth disclaiming both. And thus they spend
The little wick of Life's poor shallow lamp,
In playing tricks with Nature, giving laws
To distant worlds, and trifling in their own.

THE DAUGHTERS OF CHINA.*

BY REV. J. W. WILKY, M. D.

THE appearance of a Chinese city or village is very different from that of the cities and hamlets of Christian and enlightened countries, and the homes of the daughters of China bear but little resemblance to either the neat and quiet dwelling-places of the humbler denizens of America, or the gay and brilliant mansions of the daughters of wealth and fashion. One great obstacle to cleanliness, beauty, and, we may add, to virtue, is the narrowness and filthiness of the streets. These, in Chinese cities, are but seldom more than ten feet wide; and as each shop-keeper is allowed about two feet in which to place his counter before his house, the actual width of the street available for passing and re-passing is only six feet, and through this narrow space a dense population, eagerly engaged in multifarious avocations, is thronging and crowding its way all the day long. No horses or beasts of burden, or carriages for men or goods, are used in this country; and as men, and women, and children, too, are the beasts of burden, and all movable articles are borne to and fro upon their shoulders, we may easily fancy the thronged and noisy character of Chinese streets and by-ways. Sedan chairs jostling against each other, borne by rough and boisterous coolies; huge baskets of salt fish, boxes of tea, bags of rice, a countless variety of manufactured articles, vegetables, poultry, live and slaughtered animals for the market, and other things too numerous to mention, borne on the shoulders of men, and women, and children, thronging and crowding each other, each struggling for room and jostling his neighbor out of the way, and each panting, sweating, toiling bearer helping to keep up a continual noise by crying out to his neighbor to "look out," or "take care," or "walk straight," or "keep to the right," and the din of beggars' gongs and tradesmen's bells intermingling with angry and vulgar epithets from men, women, and children, make up the every-day scenes of a street in China. In the noise and bustle of these scenes, the humble daughter of China participates largely. She can carry as heavy a burden; she can walk as rapidly, cry out as lustily, and retort as keenly as her masculine rival, and she dares to compete in all these things with her sterner opponent.

Along these thronged and narrow streets are arranged the homes of the Chinese. But the word has a far different meaning from that which attaches to it in this happy land. Here it is a word that embodies in it all that is good and gentle, and is a synonym for happiness and peace, suggesting to the mind a quiet and cheerful dwelling-place, where are found wives, mothers, and children—a sacred spot for the exercise of the kindlier feelings of our nature, where are found gentle hearts, clustering affections, bright hopes, and smiling faces. There it is a dark and gloomy word, meaning, in the vast majority of instances, a low, filthy, one-storied hut, within which the sun never shines, and through which the free, fresh air of heaven never circulates. Home, in China, means a little bamboo or mud-plastered hovel, without window or chimney, without ceiling or plastered partition, with a rough tile roof, dark and dreary, hanging overhead; a ground floor and black and filthy walls, with a work-shop or store in front; an open clay furnace, for cooking, set in any part of the house, the smoke being left to find its way out through the cracks and crevices of the roof and walls; a few four-legged benches, a couple of odd-shaped chairs, some narrow boards laid side by side, covered with a piece of matting, and provided with a round piece of wood to rest the head upon, intended as a bed, or, in some instances, a huge and clumsy bedstead, carved and gilded, but filthy and smoke-stained, constituting the furniture. Home, in China, in the great majority of instances, is a dark and comfortless place, in which men, women, and children stay, do business, eat, sleep, and die; where the voice of love is not heard; where kindness and affection would be intruders; where husbands often cook their own rice, eat at their own table, and keep their own company; where mothers and daughters are mere instruments of pleasure, or slaves for labor.

We acknowledge that this is not universally the case, but is by no means an overdrawn picture for the vast majority of homes in China. Even in the houses of those whose circumstances appear to be easy—the homes of well-dressed merchants, who, on the streets and in their stores, are richly dressed in silks, satins, crapes, and broadcloth—we find it but little better than the picture we have drawn, and in but few places can be found an air of neatness, cleanliness, and comfort. It is true, China has some men of large fortune—fewer now, however, than formerly—and a higher form of life is found among the proud and affluent mandarins. These, especially where they have had intercourse with foreigners, have better homes and richer furniture. Here we may find painted or carpeted floors, ceilings stuccoed and frescoed, and adorned with painted birds and flowers. Here we may find, in some few instances, the displays of that trait of character for which they have gained too much credit abroad; namely, their fondness for the picturesque; and we are occasionally permitted to look upon beautiful gardens filled with choice plants of every variety, dwarf shrubs trained in the forms of birds, animals, trees, boats, etc., and decorated with artificial ponds, rocks, caverns, winding passages, ornamental bridges, and summer-houses. But such scenes are few and far between. In these homes of the highest classes may be seen rich divans, carved center-tables, gay and beautiful lanterns, embroidered tapestry, gilded vases, fishes and birds in vases and gaudy cages, large mirrors, bureaus, bedsteads with mattresses, and rich coverings and hangings, all elegantly and tastefully arranged. But even here it is all hollow and empty, and to the daughter of China this rich and magnificent home is but a gilded cage—her world, her sphere of life—in which, in company with others of her own sex in varying youth and beauty, bought for money, and like other articles of furniture used to gild and ornament the house, she must rise and sit, approach and retire, move, act, and live at the bidding of her master, in whose heart beats no emotion of love and but little of regard.

But we must introduce our readers to a more intimate acquaintance with the domestic life of these daughters of the east. We need not delay to consider the subject of betrothal, nor the ceremonies of marriage in China, as these may be found in all the books upon that country. It is well to notice, however, that it is on the nuptial evening, when his bride is brought to his own house, and has been conducted to the bridal chamber, that the groom, for the first time, beholds the features of the partner of his life. How many ill-assorted marriages grow out of this arrangement, and how little the affections of the heart are involved in such alliances, it is easy to conceive. We sometimes hear of polygamy among the Chinese; but, as far as we can learn, this does not in strict truth exist among them. There is but one wife and one wedding; all the other females of the establishment occupy subordinate positions, and are purchased with money and received into the house without any marriage ceremony. The position of the "second wife" does seem to be somewhat different from that of a mere handmaid. She is usually only taken with the consent of the first wife, and very frequently only in cases where there is no male offspring. Male descendants are looked upon by the Chinese as the highest good; they perpetuate the family name, serve, obey, and cherish their parents during life, and pay idolatrous reverence at their tombs and before their tablets after they are dead. To be deprived of male children is the highest affliction, and to avoid it they will add wife to wife till the cherished object is obtained. These additional wives, however, are still different from the first. When taken thus they are not purchased as are the handmaids, but, as is also the case with the first wife, a marriage fee is paid to the parents, and they are received into their new homes with certain ceremonies, differing considerably, however, from those of the first and only real marriage.

The husband and proprietor of the establishment, for we can scarcely call it home, may gather around him as many handmaids as his income will allow; but even this is far from being looked upon with general approbation, and the man does not, as in some countries of the east, rise in estimation in proportion as he adds numbers and beauty to his harem. It is easy to determine who is the first and principal wife in the establishment. She is more dignified in her appearance, and more easy and free in her manners, taking the lead in every thing, doing the honors of the house and table, issuing orders to servants, and evidently does not consider the "smaller wives," as they are sometimes called, on an equality with her. She claims to be the mother of the household, and looks upon all the children born in the house as her own.

In the higher walks of life, where wealth gathers around these inmates of the rich man's house all the luxuries and elegancies which the country can afford, it might be thought an enviable position to be the first wife of such an establishment. To the daughter of China it is an enviable position, for to her it is the highest and best she can attain; but to a woman possessing intellect and heart it must be unsatisfying in the extreme. The women of China possess intellect, though it wants cultivation, and hearts, though they need softening and refining, and we can only look upon even these highest of Chinese females as occupying a pitiable position. Whatever may be the establishment of which she is the mistress, she herself has a master, and can only feel that she is not the companion, but the instrument of the man to whom her life is linked. At her marriage she becomes part of another family, and is entirely given up by her own, thus severing all the ties of affection which existed between herself and her own family, and condemning her to a secluded life, unloved and uncared for in the "inner apartments" of a man she has never seen, and, therefore, never loved. She is not his associate, for they are seldom together; he receives and entertains his own company, and transacts his own business according to his own pleasure, thinking no more of consulting the views and wishes of his wife than of consulting those of his canary that hangs in his store.

Though the first wife is superior to the "smaller wives," or handmaids, whichever we may choose to call them, she herself is inferior to her husband's mother; and as long as this worthy survives she is expected to serve her with faithfulness and devotion. Much is written in Chinese books on the subject of filial devotion and obedience, and in all ranks of society great stress is laid upon it, and the outward appearance is pretty generally secured. Nor is this devotion to parents allowed to cease even at death. The surviving children feel it resting upon them as a religious duty to provide for their deceased parents a becoming burial, to worship regularly before their tablets, to burn incense and sacrificial paper at their graves, and, in accordance with their superstitious opinions, to provide for their wants in the spirit-land, by burning artificial money, furniture, clothing, etc., at their tombs, all of which is supposed to be transformed by the fire into a spiritual form, adapted to the wants of their deceased friends. While apparent obedience and subordination are rendered to parents while living, and these duties are religiously discharged after their death, we have considerable reason to doubt if much of it springs from the genuine feelings of the heart. Be this as it may, the principle extends into the married life, and, always where parents still survive, gives an inferior position to the wife, and, in many cases, produces for her a sad and toilsome life. In not a few instances she is the mere servant of her husband's parents. She can do nothing of importance without consulting her mother-in-law, and is expected, in all cases, to yield in deference to her opinions and wishes. In the higher circles of life, the wife seems to take pride in thus waiting upon the mother of her husband, consulting her upon all occasions, never being seated while her mother-in-law stands, anticipating her wishes, helping her first at table, etc.; but it is very evident that this does not spring from filial respect and affection, but from regard to the position she occupies. Were she the devoted wife of the man whom her heart had chosen, she might conceive a high degree of respect and veneration for her husband's mother, and probably yield a glad and cheerful acquiescence in this custom of her country; but as it is, we can only look upon and pity her as the hireling, whose place and character depend upon the faithful discharge of this duty, the violation of which would be a sufficient ground for her dismissal. In the lower walks of life, this subordination of the wife to the mother is the fruitful source of many broils and much unhappiness, the irritated husband often beating his wife for neglecting his mother, and sometimes turning her away from his house by sending her back to her parents, or by selling her as the inferior wife or concubine of another.

The position of the wife in China, in the lower grades of society, is still more pitiable. Here she is the same unloved and neglected creature as is found in the seclusion of the rich man's home; but here she must also serve as the selfish husband's wife and as the mother of his children, and, at the same time, as his creature of toil and labor. He may hire her to service and come daily to receive her wages; she toils in the fields, she fishes upon the river, she carries burdens in the street, she returns weary and worn to her dark and cheerless home, she eats alone her scanty meal, she cares for the wants of the children to whom she has given life, and no gentle word of encouragement falls upon her ear, no look, no expression of love greets her coming, no smile, no gratitude repays her for her toil, for she is a daughter of China—she is a woman—she is a wife in the east—she is a heathen, and a heathen wife and mother. O ye daughters of Christian lands, on whom Heaven has showered its choicest benedictions, how little do you know of the sighs and tears, of the loneliness and desolation of these unloved daughters of the east!

If this be the domestic condition of the wives, what must be the position occupied by the purchased handmaids of the grandees of China? These are found principally in the secluded apartments of men of wealth and official standing; but they are found also in a still more humiliating character, as the purchased handmaids and slaves of humbler men. The daughters of China by hundreds and thousands are in the market, and whoever has the means to purchase, and the ability to keep, or the hardihood to work them, may have them for the buying. In the houses of the high and wealthy these females are freed from low and degrading labor; they are handsomely dressed, and spend their time in as much pleasure as they can find in the retired quarters which are assigned them. They exhibit, in their manner and bearing, a sense of inferiority, and, sometimes, of degradation, painful to behold. Their very manner betrays an empty and unsatisfied heart, and their deportment, in many cases, proves that they realize their humiliating condition, and shows that they are sensible of the real state in which they live, which is one of servitude, from which they may be discharged at the pleasure or caprice of their masters. They are subordinate in every thing to the first or principal wife, and to her belong the children they bear to her husband. If sent away the inferior wife can not remove her children with her, unless it be the pleasure of her master, who can compel her to take them if he does not wish the trouble or expense of maintaining them, which is often the case if the children be females; and thus, when discharged, she either goes forth in loneliness or desolation worse than widowhood, to enter into new degrading relations, or, burdened with her offspring, to seek as she can a livelihood for herself and them. In the higher circles of life she is the gaudy ornament of the rich man's house, and the instrument of his pleasure; in the lower walks of life she is unquestionably the victim of a form of slavery which finds no parallel in enlightened or Christian lands—purchased and sold at her master's pleasure, and used at once as his instrument and his slave.

The most affecting element in this degradation of China's daughters is, that with them it is involuntary. It is a matter over which they have no control. When young they are the property of their parents, who look upon them—being females—as burdens, of which they are glad to be rid, and poverty, or want of parental feeling, induces them to throw their offspring into the market. When sold they are the property of their purchaser, and he uses them or disposes of them at his pleasure. I remember that during the distress of last year at Fuh-Chau female children might have been purchased by scores for the paltry sum of ten dollars. Nor are these sales confined altogether to the poor, nor to the very young. The daughter is the property of the father in any rank of society, and may be disposed of at his pleasure. We had rented a large piece of property from a respectable Chinaman, for the purposes of our mission, and advanced on it a considerable sum of money. The natives in the vicinity of the ground objected to our occupying it and building upon it, and the subject was brought into dispute and difficulty, which lasted about two years. At the end of the first year the officers wished to settle the matter by tendering to us a return of the money we had advanced. With this view they called upon the landlord to refund the money; but the money had been all expended, and the landlord had no resources from which to realize it again. He called upon us in his extremity and laid his case before us. He knew of no way by which to secure the money except by the sale of two of his daughters, who had just reached the age of womanhood; and while he seemed willing to sell these, and anxious, in this way, to settle the matter and get clear of the officers, his only plea was, that we should lighten the burden as much as possible and let him off as easily as we could. Under such circumstances we felt unwilling to settle the matter in this way; and having already referred the whole subject to our Government, we refused to receive the money, and were thus saved from participating in the sale of two of China's daughters.

In such circumstances of degradation no wonder that we find suicide existing to a large extent among the females of China. Since the introduction of opium into the country, a drug which secures by its narcotic power an easy death, this dreadful practice is becoming fearfully common, and the oppressed and degraded female feels that she has in her power the means of freeing herself from the dominion of her master, and of putting a perpetual end to all her sorrows; and many a heartless husband now suddenly loses the wife that he degrades, and many a master loses at once the pleasure and the profits of his handmaid or slave.

Nor, when we look at woman's condition in this great empire, and realize it in all its aspects, need we wonder "that before her female offspring have drawn but few inhalations of a heathen atmosphere, with the prospect placed before the child which the mother knows, and feels in all its force, she quenches the fire of maternal love, and closes its existence by suffocation." This dreadful practice of infanticide prevails extensively throughout the empire. Parents destroy their female infants, in many cases, immediately after birth, and perhaps it is most generally done as soon as the child is known to be a female; for we can not suppose that they would choose to wait "for the eye to sparkle, and the smile of the expanding infant to work upon the maternal bosom—this would be too much for a mother's heart, even for a heathen Chinese mother." Yet in cases of poverty and want female children of riper age are often cast off and left to die of starvation. These little abandoned infants, some dead, some dying, scattered along the wayside, or, with a dim hope of eliciting sympathy, placed on the public thoroughfares, are by no means rare sights in China. Indeed, the birth of female children is looked upon, in nearly all families, as an affliction, and in nearly all cases the care required by them is viewed as profitless trouble and vexation. Three ways are used to get rid of them whenever they become too numerous or burdensome—infanticide, abandonment, and sale. In rich men's houses the most genteel method of saving the family from too large a number of females, is to suffocate them as soon as born. This is also practiced among the poor, but not, I imagine, when there is a prospect of realizing any thing from their sale; and this is preferred for its profits, no matter into what circumstances of degradation and infamy it may bring their offspring.

CONVERSATIONAL POWERS OF GREAT MEN.

HAZLITT'S remark, that authors were seldom gifted with conversational powers, seems to be abundantly verified by fact. He says, "Authors ought to be read, and not heard;" and as to actors, they could not speak tragedies in the drawing-room, and their wit was likely to be comedy and farce at a second hand. The biography of men of letters, in a great measure, confirms this opinion; some of the greatest names in English and French literature, men who have filled books with an eloquence and truth that defy oblivion, were mere mutes before their fellow-men. They had golden ingots, which, in the privacy of home, they could convert into coin bearing an impress that would insure universal currency; but they could not, on the spur of the moment, produce the farthings current in the market-place. Descartes, the famous mathematician and philosopher; Lafontaine, celebrated for his witty fables; and Buffon, the great naturalist, were all singularly deficient in the powers of conversation. Marmontel, the novelist, was so dull in society, that a friend said of him, after an interview: "I must go and read his tales, to recompense myself for the weariness of hearing him."

As to Corneille, the greatest dramatist of France, he was completely lost in society—so absent and embarrassed, that he wrote of himself a witty couplet, importing that he was never intelligible but through the mouth of another.

Wit on paper seems to be something widely different from that play of words in conversation, which, while it sparkles, dies; for Charles II, the wittiest monarch that ever sat on the English throne, was so charmed with the humor of "Hudibras," that he caused himself to be introduced, in the character of a private gentleman, to Butler, its author. The witty king found the author a very dull companion, and was of opinion, with many others, that so stupid a fellow could never have written so clever a book. Addison, whose classic elegance of style has long been considered the model, was shy and absent in society, preserving, even before a single stranger, stiff and dignified silence.

Goldsmith, as described by his cotemporary writers, appeared in company to have no spark of that genius which shone forth so brightly in his works. His address was awkward, his manner uncouth, his language unpolished: he hesitated in speaking, and was always unhappy if the conversation did not turn upon himself.

There are exceptions to every rule: in the present instance, however, they serve but to confirm it.

Burns was famous for his colloquial powers; and Galt is reported to have been as skillful as the story-tellers of the east, in fixing the attention of his auditors on his prolonged narrations. Coleridge was in the habit of pouring forth brilliant, unbroken monologues of two or three hours' duration, to listeners so enchanted, that, like Adam, whose ears were filled with the eloquence of an archangel, they forgot "all place—all seasons, and their change;" but this was not conversation, and few might venture to emulate that "old man eloquent" with hopes of equal success.

Washington Irving, in the account he has given of his visit to Abbotsford, says of Sir Walter Scott, that "his conversation was frank, hearty, picturesque, and dramatic. He never talked for effect or display, but from the flow of his spirits, the stores of his imagination. He was as good a listener as a talker; appreciated every thing that others said, however humble might be their rank and pretensions, and was quick to testify his perception of any point in their discourse. No one's concerns, no one's thoughts and opinions, no one's tastes and pleasures, seemed beneath him. He made himself so thoroughly the companion of those with whom he happened to be, that they forgot, for a time, his vast superiority, and only recollected and wondered, when all was over, that it was Scott with whom they had been on such familiar terms, in whose society they had felt so perfectly at ease."

In conversation, Dante was taciturn or satirical. Gray and Alfieri seldom talked or smiled. Rousseau was remarkably trite in conversation—not a word of fancy or eloquence warmed him. Milton was unsocial, and even irritable, when much pressed by talk of others. Dryden has very honestly told us, "My conversation is dull and slow—my humor is saturnine and reserved; in short, I am not one of those who endeavor to break jest in company, or make repartees."

MORAL EDUCATION.*

BY REV. E. THOMSON, D. D.

FOURTHLY. The absurdity of the scheme appears from the connection between the different methods by which a teacher influences his pupils. What is the teacher? When he teaches arithmetic, he is not a mere slate; when he teaches penmanship, he is not a mere hand-writing on the wall; when he teaches reading, he is not a mere alphabet moved by a learned pig; he is a man, a whole man, and nothing but a man; and though you may hire him for intellectual service only, yet he will give you moral service or disservice. You can not have one side of him move while the other stands still. Many men seem to be under the delusion of a certain selfish southerner, who had a wife and child, and owned one-half of a negro named "Harry," and who prayed that God would bless him, and his wife, and his son, and his son's wife, and his half of Harry. Men generally are in no danger of this sort of delusion; they know that one side of a man can not well go without the other. When they employ a man to work with his hands they do not expect him to leave his eyes and ears at home; when you elect a senator you know that you do not merely send a pair of premises to Congress; and yet in regard to the schoolmaster they seem to adopt the views of certain philosophers, who look upon the brain as the mind, and suppose that while one side of it is asleep the other may be awake, thinking out its fractions of ideas and sentiments. The teacher has a moral nature, and so has the child; and you can no more bring them together without having a mutual action, than you can bring salt and water together without having a saline solution. The most oppressed man is still a man. You may hitch a slave to your cart with the ox, or chain him to your door for a watch-dog, but you can not reduce God's child to man's brute; he will still operate upon your moral nature and that of your family—it may be fearfully and forever.

The teacher may give no didactic instruction in morals or religion, and yet be a powerful moral educator. Voltaire did not systematize or argue, yet he did more to demoralize Europe than all its philosophers. He wisely preferred epigram to argument; for though few can reason, all can laugh; while logic is soon forgotten, wit can be retained, and relished, and retailed; and though ridicule is not the test of truth, yet de-vision is a practical fallacy, as it leads us to reject without examination whatever has been its object. Peter Aretin perhaps subdued more princes with his lampoons than ever did Alexander with his sword. If the teacher be disinclined to wit, he may resort to sophistry; he need not mention any faith while he upsets in the youth's mind all faiths, or he may supply a false premise, and let the mind go forward in correct reasoning to wrong conclusions; he need not state his false premise, but merely allude to it as among curiosities or axioms. He may point out fallacies in the reasonings of others in such a way as to mislead. Every system may be supported by an invalid reasoning which is supposed to be correct merely because it leads to a true conclusion. Let a man select some of these fallacies used in support of truth, and construct similar ones whose inconclusiveness shall be apparent, and he need not point out the parallelism; he may leave the young mind to scent that out, and trust to it to proceed to a fallacy of its own; namely, that of denying the truth of a conclusion because certain premises used to prove it are false. Men may argue without syllogisms, may wrap up a couple of premises in a single word, and bring out a conclusion in an exhortation, as did Pilate's wife in a certain message to her husband. They may reason when they appear to be inquiring, as did the most profound of ancient reasoners—Socrates—habitually. Indirect instruction is all the more vivid and permanent for being indirect; the mind goes with its utmost speed when the guide, having put it upon the track, leaves it to itself. An explosion is none the less sure or less violent because the train is concealed. Men do wrong to sneer at little errors as though they were harmless. A little unarmed boy may slip a bolt at midnight and let armed enemies within the citadel. Hints from a man who dare not speak out may not be powerless. There is a doctrine which teaches that infinitesimal doses are most active. Whether homeopathy be true or not, the soul is apt to feel moral poison even in its decillionth dilution, especially if it be in the shape of forbidden sugar, for the prohibition produces a morbid sensibility.

But let us suppose—what is impossible—that you could reduce the human tongue in the teacher's mouth to a tinkling cymbal. He would still have a face, and this would be something more than a picture. Truth and lies, arguments and sophisms, hints and insinuations, might play around it like lightning on the face of the thunder-cloud. Suppose you cover his face with a cowi, he will still put eloquence in his attitudes and movements. Who has not heard of the pantomime? The pointing of a finger, under certain circumstances, might arouse an army, and make all the difference of defeat and victory. Lovers may court by signs and wonders. If the teacher's person were concealed, you could not conceal his spirit. Ah, how often does this silently breathe its image upon a fellow-spirit! In utter weakness it may win conquests, and call forth the exclamation, "Though your arguments are worthless, your spirit has subdued me;" and spirit may reach spirit even though both be deaf and dumb.

Then there is a power—from which no man can divest himself—example—more effective than any other method of instruction, and which no caveat can cancel. Who has not heard of the fable of the frog that exhorted his offspring to walk upright? The influence of a master, however he may be trammelled, will always be great. "Ipse dixit," cries every qualified instructor's pupils with something of the same feeling as the pupils of Pythagoras. They are taught to take his statements in some things; they find them reliable so far as they can verify them. What shall prevent them from transferring the credibility with which they receive one class of his dicta to other classes, and, a fortiori, what shall prevent them from feeling the influence of his life? You might as well put a child in the fire, and pray that he may not be burnt, as put him under the care of a vicious master and hope that he will not be vicious. The contagion of example, like the malaria of cholera, works silently, insensibly, constantly, widely. Even men can scarce resist it—how then shall children? Think not a few cautions will save them. Behind their little eyes are active brains; and little as you think of it, they are capable of going through the most complicated processes of reasoning without knowing any thing of logic. They read countenances, they trace thoughts, they scent inconsistencies as the war-horse snuffs the battle from afar. What one Roman once said to another we may say to the teacher, "Thou shalt live so beset, so surrounded, so scrutinized by vigilant guards, that thou canst not stir a foot without their knowledge. There shall be eyes to detect thy slightest movement, and ears to catch thy variest whisper;" and we may add, if thou art evil, thy careless look, or movement, or whisper may telegraph lies in immortal souls or fire trains upon the track of distant magazines. No district would put the small-pox in the school-house, yet vaccination is some protection against it; but there is no prophylactic against the virus of a bad example. Equally operative is a good example. What though the good man be blindfolded and speechless, still he is a good man. As well suppose that your children can gambol and sing upon the bosom of some flowery mountain without breathing its fragrance, and catching and bearing onward to eternity its forms of beauty, as that they may sit at the feet of a good man, day by day, without receiving the impress of his soul. He is a tree planted by the river's side; his branches shall spread, and his beauty be as the olive-tree, and his smell as Lebanon; and what though he dare not speak, they that dwell under his shadow shall return—they shall revive as the corn and grow as the vine. And who does not know that the impressions made upon young minds are lasting, like the image which Phidias wished to perpetuate by stamping it so deeply in the buckle of his Minerva that it should be impossible to obliterate it without destroying the statue itself! "Take heed that ye offend not one of these little ones."

Fifthly. We may show the impracticability of the scheme we are considering by the relation which the hearer sustains to what is uttered. I know that as in the natural world—as a general rule—like produces like, so in the moral the harvest is according to the seed. But as in the former climate, and soil, and prior cultivation have their influence upon the crop, so in the latter constitution, and education, and habits of association affect the germination and growth of that which is sown. In the road over the Andes there is a half-way house where the ascending and descending travelers meet for refreshments. Here, under the same temperature, those who have just come from the chilling breezes of the summit are panting with the heat, while they who have just quitted the sultry valleys of the base are shivering with the cold. Could we make the school-house a half-way house on the Andes of thought, so various are the moral elevations from which the children come, that what might chill the hearts of some might inflame those of others. In any Christian city you may find some families who breathe the air of heaven, and others who are as perfectly Pagan as are the inhabitants of Shanghai, and to whom a just conception of God would be a new revelation. A word, an allusion, a definition, an incident that might make one soul glow like a furnace, might leave the other like ice.

The associating principle has immense influence on minds; it, in a very great measure, determines the effect which a truth shall have. Mr. Hartley, Sir James Mackintosh, and others have applied it to explain the origin of our moral sentiments. It is that property of our minds by which any object or state of consciousness—whether image, thought, or emotion—has a tendency to recall other states or objects of consciousness with which it has, in some way, been previously connected. Every thought received into the mind by its relations of time, place, cause and effect, resemblance or contrast, awakens a train of thought previously in the mind; its influence, therefore, depends upon the stores of knowledge which the mind possesses and its associating habits, as the result of the chemical test depends upon the affinities of the solution into which it is dropped.

Tell me that I shall say nothing to influence the moral character of those under my care, and you tell me nonsense. As well say that I shall restrain the atmosphere from bearing my breath in any direction except toward the north pole. They who forbid moral instruction generally overlook the fact that it is constantly going on. Though the school might not teach morals, the playground, and the street, and the market, and the tavern, and the promenade, and the auction-block will. Though the teacher do not teach the written decalogue, there are plenty of masters to proclaim an unwritten one: lust, and stealing, and blood, and Atheism preach without any license. Let the youth grow up and choose religion and morals for himself, and he may choose himself into the penitentiary long before he is fully grown. Men often complain of the ease with which the young mind receives a religious bias; but they ought to think of the greater ease with which it receives an irreligious one. The early age at which vicious tendencies appear, the prevalence of wickedness all through the world, the proneness of nations to degenerate, the acknowledged difficulties of virtue, and the shocking details of human history are familiar to all, and show that without resistance the soul must be borne downward.

But if any still object to the education of a child's moral nature, let him reflect upon that nature. It is the moral nature that gives us ideas of right, of duty, of obligation—next to that of God, the noblest conceivable ones; it is this which harmonizes the jarring elements of the breast; that alone can gird well for its conflict with passion, arm the soul with strength in every difficulty, patience under every pain, and a might that braves all the powers of hell. The idea of right may be misdirected, the impulse to right may be misleading, the approbation of conscience may be misapplied, but still that idea is the greatest of all, that impulse of more value than the universe, and that approbation the richest reward that heaven can bestow. The moral nature is necessary in order that we may understand the character of God or receive a revelation of his will. It alone enables us to ascend the scale of being. However undeveloped a human mind may be, it has in it the elements of all intellectual combinations. So if a man have a moral nature he has the elements of virtue, and may ere long ascend the skies. The child at the breast that has but just caught a glimpse of the idea of right is a nobler being than the ancient archangel that has lost it. What though that archangel penetrate all mysteries and obtain all knowledge; what though he take up the isles in his intellectual scales and the hills in his mental balances; what though he measure the heavens with his astronomical rod, and weigh the planets with his mathematical steelyards; what though he combine all beautiful forms, and utter all the languages of earth and the harmonies of heaven; yet without a sense of right to guide him he would be no angel, no man—only an awful reasoning brute. He would need a chain to bind him; and the more glorious his faculties, the stronger must be that chain. True, he might be governed, as a tiger, by fear; but how else than by chain or fear, if the idea of right were absent from his soul? We could admire such a being as we admire the whirlwind or the earthquake, but we could not love him any more than we could the steam-engine. To him blasphemy, perjury, murder, would be as worship, and song, and beneficence. Though he might remove mountains, he could not be "just;" though he might sacrifice himself, he could not be benevolent; though he might wallow in lust, he could not feel shame; and though he might spread ruin around him, he could feel no remorse; he could have no aspiration for purity, no drawing toward God. So would a man be without a moral nature. Unhappily the world has given some illustrations of this remark. Dr. Rush has given one case, Dr. Crawford another, and Dr. Haslem a third. These are familiar to the readers of philosophy. I have received from a colleague—Dr. Merrick—the following, which fell under his own observation:

"S. G. in early life gave singular indications of a total want of the moral nature. Almost as soon as he could speak his mouth was filled with cursing and deceit. He would steal whatever he wished, and from his best friends as soon as from any other; but he was careful to guard against detection. He was utterly unmanageable at school. He possessed sound intellect, an acute apprehension, a good judgment on all but moral subjects, and a ready memory; but his passions and propensities were without any regulator except his sense of interest. For amusement he set fire to the house in which his parents dwelt. When six or eight years old he took a dislike to an infant brother, which on one occasion he threw into the hog-pen, on another buried alive in the ground, and on another threw into a well, the child strangely escaping in each case with its life. As he grew in years he grew in wickedness, till, when about eighteen years old, he took a young child belonging to a sister, and, carrying it to the woods, literally pounded it to death. For this he was sent to the state prison at Charlestown, Mass. Here he refused to submit to discipline, and the authorities were unable to subdue him. He had never labored, and declined doing the tasks assigned him. As a last resort, he was placed in a cistern, where he was obliged to work a pump or allow the water to rise above his head; he allowed it to rise, and was taken out only when life was nearly extinct. He was at length pardoned. He had now become an incarnate fiend. Not only women and children fled from his presence, but men. Many breathed easier when he ceased to breathe. I do not know that I ever saw any thing in him which indicated a moral susceptibility, nor did I ever hear of any thing that did. He was insensible to kindness, and incapable of any attachment except that of the beast for his fellows of the pasture."

Parent, would you have your son, for a score of years, or even a year, in such a state? Would you not rather follow him to the grave? Well, remember that, though congenital cases of this kind are rare, artificial ones are not—the conscience, by bad cultivation or neglect of cultivation, may be seared as with a hot iron.

God has given you a son with all the elements of a man; day by day you watch and pray over his unfolding powers, and rejoice especially to mark the ideas of right, and duty, and gratitude—the feeling after God—the aspiration after a better state. How painful would it be to see the light of his fine eye go out, or the power to guide his feet or stretch his arms fail, and then to see the light of reason, and imagination, and memory slowly extinguished, leaving him an idiot in your arms! But still you could carry him with tenderness if only there were left the idea of right, the power to love the good, to be grateful for your kindness, and to breathe after a higher life. But, O, to see the light of conscience go out, and though the form of man be left, though the intellect blaze forth with celestial brilliancy, yet the power of self-government, and the power of being loved, and the connection with good men and angels, and the sympathy with God, is gone. Let us have "blue laws," puritanical strictness, any thing, rather than uneducated, neglected, put-out consciences.

But the objectors generally say, "Teach morals, if only you do not teach dogmas." But what morals? Of course, you would not allow us to treat of the ground of moral obligation—perhaps you will tell us of the rule of life. Shall I go to the Spartan, who bids the youth to steal, and praises him if he cover the theft; who allows a large margin of licentious indulgence to the husband, and a limited compensation to the wife; who permits the master to kill his slave, and commends him if he commit suicide himself? or shall I go to the Roman, who says, "I will avenge all injuries according as I am provoked by any," and who thinks no lie should be used in contracts? Shall I go to the Mohammedan, who tells me to give alms to the widow and orphan, pray five times a day looking toward Mecca, make the pilgrimage to the Caaba, and eat no meat during the fast of the Ramadan? or shall I go to the modern moralists, who, having burst the shackles of the priesthood, have poured such floods of light upon the subject?

"No, no," I fancy the objector says, "we can agree that the decalogue and our Savior's summary of it in the law of love to God and man shall be taught in common schools till we can find a better rule of life." But then how shall we make the pupils receive it? It will not do to say that it is the law of God; this were a religious dogma. Shall we get the civil law to enforce it? But the civil law can not control the heart, and it is the motive which characterizes the moral action. Indeed, the difficulty always has been more in the absence of the right impulse than the right rule.

"Proba meliora Deteriora sequor."

The intellect may apprehend the rule as the eyes may see the road, but it can no more obey than the eyes can walk. Well, what motives shall we present? Shall we say, with one philosopher, there is a God, or, with another, there is no God? Shall we say, with Socrates, that God overrules the world, or, with Aristotle, that he is not concerned with any thing beneath the moon? Shall we suppose, with Cicero, that there is a future state, or, with Pliny, that there is none? Or shall we find our motives in modern philosophers, whose creeds, to say the least, are no less contradictory? Suppose we teach that there is one God, that he governs the world, that man is responsible to him, and that there is a future state of rewards and punishments: these are all dogmas, and the skeptic insists on their exclusion. He plants himself upon the Constitution. The amendment to which he refers was, however, set up as a monument against religious persecution, not as a caveat against religious principle. Had it been proposed in the convention which framed the Constitution to repudiate the Christian religion, or to express indifference to all religions, or to forbid the inculcation of Christian doctrine in the common schools of the republic, who that knows any thing of our fathers does not feel certain that such a proposition would have been promptly rejected? The infidel may, however, go below the Constitution, and insist that society has no right to require him to pay for any thing which is not essential to its existence. But are not religious principles essential to society? Without it, where can you find a sufficient sanction for law, especially in a republic? If we are to have a religion, we are shut up to the Christian religion. We have too much intelligence to adopt any other. And, surely, there is no reason to complain when the public teachers inculcate only those leading truths of the recognized religion of the nation, which breathe in the national spirit, mold the national mind, direct the march of national events, are recognized the world over as the leading principles of the Christian faith, and which all experience shows are the stability of the times.

I grant there is a difficulty in thus limiting our religious instruction. But it may be met by a judicious selection of teachers. Let them be men of true goodness and of enlarged views.

The difficulties spoken of are not peculiar to common schools. The state interferes with morals and religion. It passes laws against profanity, murder, adultery, polygamy, in disregard of the Atheist, the Pagan, the perfectionist, and the Mormon, who respectively may feel conscientiously bound to blasphemy, infanticide, the violation of the marriage vow, and a plurality of consorts. The state also recognizes great religious principles. In her judicial oaths, in her public fasts and thanksgivings, in her designation of time, in her observance of the Sabbath, in all the branches of the government, she recognizes the being and attributes of God, his providence over the earth, and the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ. Should she cease to do so she would practically ordain Atheism. You may say give us neither Atheism nor Deism, Christianity nor Rationalism, in the government, as though you could separate the legislation of a people from its religious and moral ideas. You might as well attempt to separate the Mississippi from its tributaries.

Well, as much religion as we have in the government we may surely have in the school. There is one question to which I would like to devote attention if I had space. May we not safely intrust religion to priests and parents? If so, although we may admit that it is necessary to government, it may not be allowable in schools. Preaching comes too late—after moral character is in a great measure formed; and if any one would trust parental instruction, let him consider the characteristics of this restless, speculative, money-getting, moving, heterogeneous people. The school-house is the great fountain of national character, and sends forth sweet or bitter waters through all the streams of the nation's thought. It must be in the hands of either religious or irreligious men. Let it fall into the latter, and Cataline is at the gate of our Rome.

"TIS A COLD WINTER NIGHT."

BY ELLA ENFIELD.

It is a dreary night; the storm sweeps past,
Borne along by the chilling, wintry blast;
And the desolate winds are loud and high,
And the clouds grow dark in the dismal sky.

Like the waves of the bounding, raging seas,
When lashed by the winds, are the forest trees,
As before the power of the rudest storms
They bend their lofty and majestic forms.

The ivy still clings to the rugged oak,
Though its beauty's flown and its tendrils broke;
While the withered leaves, as they dance along,
In weird measures beat to their mystic song.

The Old Year had donn'd her richest array,
When Winter's breath swept her beauty away;
And the New Year has scarce stepped on the throne,
When, lo! Winter puts on his rudest frown.

Old Boreas comes from his home to-night,
To rule the storm with his boasted might;
The discordant sounds of his "war-cry" rise
Above the roar of the warring skies.

For the homeless now 'tis a fearful hour,
To brave the storm in its ruthless power;
Let us raise a prayer for the orphaned one,
And for those who know not the bliss of home!

AMENITIES AMONG CHRISTIANS.

IT is sometimes the case, that good and kind-hearted people imbibe, on certain points, a rigidity of opinion, or an undue expectation of conformity, which is both disagreeable and inexpedient. It is a kind of despotism against which enlightened intellect revolts. I am not ignorant that it has been numbered among the tendencies of age, though I have never observed it to be exclusively confined to that period. On the contrary, I have seen and admired in many old persons an increase of candor, a reluctance to condemn, and a mitigation of all austerity, like the mellowing of rich fruit, ripe for the harvest. Those amiable friends seemed to have taken the advice of the clear-minded and benevolent Franklin, not to tarry in the basement rooms of the Christian edifice, but to make haste and get into the upper chamber, which is warm with the sunlight of charity.

While we concede liberty of judgment to others, we should use courtesy in the expression of our own. It is both fitting and wise that dissenting opinions should be wrapped in gentle speech. Were it always so, much of the bitterness of strife would evaporate, and controversies lulled into harmony, make only a stronger music to the ear of humanity.

These amenities mingling with our religious belief should repel bigotry. That we should be attached to the form of faith that has long sustained and solaced us is natural and commendable. But if there has been ever a period in which we were inclined to think that "we alone were the people, and wisdom must die with us," it is time to dismiss the assumption. For among the many good lessons that age has taught us should be toleration and humility. Through much discipline and many sorrows, it instructs us that true religion is not a wall to shut out our fellow-beings, nor a balance in which to weigh grains of doctrine, nor a rack on which to stretch varying opinions, nor a javelin to lanch at different complexions of faith, but "peace, and love, and good-will to men." It should have enabled us to make progress in the last and highest grace, benignant and saintly charity.

Hear the noble suffrage of John Wesley, when advanced years had fully instructed his large mind and heart: "My soul loathes the frothy food of contending opinions. Give me solid, substantial religion. Give me a humble lover of God and of man, full of mercy and good fruits, laying himself out in works of faith, in the patience of hope, and the labor of love.

My soul shall be with such Christians, whosoever they are, and whatsoever doctrines they may hold."

"Men who think, will differ," writes the learned Dr. Priestly, "but true Christians will ever be candid."

"I do not wish," said Rowland Hill, with his characteristic pleasantry, "the walls of separation between different orders of Christians destroyed, but only a little lowered; that we may shake hands over them."

"The nearer we approximate to universal love," said the large-minded, large-hearted Robert Hall, "the higher we ascend in the scale of Christian excellence."

We blame the folly of the Egyptian queen, yet overlook their greater madness, who dissolve in the sharp acid of contention the priceless pearl of charity, the soul's chief wealth, and venture to stand in their reckless poverty before a Judge who requireth love, and the deeds of love, as a test of loyalty, and a shield from wrath. In his dread presence we must all appear, and appeal only as sinners, having "left undone the things that we ought to have done, and done the things that we ought not to have done." From this parity of condition should spring brotherhood of feeling. Hand in hand let us kneel before the throne of the great Pardoner.

A simple, significant incident was once related in the discourse of a Scottish divine. It was as follows:

Two cottagers, dwelling under the same roof, became alienated. It so happened that both were employed at the same time in thatching their tenement. Each heard the sound of the other's hammer, and saw the progress of his work, yet took no friendly notice.

But at length, as they approached nearer, they looked in each other's face and chanced to smile. That smile was a messenger from heaven. With it came the thought how much better it would be for those who dwell under one roof to be at peace in their hearts.

Then they shook hands. They said, "Let us be friends," and a new, great happiness became theirs.

Are we not, all of us, dwellers under God's roof, and as Christians engaged in the same work? Is not the silent lapse of years bringing us nearer and nearer toward each other? Let us then press on in love, till by his grace, our thatching well done, we meet on the top at last, and mingle in with the joy of angels.—

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

BY MRS. BITHIA B. LEAVITT.

CHAPTER I.

"FOR what am I living? what the object of my every-day's existence? I rise in the morning—live through the day—retire at night—sleep—rise again—live—live! but for what do I live? Alas! I do not know; paltry nothings consume my time; they are but empty pleasures, which I despise while pursuing. O, I have no object—I have no aim—miserable existence!" and the heart of the young girl ached while she thus soliloquized. In the excitement of her feelings she spoke aloud; but, startled by the sound of her voice, she looked around to see if any heard. No person was near; the bright, genial sunshine of a spring afternoon beamed sweetly upon her; the light breeze wafted a thousand delicious odors around; all nature seemed rejoicing in love and beauty. Oppressed by the very softness of the sunshine and the stillness which reigned, Clara Spencer quickened her pace, hummed a tune; but the tune died upon her lips, and her steps gradually slackened to their former sauntering pace. The sky was very blue that afternoon; not a cloud of the most fleecy whiteness colored the vast dome above, and there was a softness in the sunshine peculiarly wooing in its influences. The trees were just donning their richest verdure, and the anemones and violets—first flowers of spring—with all their coyness, drooping their little heads with a modest blush, seemed, nevertheless, to court the admiration of the passer-by. All this varied loveliness but deepened the sigh and saddened the heart of Clara, as she slowly moved toward her own home. She had just witnessed the funeral services of a youth of eighteen. He was the eldest son of fond parents, the idol of young sisters, the flattered and caressed favorite of numerous friends. Wealth had lavished her comforts, her luxuries, her flowers, upon his pathway. Intellectual labor was becoming a delight, and he had returned to his studies from his visit to his home all eager for the honors of his class, and burning to win a name worthy to be enrolled among the great ones of earth.

"There!" he exclaimed, as he dashed down his book, "there! I have conquered the last difficulty, I have mastered my studies, and I am to be Valedictorian. Hail, Examination! hail, you ill-tempered critics that pother your own brains that you may torture ours—that study knotty questions but to entangle us! hail! I am prepared. A few short weeks of gay recreation, and then—and then—then"—visions, sparkling, glorious visions, danced before his imagination. He threw himself back in his chair, and reveled amid scenes of future greatness and glory. Examination time came, passed, and the young student won for himself the esteem and applause of the college. The halls were thronged for commencement exercises. Each student in his turn commanded the attention of personal friends; but when Edward Stanton came forward as the last speaker, a common interest was manifested. He reviewed the course of study his class had pursued; showed with what industry they had sought to unvail the obscurities of language—to expose the simple majesty of the Greek and flowing grandeur of the Latin—to appreciate the excellences of both poetic and prose composition. He alluded to the ambition they had in common felt to master the abstrusities of science and dive into the mysteries of metaphysics; to soar to the most distant star, and fathom the lowest deep; to discover and understand the laws of nature. "And now, my friends," continued he, "the moment has arrived in which to speak the sad, sad word 'farewell.' We have together drank of the deep, broad streams of knowledge; but instead of quenching the thirst with which we approached their banks, far intenser desires have been created—desires which shall burn with an ever-increasing ardor, long as the spirit breathed into man by the almighty God shall exist. We separate, my classmates, but let us never forget the beautiful motto we have chosen for our own—'Excelsior.' We separate, each to take our place in life; but may we not, as we think of difficulties already conquered, obstacles already surmounted, energies but developed, not daunted—may we not, in view of what lies before, covered, it is true, with a thin but impenetrable veil—may we not exclaim, 'We are prepared—we will triumph!' Yes, yes, there is a voice—the voice of faith—not whispering in the ear, but speaking methinks in thunder tones, echoing from each recess of the soul, 'You can triumph!' My classmates, we shall triumph. Let us, then, on, on to the battle of life." His eye was flashing; his form, slight and graceful, was expanded to its full height; and speaking with an energy that showed the spirit's power, he seemed to grasp the shadowy future, and clothe it with the present. Every eye was riveted upon him; every heart caught the spirit of the speaker. Old men were carried back to their youthful days, when they occupied the position of that young student. They forgot the years of toil that had intervened; the struggles, the discouragements that had thickened along their paths—all, all, was forgotten in the enthusiasm of the moment. The speaker paused; the flush in a measure passed from his cheek, his eye softened into a milder luster, and, turning to his instructors, thanked them in terms eloquently simple for their fidelity and forbearance, their reproofs and encouragements, and then, in the name of the class, bade them farewell. Diplomas were delivered, gratulations followed, and Edward Stanton retired to his room, too much excited to gain the repose necessary to recruit his wasted strength.

Morning came; but, instead of preparations for returning home, the lightning fled on rapid wing to announce to Mr. and Mrs. Stanton the sudden illness of their beloved son. They hastened to his bedside; but in time to receive the faint pressure of the almost palsied hand, and catch the last sigh escaping the lips so eloquent in life now chilling in death. Those lips had recently exclaimed, while viewing time and its demands, "I am prepared—I will triumph!" What said they when death's grim visage and startling voice demanded his preparations for eternity? Said they, "Though I walk through the shadow of the valley of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me?" Asked they of Death, "Where is thy sting?" of the Grave, "Where is thy victory?" Alas! silence sealed them; death sealed them; the grave sealed them. As the flashing meteor darts along the sky, startling the beholder with surprise and admiration, and then in a moment loses itself in ether or dashes into the abyss of ocean, so this youthful spirit had started forth, sparkled for a time, and as suddenly closed his transient career in the dark waters of eternity.

It was beside his cold form, hushed into rigidity, Clara Spencer had been standing. Could any other than most solemn thoughts press into the mind of the young girl, gay and light-hearted though she be? Could any other question occupy her attention than the great leading question presented to all upon the very threshold of accountable existence—what is the end for which I live? Philosophy has uttered her voice in answer to the query. Sects, numerous and diversified as the stars of heaven, all differing as one star differeth from another star in glory, have had their systems and their theories; but let these be simplified, and it will be found that all originate, and all terminate in the single desire filling the universal heart of mankind—"I want to be happy." Clara felt this want when she murmured to herself, "No, no, I am not happy—

I am not happy; but I wish to be, I ought to be, I will be; so away, away, these sober thoughts that always leave a sting; there is no reason in the world why I shouldn't be the happiest creature in it. Why is it, with every thing to contribute to my happiness, I am always uneasy and discontented? There is cousin Lucy, with comparatively nothing to render life pleasant and desirable, and yet she is always as happy as a bird. What can be the reason of such a vast difference?" As Clara ascended the marble steps and entered the spacious hall, she again repeated to herself, "Yes, I ought to be happy, and I am determined at once to make an effort to be so."

CHAPTER II.

"There, dearest mother, you have had your bath, and seem so comfortable, I will leave you to rest awhile; and if you wish the least thing, just tap the bell, and I'll hear you. Here is a kiss, too, to sweeten your slumbers," and the daughter bent over the emaciated form to bestow the promised caress. A tear, a single tear, a little tear, but a tear containing its world of meaning, had escaped from its fountain, and just as the lips pressed the cheek it fell upon the brow of the parent.

"Lucy, my child, my loved one, what means this? what sorrow have you, my daughter, unknown to your mother? Come and nestle in my bosom, and tell me what distresses you. You are not wont to conceal from your mother," and the maternal hand was outstretched to draw the daughter to her breast.

"O, mother dear, never mind; it was a moment of weakness; you know how foolish I am sometimes. Do not let it disturb you; it is gone now. Try and sleep as sweetly as possible, and be sure to tap your bell as soon as you awaken. Now mind me, will you?" and Lucy tried to speak playfully as she again pressed a kiss upon her parent's brow.

"Yes, dear, leave me now, and I will endeavor to compose myself, for I need rest. But, my daughter," added she, "my daughter, you know the source of all strength. If any other sorrow is added to those you already have, go to the mercy-seat—go to your Savior. He has promised to bear your griefs and carry your sorrows. Go, my child, and may the angel of the covenant go with you!"

Lucy gently lowered the blind, drew the curtains, and silently withdrew to her own little room. Truant tears that had started to her eyes, and been refused expression, now flowed again, and throwing herself on the bed, Lucy gave vent to her stifled emotion.

"O, has it come to this! has it come to this!" she murmured. "Must I let my mother suffer rather than apply to my uncle for a support? Suffer! no, my mother; much you have borne for me, it is little I can do for you. But those stern, dark eyes! how can I encounter them? Never, never can I summon the courage." She paused. "I summon the courage!" she repeated slowly; "indeed, never; but, 'through Christ strengthening, I can do all things.'" Lucy fell upon her knees, and in an agony of soul poured out her desires and petitions into the ear of Him who has declared, "Cast thy burdens upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." O, how sublime the faith that flowed into that youthful breast while bowed at the mercy-seat! How pure and holy that light which spread over that sweet face, so lately drenched with tears! and what a strength infused to perform whatever duty Providence might impose! "Yes, yes, mother is right," thought she; "I must fly to the cross—and, O, what love and mercy are there blended!" She seated herself with the consciousness of new strength of soul, both to plan and execute. The past came up before her. The happiness that had spread through their little household but a few short years before, the illness and death of her beloved father, the subsequent struggles of herself and mother, the present debility of that mother, all passed before her. And now what was to be done? Their once comfortable support had been gradually diminishing, and the time had arrived when something must be put in operation to yield her the necessities of life—her mother its comforts, and, if possible, some of its luxuries. But what could she do? Plan after plan occurred; plan after plan was rejected. There were insuperable objections to every thing upon which her mind could fasten. There was her piano—she might give music lessons; but her piano had been locked for months—her mother could not bear the sound. Perhaps it could be moved to some other place—how could she leave her mother? A teacher was wanted in the new seminary to instruct in the very branches of study with which she was most familiar. That would be the very thing; but then her mother—she would be so lonely; indeed, could not possibly dispense with her. Scarcely an hour of the day but she performed for her some little office of love and comfort. What could she do? The future, with the threatening attitude of a hideous monster, arrayed in terror and darkness, started up before her, but not a fear agitated, not a sigh escaped. That young heart wavered not from the faith it had reposed in the Rock of Ages. With an upward glance of trustful love, Lucy whispered, "'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee'—'tis mine, 'tis mine, and I will cling to it." The little bell tinkled, and Lucy entered her mother's room with a calm step and cheerful countenance.

"Come here, my child," said Mrs. Warner, "come and sit by me while I talk with you a little." Lucy obeyed; but as she drew toward the bed she observed the pale face had become more pallid, and the eye that had been sunken and dimmed by disease now shed forth a brighter luster. Mrs. Warner raised herself upon the pillows; her eyes closed, and Lucy beheld the big tears forcing themselves through the quivering lids. "Mother, dearest mother, what can be the matter? Tell me, tell me quickly, what so distresses you. I hoped you had been sleeping, but you look exhausted; you do not feel worse?" and she fondly stroked the faded cheek, and wiped the tears from her eyes.

"I am somewhat exhausted, my Lucy, but while I have strength I would talk with you. I feel, my child, that disease has almost accomplished its ravages upon my poor body; my feeble strength can not long endure. And, O, to leave you, Lucy, alone to battle with life's trials—alone to—"

"O, speak not thus, dearest mother!" interrupted Lucy, throwing herself upon her parent's bosom; "do not thus agonize me; do not talk of leaving me! O my Father, spare the impending stroke! It can not be; it must not be; it shall not be!"

"Be calm, my child, be calm. Let not rebellious words escape your lips. God is love. He doth not willingly afflict; and though I am conscious that decay is rapidly progressing, my spirit, Lucy, my spirit mounts up on wings as eagles. When I think of leaving the world, with all its cares and all its woes, to worship before Him whom my soul adores, washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb, and to meet your beloved father—a glorified spirit—O Lucy, the thought is ecstatic; I feel not my weakness; I feel not my body. No, no, I soar above it all. Tears fall but for you, my poor child. The contemplation of your lonely orphanage falls upon me at times with an almost crushing weight; but faith sustains the shock, and I have a sweet assurance that all shall but tend to the glory of God. From your earliest infancy I have endeavored to instill principles of truth; and I thank God, my child, you have learned that this life is but a prelude to the one hereafter. We may here strike upon the harp of life a few chords that resound with melody; but there, my daughter, shall one eternal chorus of music burst from the golden strings, thrilling all heaven with its rapturous praise. Think much of heaven, my child, of the richness of redeeming love, of the glories of the cross, and their contemplation will lift you above the cares of the world, while its empty pleasures and vain pursuits will sink to their proper insignificance. And now, Lucy, seek for grace to bear this trial—the loss of the last friend you have on earth who will sympathize with and cherish you. Let it but draw you with a stronger cord to the side of your blessed Savior; and comparing your sufferings with his, keen though they be, your heart will be subdued, your affections purified, and Christ will reign there to sustain and guide. Try, my child, try through grace, to refrain from the least thought that would reflect upon the goodness of your heavenly Father; and, in thus trying, you will realize that supporting faith which alone can enable the soul to triumph in the hour and power of darkness.”

Lucy had sunk upon the bed, overcome by her intense emotions. When her mother ceased speaking, she slowly raised her head, and, with a look that pierced to the very soul of that sympathizing parent, exclaimed, passionately, “O, mother, why does fortune select me as a fitting object on which to wreak its vengeance? why?”

“My child, my child,” interrupted Mrs. Warner, “you amaze me. ‘Fortune,’ Lucy?”

“O no, no, dear mother, not fortune—Providence. God forgive me! I know that providence is in every event; but why, O why, must I so young be required to suffer such anguish? My sun scarce risen, and yet shrouded in gloom; my father snatched from our circle ere I could repay his love; want, poverty, threatening every day; but, above all, my mother—my mother—fading from my view, leaving me to wander over earth alone—O, is not my heart breaking—breaking, mother?” and, with a look of inexpressible agony, she tightly and convulsively clasped her hands upon her breast.

“My love, my Lucy,” replied Mrs. Warner, putting her arm tenderly around her daughter, “God has, indeed, chosen you hitherto in the furnace of affliction. You have suffered much for one so young; but has it not resulted in bringing you to the cross? What would you now take, Lucy, for these very lessons, painful though they have been? But,” added she, with a graver expression and in a more chiding tone,

“Lucy, you are not wont to speak in this rebellious way of the dealings of Providence.”

“It was wrong, sinful, I know,” replied the young girl, mournfully, burying her face in the bed-clothes; “but, O mother, how weak, how very prone to unbelief is the heart! It was but a little while ago I left you, depressed with a sense of our pecuniary wants, and I went to my own room to implore grace for every trial, and”—

“And you received the grace you sought; you were blessed with a view of your Savior, Lucy; your faith was strengthened, and you felt strong to endure. I saw it in your serene countenance when you came into my room. Ah, my child, what light will emanate from those who have been with Jesus!”

“Yes, mother, but it is all gone now,” replied Lucy, with a heavy sigh, while the tears streamed down her cheek. “My grace has just been tried, and fails. O, I shall never, never, be established in the life of faith!”

“Do not despond, my beloved child,” said Mrs. Warner, while her whole heart melted in love toward that struggling spirit; “do not despair; but remember that it is by overcoming each trial as it is presented that the soul becomes grounded and established in faith and holy living. God gave you grace to bear the approach of poverty, and now, my child, seek for grace to sustain you in this heaviest trial. ‘Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find,’ are the words of the immutable God; they must be fulfilled. O my child, I deeply, deeply, feel your distress; but remember ‘whom God loveth, he chasteneth.’ Let not your heart leave the mercys-seat, my dear Lucy, till you can say, with a sweet acquiescence, ‘Thy will be done.’”

That night, when Mrs. Warner was composed to sleep, Lucy trimmed the lamp anew, replenished the oil, and retired to her own room.

The same spirit that sustained the ancient patriarch to wrestle in prevailing prayer till break of day brooded over the young girl, as in the silence of night and solitude she prostrated herself before the throne of grace. Midnight witnessed her struggles; the bright morning star rose to celebrate the victory of her faith. The sun was scarce risen ere Lucy found herself walking with a quick, elastic step toward her uncle’s dwelling. It was a fine, large, old-fashioned mansion, situated upon a high eminence; and the elegant cultivation of the grounds showed the owner to be a person of wealth and refinement. A broad avenue wound in a spiral from the base to the top of the hill, terminating in an extensive area in front of the house. The well-cut lawn was adorned here and there with clumps of forest-trees, and a rich variety of flowers, jeweled with the sparkling dew, shed forth their delicious fragrance upon the morning air. As Lucy arrived at a certain point of the road she paused. The sun had been obscured by a dense cloud, which reposed in sullen grandeur upon the top of a distant hill; but, as if to smile upon and cheer her onward, it burst at that moment from its screen, robing all objects in its light and glory. Its beams darted to the bosom of a little lake beneath, and, as they kissed its tiny waves, they danced and sparkled as if rejoicing to reciprocate their morning salutations. Lucy had been for a few days more than usually confined to her mother's sick bed, and she now found the coolness doubly refreshing. She threw off her bonnet, eager to drink the exhilarating draughts of pure air, and her spirit gushed forth in loving gratitude to Him the Creator of such loveliness.

"O, how delightful," she exclaimed, "how sweet and beautiful is every thing around me! Can any one be any thing but happy in such a spot? One would think so; but, O Sin! Sin! thou didst enter Paradise, and, with thy polluting touch, despoiled its fairest beauty—and where now is the place in which thou intrudest not thy hideous visage?"

Lucy looked toward the house, and sighed as she reflected that not one of its inmates but bore the lineaments of that image—that not one had any perception of the divine plan by which beauty and harmony, virtue and love, could be restored to this sin-disordered universe.

"Is my uncle at home?" inquired Lucy of the servant whom she found engaged polishing the already polished marble steps.

"He is at home, but I do not know whether he is up," replied the man. "But walk in, Miss Warner, and I will inform him."

"I will go to the library," returned Lucy; "and you need not acquaint Miss Clara of my coming, as I am in a hurry this morning."

She passed through the spacious hall, and still more spacious parlors, rich with their elegant furniture, and seated herself in the library to await her uncle's entrance. Now she hears his step; her heart throbs wildly; the color fades from her cheek; even the lips assume an ashy hue; the breathing is oppressed; and rising from the sofa, she seeks the open window. One short, fervent, ejaculatory prayer—"O my Father, give me strength!"—her faith is reassured, and all again is calm.

"Good-morning, uncle," said she, as the tall, majestic figure of Mr. Spencer moved into the room.

"Good-morning, Lucy."

"I was afraid of disturbing you by coming at so early an hour, uncle; but mother always sleeps well in the morning, and I can better leave her at this time."

"I am in the habit of early rising," replied Mr. Spencer.

A pause ensued—a dreadful pause to poor Lucy. What should she say next? Again her heart ascends, "O my Father, give me strength!"

"You seem to have something to say to me, Lucy," said Mr. Spencer at length, observing her embarrassed look. "What is it—can I do any thing for you?"

The words were well enough, implied enough; but, O, what a world of difference as manner differs! Lucy was awed, chilled; but from her trusting heart went up momentarily the secret cry, "Give me strength—give me strength!" Making a desperate effort, she said, "Uncle, I should not have intruded upon you but for my mother's sake. I have come this morning to acquaint you with some of my difficulties, if you feel disposed to listen, and"—

"I thought it would come to this," muttered the uncle. "Well, tell me what you have to say," returned he, as he beheld her hesitate.

Poor Lucy! what would she not have given for one encouraging look, one affectionate word! Her heart was full; but the sob was suppressed, the tear dashed from the eye; all her courage summoned.

"I do not wish to apologize, uncle, for what I have to say. As you know, my mother is wasting away, and for the last few months it has taken all the economy of which I am mistress to supply us with those things necessary to our comfort. Our little stock of money is nearly exhausted, and," added she, ingenuously, "I have come to ask you for means adequate to my mother's wants"—

"And your own, eh?" interrupted Mr. Spencer, with a sarcastic smile.

"No, uncle," replied Lucy, and despite her efforts the color would mount to her cheek, and her voice assume a more spirited accent, "no, I ask for my mother alone."

"And you, my little girl, what will become of you? you can not starve."

"I do not expect to starve," replied Lucy, meekly. "If I seek first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, I have a right to expect all these things will be added." Mr. Spencer cast a quick, searching look at Lucy. Of all things he detested this quoting of Scripture, and from the mouth of a young girl it was nothing but absolute cant. However, Lucy's clear blue eye bore the keen scrutiny of those dark orbs with unflinching steadfastness, and she added, in a confident tone, "I can easily obtain some employment that will yield me all that is necessary—beyond this I care not, if my mother only has those comforts that her delicate state imperiously demand, and to which she has always been accustomed."

"Your father left something, I thought—is that all gone?" inquired Mr. Spencer, in the same cold tone of voice.

"Your father!" ah, that word was too much for Lucy's burdened heart. She could bear coldness; she could bear suspicion; but an allusion to her beloved father thrilled her with pain. Her lips quivered, her eyes filled with tears; in vain, she tried to refuse her emotion; again the fervent prayer arose from her aching heart, "O my Father, give me strength!" With some degree of calmness, she replied, "Yes, uncle, he left us a comfortable support; but my mother knew nothing of the real value of money, and through various causes it has dwindled away, instead of producing, and I am forced, painful though it be, in consideration of my mother's comfort, to apply to her nearest relative."

"Yes, yes, I am her nearest relative," said Mr. Spencer, impatiently; "but she married without my approbation."

"I thought my father was much beloved as a man of the most honorable character," exclaimed Lucy, with the utmost astonishment depicted in her countenance.

"Honorable! yes, honorable he was; but his head was stuffed with all the nonsensical mummeries of so-called religion!"

"And a heart refined and purified by religion's graces," interrupted Lucy, rising. A new light shone from that gentle eye—a flush glowed upon the cheek—and, with a voice firm and clear, she added, "I came this morning, uncle, unknown to my mother, to acquaint you with her circumstances. Let not a word militate against him whom I loved and revered as a father. His memory is sacred from any words of disparagement."

Lucy spoke gently and respectfully; but there was a certain air of dignity that could not but be felt. The stately man was awed by the presence of that young creature; and although Mr. Spencer was a haughty man, nevertheless, beneath a stern exterior, there existed, deep down in the heart, some of those kindlier feelings that belong to human nature. He had been displeased with his sister's marriage on account of, as he expressed it, Mr. Warner's religious vagaries. This prejudice had been in a measure overcome as he had become better acquainted with him; still there always existed a restraint between the two families—a restraint not expressed in words, but felt by all, and influencing all in their occasional seasons of intercourse. Friendship had ever been maintained between Clara and her cousin Lucy; and yet, owing to the totally different manner in which the two girls were educated, this friendship had never ripened into a real affection.

"Well, well, Lucy," said Mr. Spencer, in a kinder tone, "my sister shall never suffer, though she didn't follow my desires altogether. That was hardly to be expected, I suppose. How is she getting?"

"Getting?" repeated Lucy, mournfully, "O, uncle, I thought you knew she was becoming weaker and weaker every day. She would like to see you, if—if!"

"If I will visit her humble dwelling, I suppose you mean," exclaimed Mr. Spencer, laughing.

Lucy could not divine why her uncle should laugh when told of his sister's declining health and desire to see him, and looked up inquiringly. The fact was, Mr. Spencer's conscience reproached him for the neglect with which he had treated his sister; for of late years, owing to their dissimilarity of tastes, the estrangement, which was slight in its beginning, had now become a habit. However he might assume this lightness of manner, which, as a general thing, was far beneath his dignity, he could not shut from his mind the conviction of his neglect, and he secretly resolved to bestow every care that could possibly relieve his sister's sufferings or add in the slightest degree to her comfort. As Lucy moved toward the door, he remarked, "You did right, child, to come to me—you did right—and I respect you for your plainness and simplicity in presenting your story;" and he shook her hand with an almost kind manner as he said "good-morning."

With a light heart and a bounding step, Lucy was skipping down the front steps, when she heard her cousin's voice in the hall. "And so you told Thomas not to acquaint Miss Clara that you were here? but Miss Clara happened to catch a glimpse of you, and here she is to run down the hill with you."

"I am glad to see you," replied Lucy, smiling, and waiting for her, "and glad to have you walk down the hill with me; but I had a little business with uncle, and thought I would not disturb the rest of the family. My call was early, but uncle was already risen."

"O dear, yes, pa is an early riser; and, what is worse, I have to be up, too. I hate early rising," added Clara, pettishly.

"O, how could you lie in bed these lovely mornings—the air is so exhilarating, and the birds are singing so charmingly! If I lived here, I should be perfectly happy."

"I dare say you would be, for you always seem happy, no matter where you are; but, for my part, I get tired of every thing. Life is a dull sort of a thing at any rate;" and Clara yawned as in confirmation of her opinion.

"Perhaps you do not take enough exercise," suggested Lucy.

"Exercise! yes, I roam about continually. I am always exercising."

"Perhaps you do not read enough."

"Yes, I read when I am not wandering in the woods. I read till I am disgusted with every thing; sick to death of novels, tired of history, wearied, too, with biography, and as to memoirs, I am quite out of patience with them. I don't believe a word in any of them. All the person's virtues are paraded before the reader; his character landed unsparingly; but you never find a word about his faults and infirmities. I wonder how large a book my biographer would manage to spin out by a recital of my virtues and super-excellences of character."

By this time Clara had talked herself into a thoroughly bad humor. Lucy perceived her spirit, and, knowing she was not in a fit frame to receive the real cause of her discontent, which was plain enough to her own mind, made some good-humored reply, and endeavored to turn the subject. The breakfast bell soon recalled Clara to the house, and Lucy hastened home in time to quietly put her bonnet away before her mother awoke.

NOW.

"Now" is the only word ticking from the clock of time. "Now" is the watchword of the wise man. "Now" is on the banner of the prudent. "Now" is the admonition of eternity. Let us keep this little word constantly in our mind. Whenever any thing is to be done, we should do it with our might, remembering that "now" is the only time for us. It is, indeed, a sorry and dangerous way to get through the world by putting off till to-morrow, saying, "Then I will do it." This will never do. "Now" only is ours. "Then" may never be. "Now," in the terse language of Scripture, "is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

WOMAN'S POWER.

"Nor steel nor fire itself hath power,
Like woman in her conquering hour.
Be thou but fair—mankind adore thee!
Smile—and a world is weak before thee!"

THE poet has disclosed the whole secret of woman's conquering power. Fair in her virtue, smiling in her goodness, she wields an influence which mailed warrior never could. Her strength is in her graces, her weapon is love; and her power is resistless when these are combined with modest merit, and dictated by conscious duty.

In influence woman is as much superior to man as affection is superior to intellect. Man represents the understanding of the universe, and woman the will; man the mind, woman the soul; man the reason, woman the heart. The powers of observation and reflection are cold, useless appendages to the human being, unless warmed into exercise and attracted to good objects by the feelings and sentiments of the affectionate mind. How little, in this world, do we think, judge, and know, in comparison with what we feel! Man may do mighty things in the intellectual advancement of the world; but

"What I most prize in woman
Is her affections, not her intellect!
The intellect is finite, but the affections
Are infinite, and can not be exhausted."

GOODNESS.

To be constantly in the presence of a good person—of one whose words and acts tend to purify and elevate—how pleasant and useful it is! We have no disposition to speak an impure word, to perform a wrong act, or even to think of evil. The presence of the good is a guardian angel to keep and preserve us from the sins and temptations by which we are surrounded. Suppose that being who moves about to bless, should be the companion of our bosoms—the one to whom we can make known our joys and sorrows—what a powerful influence for good it would have over our lives! We should rejoice daily in feeling how blessed goodness is, and be so elevated in all our thoughts, that it would become a difficult task for us to sin. Woman! can you not exercise such an influence over your erring husband? If he loves the company of the idle and partakes of the inebriating glass, can not you draw him by love and kindness away from sure destruction? Let the atmosphere around you be that of goodness and truth, and you will surely be ministering angels to save the lost.

THE ANGEL'S VISIT TO WILLIE.

BY M. P. WHITE.

"MOTHER, last night, when the stars were bright,
And the moon was shedding her silver light,
And the fleecy clouds, like a silver veil,
Came now and then o'er her brow so pale,
I thought that an angel, whose home is where
There is neither sorrow, nor sin, nor care,
Came stealing in with the soft moonlight
To the couch where you laid me down at night,
And he laid his hands on my clust'ring hair,
As you lay yours when I say my prayers.
'And, Willie,' he said, 'is your heart to-night
Quite pure and true in your Maker's sight?
Lurks there no spirit that seems to say,
'I'll remember the wrongs I've borne to-day,
And on the boy who has spoiled my play
I'll have my revenge on some future day?'"
Know you not, Willie, our Father above
Looks on you all with a feeling of love—
That e'en to the evil and thankless in mind
Our God is merciful, gracious, and kind?
You must be like him, if you'd live above,
And learn unkindness to conquer by love.
And do you not, Willie, some wrong each day
For which to ask pardon, at night, when you pray?
As God then forgives, so, Willie, must you
Forgive all unkindness and wrong done you;
Then ever 'round you shall bright angels be,
And the glory of God be unfolded to thee.'
And now, dear mother, if Tim comes to-day,
And plagues and teases when I want to play—
If he loses my ball or spoils my kite,
I'll try to be gentle with all my might.
If I'm kind when he's cross and gives me a shove,
Say, will not that be conquering with love?"
The tears were bright on that mother's smile,
As her lips pressed the brow of her little child,
And she thank'd her God that the lesson giv'n
Was fitting his heart for a home in heav'n.

SABBATH EVENING.

BY H. N. POWERS.

THE twilight of the evening lies
On quiet homes and tender skies.
The sacred silence seems to bring
A blessing on its brooding wing,
And all the hallowed Sabbath air
Is like the calm of silent prayer.
O precious calm! O healing rest!
That broods so warmly on my breast:
It seems that on my life doth lie
The peace that soothes the upper sky—
A large contentment, in whose grace
Joy wells like light in liberal space—
A tranquil trust, a hope whose eye
Is full of immortality,

And love whose sweetness freshens through
My being like celestial dew.

O, while I wait so near the skies,
What Sabbath memories fill my eyes—
The weary rested, new loves born,
Friends talking of the heavenly morn,
The good seed sown, the blended prayer,
Peace in the heart and every-where,
The Son's return, the eyes that weep
Those precious tears which angels keep,
The pardon sealed, sweet counsel given,
And names we cherish writ in heaven!
Thanks! Father, that thy Church once more
On life's vain strife has shut the door,
And to the feast of love doth win
Her waiting, wandering children in.
Thanks! for thy grace has been to-day
More than we dared to hope or pray;
Thy cloud of mercy hung above
Has broken with the weight of love!
We have no life, dear Christ, but thee,
No way, no truth. O, may we see
With larger vision, day by day,
The beauty of the perfect way;
Count all things loss, if we may win
By thy cross triumph over sin!
So shall these fleeting Sabbaths here
Glide into heaven's eternal year.

MINNIE BROWN.

BY REV. J. M. VINCENT.

In a quiet little town,
Nestling in a quiet vale,
Lives my happy Minnie Brown,
With her face serene and pale—
Sweet Minnie Brown!
Sweet Minnie!
Pale-faced, happy Minnie Brown!
Every day she trips along
Across the pleasant village green,
On her lips a silvery song—
In her eye a silvery sheen.
Sweet Minnie Brown!
Sweet Minnie!
None so sweet as Minnie Brown.
Every one knows Minnie Brown,
And to know her is to love;
But a heart so kind and pure
Soon must dwell in realms above.
Sweet Minnie Brown!
Sweet Minnie!
Thou must leave us, Minnie Brown.
Yes, sweet Minnie Brown must fade;
Close her bright, love-beaming eye;
In the grave her form be laid;
Darling Minnie soon must die!
Farewell, Minnie!
Sweet Minnie!
Darling Minnie, fare thee well!

LIFE AND REMINISCENCES OF WILLIAM JAY.

BY ERWIN HOUSE.

SECOND PAPER.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Jay was converted under Methodist preaching, and for several years thereafter attended Methodist meetings, he had his principal religious training among the Independents. Had it been a matter of choice, and not of mere circumstances with him, he most probably would have connected himself with the Presbyterian or the Methodist Church.

We have seen that among his first acquaintances, after he began to preach, were Rev. Rowland Hill, Rev. John Ryland, and Rev. John Newton. Mr. Hill was the son of a baronet, and received a first-class university education, and was possessed naturally of a quick and discriminating intellect. He seems, however, to have been but a poor student after leaving the university, never spending much time in his library room, and seldom ever reading a book through. His religious training was Calvinistic; but his Calvinism, we are told, never took a notion to run to seed. He was decidedly and of set purpose opposed to an abuse of Gospel grace, and fought vigorously against Antinomianism, and in favor of affording sinners of every class a chance for saving their souls. Every sermon preached by him touched upon the sole theme of the apostle's ministry, "Jesus Christ and him crucified;" and whatever was the topic discussed, he was always certain, before closing, to "exhale forth something of the savor of the Redeemer's knowledge."

He was peculiarly an odd man, a proof of which he furnishes in one of his dialogues on the kinds of preachers in the world; namely, the tap-cask, the slop-dash, and the slap-dash. "By the first he means preachers distinguished by tame and inert feebleness; without faults, but also destitute of all energy of thought or force of expression—as Shakspeare would say, fit to 'chronicle small beer.' By the second, he means preachers marked by strong things in doctrine, but loose, and hazardous, and extravagant in representation; aiming at great effect by the noise of manner and the conceits of folly. But by the third, the slap-dashers, he meant preachers whose addresses were attended by an artificial and often abrupt manner; with sudden and bold allusions and stirring anecdotes; and rough and homely familiarities of expression, and flashes of imagination and passion; preachers who, despising formality, and aiming at impressiveness, if not offending, sometimes alarming, taste, yet keep within the bounds of truth and general propriety. This third species, as differing from the two former, was the kind of preaching which Mr. Hill intended to recommend, and to practice."

Mr. Hill always desired to be considered the apostle of the common people, and he practiced rigidly the philosophy contained in the common advice which Isocrates gave to his pupils—"study the masses;" or that which Cromwell gave to his soldiers—"fire low." In his style of preaching he was not vulgar, nor was he boisterous. Occasionally he roared, but not equally and always. He had an assistant who vexed his patience considerably, and he once touched him off in these words: "Friend J——, you yelp like a puppy as soon as you get into the field and before any game is up; but I am an older hound, and do not wish to cry till I have started running."

He seldom adhered to his text, for, once started, he cared but little what it was or how little he discussed it. Sometimes he indulged in wit to a degree not becoming the sacredness of the pulpit; but generally the man and his manner matched pretty well. Once while preaching he took occasion to speak of the value of the Gospel from its relative aim and influence. "It makes," said he, "husbands better husbands, and wives better wives; parents better parents, children better children; masters better masters, and servants better servants; in a word, I would not give a farthing for that man's religion whose cat and dog were not the better for it! Every one," says Mr. Jay, "could not have uttered this, but I received it from no less a person than Mr. Wilberforce, who heard it himself, and who remarked that, while probably every thing else he said that evening was long ago forgotten, no one would ever forget this."

"Reading in my pulpit the words of the woman at the well," continues Mr. Jay, "'the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans'—looking off, as if he saw the parties themselves—he exclaimed, 'But the devil has had dealings enough with both of you!'"

Among other anecdotes illustrative of his power of wit and repartee, Mr. Jay furnishes the following:

"A rather talkative woman one day said to him, 'I have been a good deal of late with some Papists, and they have sadly tempted me to change my religion.' 'Indeed, ma'am,' he replied, 'I was not aware till now you had any religion to change.'"

"I once heard him repeat the Lord's Prayer, and witnessed the great effect produced when he said, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' by making a considerable pause before he added, 'as we forgive them that trespass against us,' as if he almost feared to utter it, lest he should condemn himself and others."

"I remember what an impression he made when preaching for me, by an interjective parenthesis; for when, in reading the chapter, 1 Thessalonians v, he repeated the verse, 'Abstain from all appearance of evil,' he lifted his eyes, and said in a very solemn voice, 'O, the infinite delicacy of the Gospel!'"

"His brother, Sir Richard, once told me of an early instance of his adroitness, remarking that he was the same from a lad. It occurred while he was at Eton College. Even then he was under deep impression of a religious nature; and as he felt the importance of divine things himself, he was concerned and active to do good to others; and thus he did with an old female servant that frequently waited upon him. She one day rather reproved him for his zeal, saying that persons should not be righteous overmuch, and should be careful to avoid extremes in religion. 'Some,' she said, 'were too cold, and some were too hot.' 'Then,' said young Rowland, 'I suppose you think that we had better be lukewarm?' 'Yes,' she said, 'that was the proper medium.' He then took up his Testament, and read the Savior's address to the Church of Laodicea—'I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth;' at which his tepid admonisher seemed a little surprised and aghast."

"I know that once at Wotton he was preaching in the afternoon—the only time when it seemed possible to be drowsy under him—he saw some sleeping, and paused, saying, 'I have heard that the miller can sleep while the mill is going, but if it stops it awakens him. I'll try this method;' and so sat down, and soon saw an aroused audience."

With his excellences he had his defects. His temper was irascible and resentful. He seemed to live to "treasure up wrath against an enemy;" but, then, we are compelled to remember that

"Defects through nature's best productions run—Rowland had spots, and spots are in the sun."

The elocution of Whitefield was a thing different from that possessed by Mr. Hill. Whitefield's anecdotes were never like some of Hill's, forced in to fill out a blankness of thought; but they were always exactly adapted to the time and place.

On occasion of a great fair being held at Bristol, he went down there and was called on to preach in the British Tabernacle the evening before the fair begun. He took for his text the words in the first verse of the fifty-fifth chapter of Isaiah: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." The Tabernacle was crowded, and he launched forth thus: "My dear hearers, I fear many of you have come to attend Bristol fair. So am I. You do not mean to show your goods till to-morrow; but I shall exhibit mine to-night. You are afraid purchasers will not come up to your prices; but I am afraid my buyers will not come down to mine; for mine [striking his hand on the Bible] are 'without money and without price.'"

Could any thing have been more appropriate than this, and could any thing else have struck the auditory as being more fit?

On the death of his wife Whitefield preached her funeral sermon from Romans viii, 28, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose." In a description of her character, he took occasion to descant on her fortitude, when suddenly stopping and turning he exclaimed, "Do you remember my preaching in those fields, by the old stump of the tree? The multitude was great, and many were disposed to be riotous. At first I addressed them firmly; but when a desperate gang of banditti drew near, with the most ferocious looks and horrid imprecations and menaces, my tongue began to fail. My wife was then standing behind me, as I stood on the table. I think I hear her now. She pulled my gown, [he then put his hand behind him, and touched his gown,] and, looking up, said, 'George, play the man for your God.' My confidence returned. I again spoke to the multitude with boldness and affection; they became still; and many were deeply affected."

Rev. John Newton, the friend of the poet Cowper, was also one of Mr. Jay's special friends, and a most eccentric yet pious man he was. We have room but for a few of the characteristic incidents of the man furnished by Mr. Jay:

"In the family worship, after reading a chapter, he would add a few remarks on some verse or sentence, very brief, but weighty and striking, and affording a sentiment for the day. Whoever was present, he always prayed himself; the prayer was never long, but remarkably suitable and simple."

"'Some people,' said he, 'believe much better than they reason. I once heard a good old woman arguing in favor of eternal election. 'Sir,' said she, 'I am sure if God had not chosen me before I was born, he would never have chosen me after."

"At another time he mentioned facetiously, and with his peculiar smile, the language of a poor good woman when dying, 'I believe his word, and am persuaded, notwithstanding my unworthiness and guilt, that my Lord Jesus will save me from all my sins and sorrows, and bring me home to himself; and if he does, he will never hear the last of it!'"

"He one day told of a countryman who said to his minister, 'You often speak of our forefathers; now I know only of three—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Pray, sir, who is the fourth?'"

"He also more than once mentioned that he knew a good man and woman, who read the Scriptures morning and evening in their daily worship, to whom a gentleman gave a folio commentary to aid them. But after they had tried it for some time, the husband said to the wife, 'I think we did better before we had this great book. When we read the Bible itself only it was like a glass of pure wine; but now it is like a glass of wine in a pail of water.'"

"One morning a forward young man said, 'Pray, Mr. Newton, what do you think of the entrance of sin into our world?' 'Sir,' said he, 'I never think of it. I know there is such a thing as moral evil, and I know there is a remedy for it; and there my knowledge begins, and there it ends.'"

"I saw Mr. Newton near the closing scene. He was hardly able to talk; and all I find I had noted down upon leaving him is this: 'My memory is nearly gone; but I remember two things: That I am a great sinner, and that Christ is a great Savior.' And, 'Did you not, when I saw you at your house in Bath, desire me to pray for you? Well, then, now you must pray for me.'"

Another minister, a friend of Jay's, and remarkable for his eccentricity, was Rev. John Ryland, sen., a Baptist preacher of Northampton. Besides being a preacher, he was also a school-teacher.

"The first time I ever met Mr. Ryland," says Jay, "was at the house of a wholesale linen-draper in Cheapside. The owner, Mr. B——h, told him one day, as he called upon him, that I was in the parlor, and desired him to go in, and he would soon follow. At this moment I did not personally know him. He was singular in his appearance; his shoes were square-toed; his wig was five-storied behind; the sleeves of his coat were profusely large and open; and the flaps of his waistcoat encroaching upon his knees. I was struck and awed with his figure; but what could I think when, walking toward me, he laid hold of me by the collar, and, shaking his fist in my face, he roared out, 'Young man, if you let the people of Surrey Chapel make you proud, I'll smite you to the ground!' But then, instantly dropping his voice, and taking me by the hand, he made me sit down by his side, and said, 'Sir, nothing can equal the folly of some hearers; they are like apes that hug their young ones to death.' He then mentioned two promising young ministers who had come to town had been injured and spoiled by popular caressings; adding other seasonable and useful remarks."

"Once a young minister was spending the evening with him, and when the family were called together for worship, he said, 'Mr. —, you must pray.' 'Sir,' said he, 'I can not.' He urged him again, but in vain. 'Then, sir,' said he, 'I declare, if you will not, I'll call in the watchman.' At this time a watchman on his round was going by, whom he knew to be a very pious man—I knew him, too—he opened the door, and said, 'Duke, Duke, come in; you are wanted here. Here,' said he, 'is a young pastor that can't pray; so you must pray for him.'"

"He took my place one Tuesday evening at Surrey Chapel, and preached a most striking sermon from Daniel's words to Belshazzar—'But the God in whose hands thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified.' After an introduction, giving some account of Belshazzar, he impatiently and abruptly broke off by saying, 'But you can not suppose that I am going to preach a whole sermon on such a — rascal as this'—and then stated, that he should bring home the charge in the text against every individual in the place, in four grand instances."

From his peculiarly liberal views and his general candor in theological matters, Robert Hall became a favorite with Mr. Jay. Hall was disposed to believe, as our readers generally know, in free communion and free grace. He especially hated the doctrine that because a man was not a Baptist he had no right to come to the Lord's table. Some of his rebukes cut to the quick, and nothing, in fact, delighted him more than to wilt down those self-admiring preachers, who were strongly disposed to flourish and caper in the mazes of metaphysical hair-splitting, or else eager to soar in the realms of ether and cloud-land. One day he happened to be in company with a lady who wished his opinion in reference to one of these pompous nothing spouters; whereupon he gave it: "Ma'am, I always thought the gentleman predestinated to be a fool, and he has now made his calling and election sure."

Our limits forbid any reference to the numerous other cotemporary preachers with whom for many years Mr. Jay had fellowship. We pass to notice briefly some of Mr. Jay's own peculiarities as a minister.

He was a practical preacher. He had the good of his people, and not his own glory, constantly in view. Written discourses he avoided from principle; for he thought them too much like opiates to his congregation. "Nothing could satisfy him in his preaching but bringing forth the whole story of Matthew Henry's three R's, Ruin, Redemption, and Regeneration—Jesus Christ and him crucified, to meet the condition of poor sinners—to try to save souls. He was especially observant of devotion when he had public services in prospect. He always took a prayerful review of his subject, and often was a tearful, wrestling season of communion with God in private the prelude to the holiest and happiest seasons in public. His practice uniformly was to go from the closet to the pulpit. Nothing was allowed to intervene. In this, doubtless, may be found one of the elements of his efficiency and success. He came as from the Divine presence with a message from God to men."

He was a plain preacher. Sometimes he selected a text which seemed obscure, but he always managed, by simplicity of language, to render it clear to the understanding of all listening. He never took flights starward, where the understanding could not track him; nor yet did he plunge into a wood, where his hearers lost sight of him, and could not afterward find him; but he kept himself and his subject in sight all the time, and "the hungry sheep" who came to hear "looked up and were fed," so that when they went home they had something to think about, and something to stir them up to diligence and Christian duty.

He was an earnest and a pathetic preacher. Like one of Bunyan's pilgrims, wherever he saw the print of the Lord's shoe there he wished to put his foot. "I want to be an earnest preacher," said he once; "I try to be such, but I do not succeed as I desire." "Our old divines and the Methodist preachers, when they just sprung up, had something to rend or melt, to strike and stick—to lead their hearers to think of again and again when alone, and to talk of again and again when in company. But what is the recommendation of many of the moderns? O, they glitter—they do—but, as Foster says, with frost."

Naturally he possessed a good voice, and he knew well how to manage it. His intonations possessed remarkable power, and oftentimes, when he discovered that his people were in a prepared state of mind, he has melted them into tears by a single word. Every one who describes his manner mentions the emphasis he threw into his reading. The simplicity of language in which a granddaughter of his own describes that perfection of a good reader conveys a clearer idea of it than could be given in an elaborate description. "Walked down at seven to hear dear grandpapa. He preached a most glorious sermon upon 'the manifestation of the sons of God.' I doubt if you can possibly imagine our feelings when the venerably silver head appeared in the pulpit, and then bent in silent prayer. The expression with which he reads is wonderful: his words distill as the dew; so softly, and yet so effectually do they fall. His manner of emphasizing some passages gives you an entirely new view of them."

He was an uncontroversial preacher. He seldom took polemics into the sacred desk, and scarcely ever would spend time with skeptics in arguing out abstract and metaphysical points. There was one Dr. Cogan, a Unitarian in his predilections, with whom Mr. Jay had considerable intercourse. The Doctor often visited Mr. Jay's Chapel, and heard him preach, and sought opportunities for discussion.

"Not being inclined or qualified for controversy," remarks Mr. Jay, "I never entered into dispute with him, but I sometimes dropped a few words from experience or observation, to which he listened, and which seemed to strike him, especially when I spoke of persons who had recently died in confidence, peace, and comfort, commending and recommending those truths which they said were all their salvation and all their desire. And when I mentioned what I had lately met with, namely, a female, young and beautiful, agreeably espoused, with two lovely babes, with every thing that could render life desirable, dying of a consumption—which destroys so many of our roses and lilies—and when reduced by the lingering disease almost to a shadow, she asked an attendant to hand her the looking-glass—after glancing at which she returned it, saying with a smile,

'Then while ye hear my heart-strings break,
How sweet my moments roll!
A mortal paleness in my cheek,
But glory in my soul!'

and soon expired—he could not avoid weeping.

"When also I sometimes mentioned instances—and, blessed be God, I could mention such instances under my own feeble preaching—of persons converted from a sinful course to a life of morality and holiness; and where the change has not been produced by practice, but the practice has been the effect of the change; and sin has not only been left but loathed; and duty has not only been performed but delighted in; his pause and manner have seemed to say, 'Why, we hear and see nothing of this!'

He was eminently a Scriptural preacher. He was much in his closet, and oftentimes in the day upon his knees with God's word outspread before him. His discourses were redolent with the fragrance of flowers culled from the garden of inspiration. He made numerous quotations of Scripture in his sermons, and they were frequently so exquisitely appropriate and beautiful that they seemed made to order for the occasion. Sacred poetry was an auxiliary employed by him with great effect and frequency. "He often surprised his audience," says his biographer, "by the ingenuity he displayed in the appropriation of texts to particular occasions. As specimens of this take the following examples: On the death of George the Fourth—'Another King, one Jesus.' On the reopening of his chapel after a temporary closing—'A door was opened in heaven.' After an enlargement of the chapel—'Be ye also enlarged.' For a communion address—'One of you is a devil.' Who but he would have thought of such a passage as this for the text of a funeral sermon for a great man: 'Howl, fir-tree; for the cedar is fallen?' From this passage he preached first, after the death of Mr. Hall; and then again at the death of Mr. Rowland Hill. How poetic, how striking, how appropriate to express the Church's lament over the grave of one of her illustrious pastors!"

He was well able to reason and be logical, but he seldom preached a sermon without one or more anecdotes or incidents for illustrations. Sometimes these anecdotes had a semblance of oddity about them; but they were never of a character to disgust or offend. On one occasion when he wished to impress on his people the truth of the declaration, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," he told the following tale of two parrots: "Two friendly neighbors bought each a parrot. That of Mrs. A. was a bird of grave deportment, and had been taught to speak a good many godly words. That of Mrs. B. was an impious fellow, for his language abounded in bad words. Now Mrs. B. felt quite shocked at the irreverent talk of her parrot, and prevailed on her friend to allow the grave parrot to pay a visit to the swearer, in hope of reclaiming the rogue by good example. Well, the two birds staid together for about a month, and a great reformation was expected in the swearing parrot, from listening to his more decent neighbor; but imagine the consternation of good Mrs. A. on the return of her more grave and decorous bird, to hear him swearing like a trooper! The fact is, that instead of teaching he had been learning; and from that sad day his language was as bad as that of his scapegrace associate: thus, 'evil communications corrupt good manners.'" One may imagine the effect of such a parable on a large congregation. But although the parrots would haunt their memory, we may be sure that the inimitably artless art of the preacher wound up with a lesson that lay deeper, and would doubtless spring up again to memory amid the confusion of worldly intercourse.

The last words, except the benediction, ever delivered by him in Argyle Chapel—his own church—were these, uttered Sunday, July 25, 1852, from the Apocalypse: "'Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'" He made no comment; and how could he? But he pronounced these final words: "If this be heaven, O that I were there!"

He died at home, Bath, Eng., December 27, 1853, aged eighty-four years. We regret that we can not furnish the particulars of his final illness in detail. The following, from the pen of one of his near friends, will show that his death, like his life, was the Christian's:

"One day, while suffering under great bodily distress, he said, 'I fear God has forsaken me. Let me not be impatient; let me repose in his love. I fear I am impatient.' Mrs. Jay replied, 'Think of the feelings of your precious Savior: like you, he said, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He has promised never to forsake you. His grace is sufficient for you.' He then replied, 'I mourn, I do not murmur. "It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good." I desire to lie passive, and know no will but his. "In patience possess ye your souls." Lay no more upon me than thou wilt enable me to bear; and I will glorify thee in my sore affliction.

'Dear Lord! though bitter is the cup

Thy gracious hand deals out to me,

I cheerfully would drink it up;

That can not hurt that comes from thee.'

"'The language of the publican,' he said, 'did, does, and ever will, besit me; and even down to death must be my cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner."'

"'I do not murmur—allow me to groan. It seems to ease my pain. Objects most dear and attractive now fail to interest. O for a grateful heart! I have made some little stir in life, but now I am nothing. God seems to be saying, "I can do without you." An official character is not to be judged of by his ministerial work. He is compelled often to administer comfort to others when he is perhaps not enjoying it himself. You see the sail, but not the ballast.'

"On Christmas day his sufferings were very severe, and he said to Dr. Bowie, 'O Doctor, what a Christmas day! but I can say, "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift;"' and then he quoted 1 Peter i, 3, 4, 5, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again into a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time!' He was particularly partial to the hymn, 'Guide me, O thou great Jehovah!' often repeated it, and especially the last verse—

'When I tread the verge of Jordan,
Bid my anxious fears subside;
Death of death, and hell's destruction,
Land me safe on Canaan's side:
Songs of praises,
I will ever give to Thee.'

"On the morning of Tuesday, December 27th, the day of his death, he said, 'O, none of you know what it is to die.' From this time he spoke little, but sank gradually into the arms of death, becoming so still and calm that the precise period of his departure could not be perceived. Though he uttered but few words on the bed of death, yet there was the silent testimony of a settled peace; while his long life and entire labors had afforded a faithful and consistent witness for God and truth."

His remains were deposited, January 2, 1854, in the cemetery of Snow Hill, belonging to Argyle Chapel, and there will they rest till the morning shall dawn of the resurrection day.

"PEDARATUS, when he missed of a place among the chosen three hundred, rejoiced that there were three hundred in Sparta better than himself."

THE SERMON OF WINTER.

IF one did not know the contrary, one would be apt to fancy that death is the very last subject there is any need of preaching about to mankind—the very last subject there is any need for a minister of Christ to talk of. So many sermons about death are preached to us every day of our lives, so many finger-posts pointed toward death meet us at every turn, one might verily fancy, if one did not know the contrary, that it would be a waste of time to preach about death from the pulpit.

But we never hear any of those daily sermons about death, many of you perchance will tell me. We go forth in the morning, and come home in the evening, and never see any of those finger-posts pointed toward death. Long as we have lived, we have never fallen in with one such. What, my friends, can you walk to and fro from year's end to year's end, and see no mark of death on the earth, and hear no sound of death in the air? What is winter, the skirts of which are still lying around us? Is it not the death of the year? Has not death been spreading out its cold hand over the trees of the forest, stripped them of their bloom and their beauty, and turning them into great staring skeletons, that lift up their bare bones in the face of day to admonish us that we, too, before long, shall be even as they are—that our bloom will in like manner have faded away, that our leaf will have fallen off, and that nothing will be left of these bodies, which we so fondle, and pamper, and trick out, and are so vain of, but a parcel of naked bones? Every tree you see shorn of its leaves, may preach you the sermon of death—may stand before you as a great finger-post pointing to death—may warn you that the hour is at hand when you, too, will be shorn of your glory. Ay, the leafless wood, how awful its sermon! Not only may you look upon it as a host of skeletons: it may also cry to you to bethink yourselves, that even as those trees stand naked from head to foot before the eye of heaven, so will your souls ere long stand utterly bare and naked before the eye of God. Every cloak and mask you may have clad them in will be torn off. Every fading leaf and perishing flower—whatever is bred by the sun of this world, or put forth to win the eyes of this world—all the dress and drapery of our minds and hearts—our cleverness, our skill, our learning, our knowledge, our prudence, our industry, our gayety, our good fellowship—all those qualities of fair-seeming which have no higher aim than to look well in the sight of our neighbors—will be swept away; and nothing will remain but the skeletons of our souls, shivering in the sight of men and of angels, in the day of that last and terrible winter, when the glory of this world will have waned, and death will have spread out his hand over all the generations of mankind. Nothing will remain but the naked trunk and leafless branches of our souls—except those seeds of Christian faith and love, which may have lain secretly wrapped up in the bosom of the flowers. The leaf dies; for the leaf has no life in it. The flower dies; for the flower has no life in it. But the seed, if it be the seed of Christian faith and love, has life in it, and can not die. When it falls to the ground, Christ sends his angels to gather it up, and bids them lay it by in the storehouse of heaven. By the world, indeed, it is unseen. The world perceives no difference between the flower that has seed in it, and the flower that has no seed. To the outward eye they look the same; for the outward eye sees only what is outward. But Christ knows his own: he beholds the seed within the heart of the flower, and he will not suffer it to die or to be lost. In the last day he will bring it forth, and will crown the branches again with the undying flowers of heaven.—Rev. Julius Charles Hare.

THE SLANDERER.

THE slanderer is a pest, a disgrace, an incubus to society, that should be subjected to a slow cauterization, and then be lopped off like a disagreeable excrescence. Like the viper, he leaves a shining trail in his wake. Like a tarantula, he weaves a thread of candor with a web of wiles, or with all the kind mendacity of hints, whispers forth his tale, that, "like the fabling Nile, no fountain knows." The dead—ay, even the dead—over whose pale-sheeted forms sleeps the dark sleep no venomous tongue can wake, and whose pale lips have then no voice to plead, are subjected to the scandalous attack of the slanderer—

"Who wears a mask that Gorgon would disown,
A cheek of parchment, and an eye of stone."

I think it is Pollok who says the slanderer is the foulest whelp of sin, whose tongue was set on fire in hell, and whose legs were faint with haste to propagate the lie his soul had framed.

"He has a lip of lies, a face formed to conceal,
That, without feeling, mocks at those who feel."

There is no animal I despise more than these moths and scrays of society, the malicious censurers—

"These ravenous fishes, who follow only in the wake
Of great ships, because, perchance, they're great."

O, who would disarrange all society with their false lap-wing cries! The slanderer makes few direct charges and assertions. His long, envious fingers point to no certain locality. He has an inimitable shrug of the shoulders, can give peculiar glances,

"Or convey a libel by a frown,
Or wink a reputation down."

He seems to glory in the misery he entails. The innocent wear the foulest impress of his smutty palm, and a soul pure as "Arctic snow twice dotted by the northern blast," through his warped and discolored glasses wears a mottled hue.

"A whisper broke the air—
A soft, light tone, and low,
Yet barbed with shame and woe!
Nor might only perish there,
Nor farther go!
Ah, me! a quick and eager ear
Caught up the little meaning sound;
Another voice then breathed it clear,
And so it wandered round,
From ear to lip, from lip to ear,
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke!"

Vile wretch! ruiner of fair innocence by foul slanders, in thine own dark, raven-plumed soul distilled—

"Blush—if of honest blood a drop remains
To steal its way along thy veins!
Blush—if the bronze long hardened on thy cheek,
Has left one spot where that poor drop can speak!"

HOW PRAYER IS ANSWERED.

ONE of the pupils in a school in Germany came to his master one day in great trouble, because, as he said, God would not answer his prayer. "And what did you pray for?" "I prayed to God that he would give me a humble heart." "And why do you think that he has not heard you?" The child said, with tears, "Since I prayed for this the other boys have been cross and unkind to me. They tease me and mock me at every turn, so that I can hardly bear it." "My dear boy, you prayed that God would give you a humble heart, and why then should you be vexed, if the other boys are the means of humbling you? Here you see that God does really answer you. It is in this way he sees fit to send you a humble mind." The poor child had not thought of that.

EDITOR'S REPOSITORY.

Scripture Cabinet.

ON TYPICAL AND ALLEGORICAL EXPLANATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.—It might be expected that, when God had determined to send his Son into the world, there would be a train and concatenation of circumstances preparatory to his coming—that the history, which declared that he was to come, should exhibit many persons and things, which would form a grand preparation for the event, though not so many of them as an absurd fancy might imagine.

There is a certain class of persons who wish to rid themselves of the types. Sikes insists that even the brazen serpent is called in by our Lord by way of illustration only, and not as a designed type. Robinson, of Cambridge, when he began to verge toward Socinianism, began to ridicule the types, and to find matter of sport in the pomegranates and the bells of the high priest's garment. At all events, the subject should not be treated with levity and irreverence: it deserves serious reflection.

With respect to the expediency of employing the types much in the pulpit, that is another question. I seldom employ them. I am jealous for truth and its sanctions. The Old dispensation was a typical dispensation; but the New is a dispensation unrolled. When speaking of the typical dispensation, we must admire a master like St. Paul. But to us modesty becomes a duty in treating such subjects in our ministry. Remember, "This is none other but the house of God! and this is the gate of heaven!" How dreadful if I lead thousands with nonsense—if I lose the opportunity of impressing solid truths—if I waste their precious time!

A minister should say to himself: "I would labor to cut off occasions of objecting to the truth. I would labor to grapple with men's consciences. I would show them that there is no strange twist in our view of religion. I must avoid, as much as possible, having my judgment called in question: many watch for this, and will avail themselves of any advantage. Some who hear me are thus continually seeking excuses for not listening to the warnings and invitations of the word; they are endeavoring to get out of our reach; but I would hold them fast by such passages as, 'What shall a man give in exchange for his soul!'"

Many men labor to make the Bible THEIR Bible. This is one way of getting its yoke off their necks. The MEANING, however, of the Bible is the Bible. If I preach then on imputed righteousness, for instance, why should I preach from, "the skies pour down righteousness," and then anathematize men for not believing the doctrine, when it is not declared in the passage, and there are hundreds of places so expressly to the point?

Most of the folly on this subject of allegorical interpretation has arisen from a want of holy awe on the mind. An evil fashion may lead some men into it; and, so far, the case is somewhat extenuated. We should ever remember, however, that it is a very different thing to allegorize the New dispensation from allegorizing

the Old: the New is a dispensation of substance and realities.

When a careless young man, I remember to have felt alarms in my conscience from some preachers; while others, from this method of treating their subjects, let me off easily. I heard the man as a weak allegorizer: I despised him as a foolish preacher: till I met with some plain, simple, solid man, who seized and urged the obvious meaning. I shall, therefore, carry to my grave a deep conviction of the danger of entering far into typical and allegorical interpretations.

Accommodation of Scripture, if sober, will give variety. The apostles do this so far as to show that it may have its use and advantage. It should, however, never be taken as a ground-work, but employed only in the way of allusion. I may use the passage, "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," by way of allusion to Christ; but I can not employ it as the ground-work of a discourse on him.—Cecil.

AN EXPOSITION OF ISAIAH XVIII, 4; OR, GOD CONSIDERING WHAT HE WILL DO FOR HIS PEOPLE.—"I will consider in my dwelling-place like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."

Preachers should be very sparing of their animadversions on the translation of the Scriptures in common use; not only because they tend to shake confidence and awaken suspicions in their hearers, but because they are generally needless. It is not illiteracy that commends the present version; the ablest scholars are the most satisfied with it upon the whole. Yet, while the original is divine, the rendering is human; and, therefore, we need not wonder if an occasional alteration is necessary. This is peculiarly the case where the sense is very obscure or even imperceptible without it.

If the words as they now stand in the text remain, his "dwelling-place" is heaven, and the meaning is, that he would there consider how to succor and bless his people, for he careth for them: but a word must be supplied to show the import—"I will consider in my dwelling-place" how I can prove "like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." But the margin, and Lowth, and every modern expositor, make his "dwelling-place" not the place of his consideration, but the object; and read, "I will regard my dwelling-place like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." Now what his dwelling-place was we can easily determine. It was Zion—"whose dwelling is in Zion." "This is my rest forever here, will I dwell, for I have desired it." And Watts has well added—

"The God of Jacob chose the hill
Of Zion for his ancient rest;
And Zion is his dwelling still,
His Church is with his presence blest."

And his concern for the welfare of the one is far surpassed by his regard for the other. And how is this regard exercised? Here are two images.

First, "like a clear heat upon herbs." The margin again says, "Like a clear heat after rain;" and I wish, says the excellent translator of Isaiah, who has adopted it, that there was better evidence in support of it. The reason is, that he probably feared, as others in reading it may fear, that "a clear heat upon herbs" would be rather unfavorable, and cause them to droop, if not to die. And this would be the case in some instances; but not in all; and it is enough for a metaphor to have one just and strong resemblance. Read the dying words of David: "And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds: as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." Now after rain "the clear shining," or "clear heat upon herbs," would produce immediately fresh vigor and shootings. Even in our own climate the effect upon the grass and plants is soon visible; but in the East the influence is much more sudden and surprising, and the beholders can almost see the herbage thrive and flourish. Thus the Lord can quicken his people in his ways, and strengthen in them the things that remain and are ready to die. And when after the softening comes the sunshine, they grow in grace and in the knowledge of their Lord and Savior. Their faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of them toward each other aboundeth. They bear much fruit. Thus we read of "increasing with all the increase of God." This figure, therefore, expresses growth and fertility.

But the second holds forth refreshment, seasonable refreshment, "like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." How cooling, useful, welcome, delightful such an appearance is, ask the laborer in the field, in the Eastern field, bearing the burden and heat of the day. God, as the God of all comfort, realizes the truth and force of this image in the experience of his tried followers—First, in their spiritual exercises and depressions arising from the assaults of temptation, a sense of their unworthiness and imperfections, and fears concerning their safety and perseverance. And, secondly, in their outward afflictions. These may be many; and if our strength is small, we shall faint in the day of adversity. But when we cry, he answers us, and strengthens us with strength in our souls. He gives us a little reviving in our bondage; and in the multitude of our thoughts within us his comforts delight our souls. He is able and engaged to comfort us in all our tribulation. By the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ; by his word; by his ordinances; by the preaching of a minister; by the conversation of a friend; by a letter, a book, a particular occurrence of providence, a time of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord—and a cloud of dew be furnished in the heat of harvest.

Such is the God of love to his people. His consolations are not small; his grace is abundant; his care unceasing. Well may his children trust in him, knowing that he will send "the clear shining" of the sun after the rain, and also the "cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."

THE TEST AND THE EVIDENCE OF THE REALITY OF FAITH.—Does a man seek a proof of his acceptance? The reference is to facts in his own moral condition. He is to look for it in a change which is taking place in his character; a new direction of his desires; a new regulation of his affections; an habitual impression, to which he was a stranger before, of the presence and the perfection of the Deity; and a new light which has

burst upon his view respecting his relations to this life and that which is to come. He is to seek this evidence in a mind which aims at no lower standard than that which will bear the constant inspection of infinite purity; he is to seek it, and to manifest it to others, in a spirit which takes no lower pattern than that model of perfection—the character of the Messiah. These acquirements, indeed, are looked upon, not as a ground of acceptance, but a test of moral condition; not as in any degree usurping the place of the great principle of faith, but as its fruits and evidences. As these, then, are the only proofs of the reality of this principle, so they are the only basis on which a man can rest any sound conviction of his moral aspect in the sight of the Deity; and that system is founded on delusion and falsehood which, in this respect, holds out any other ground of confidence than the purification of the heart and a corresponding harmony of the whole character. Such attainment, indeed, is not made at once, nor is it ever made in a full and perfect manner in the present state of being; but, where the great principle has been fixed within, there is a persevering effort, and a uniform contest and a continual aspiration after conformity to the great model of perfection. Each step that a man gains in this progress serves to extend his view of the high pattern to which his eye is steadily directed; and as his knowledge of it is thus enlarged, he is led by comparison to feel more and more deeply his own deficiency. It thus produces amazing humility, and an increasing sense of his own imperfection, and causes him continually to feel that, in this warfare, he requires a power which is not in man. But he knows also that this is provided as an essential part of the great system on which his hope is established. Amid much weakness, therefore, and many infirmities, his moral improvement goes forward. Faint and feeble at first as the earliest dawn of the morning, it becomes brighter and steadier as it proceeds in its course, and, "as the shining light, shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—Abercrombie.

The above article contains some powerfully condensed and strikingly expressive thoughts, to which every Christian would do well to give heed. As a sufficient antidote to any theological heresy that may be found lurking in it, we simply append the following, from a good authority: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God."

SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.—"He drieth the stream that we may seek the full fountain."

How beautiful are the manifestations of Divine providence in the Christian life! Every step along his pilgrim way gives fresh token of the wisdom, goodness, and forbearing mercy of his blessed Master. The dark places in his pilgrimage, which, in their first passage, seemed like so many valleys of Bochim to his soul, have been the very steps which led to the "green pastures," where, with enlarged faith, he may repose by the "still waters" of God's unfailing love.

The lesson may be believed when the young disciple first enters the Church, and with new-born tenderness of soul receives its teachings as the holy truth of God. But its real, significant bearing upon the daily life must come home to the heart in the hour of its great need. Ah, then, indeed, it is all of grace that the light enters; for the laying down of self, calmly to repose on the bosom of infinite Love, is the life-long lesson, scarce learned, even when the distant hills of home break upon the closing eye.

To one in feebleness the winter may set in with doubt and dread, and long-waiting at home be the allotted portion. The prayer meeting, the dear Sabbath school, and the precious sermons assume a new importance. How shall life's trials be borne without their refreshing ministry? Amid the cold winds and frequent storms, how shall the Christian brother or sister bring the glad news of Zion's prosperity, how, amid the loneliness of the little circle still narrowing to closer bounds, shall the interests of Christ's Church be kept bright and warm in the soul's depths? But, O ye of little faith, the streams are dried in mercy. Deprived of the ordinances of his house he brings us to his word, and richer, clearer meaning lights up its page; we feel an individual interest in the portion, and daily bread is there for daily need. Prayer is a necessity; it covers broader fields than we have realized; the sparrow's lesson is no longer an illustration of holy writ, but a life-giving assurance that Christ brings present salvation to view. The Missionary Journal, hastily read, because outward calls are imperative, opens with unwonted delight, and we feel identified with the self-denying ones that have borne the burden and heat of the day. Not theirs only is the duty to watch and wait; we must see to it that no shadow darkens their way which we may prevent. Do we not count our temporary privations as dust in the balance, compared with their life-consecration to the service of God? Ay, do we not trace with them the drying stream that impels to the fountain?

Among the pleasant incidents of her Christian experience, which a dear mother used to relate, was a little anecdote of Chloe Spear, a colored woman, who for many years was a devoted member of good old Dr. Baldwin's Church, in Boston. It always interested us by its characteristic language and pathos, but now it seems forcibly to illustrate the truth under consideration.

Chloe had been sick some time, and none of her dear Christian friends that she prized so much visited her—but to use her own words—"she think it strange, they talk so kind to her, they so much in her mind, and why they not come? Ah, she think she make idol of them; she set them up above the neighbor and the colored friend. Then by and by the Lord show her how he enough in himself for her little soul, and she feel strong in him, and put the friend all away, and the Lord give her joy. When she staid on him, she think of the kind neighbor that come in, and do many thing to comfort her poor old body, and she tell them how she hope the Lord give them good hope in his mercy to pay them for their kindness to aunt Chloe. Now she have a text come to her mind, and she never know what that mean till the Lord bring her in a strait place: 'Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitations.'"

About Chloe's application of this text, I think she meant to imply that the instrumentality of the world was sometimes actually connected with our progress in piety, or, rather, was made subservient to it; she always said, "receive you into their houses"—but I was afraid to change the text to her repeating.

"She think, perhaps, she not feel enough for kind neighbor before, and she pray more for their poor soul, and there alone on her sick bed the Lord come near, and he make her fill with joy, and when she get there, the friend come pouring in, and they say, 'O sister Chloe, we so sorry we did not know you sick; we miss you a great while; we think you gone away.' Then she tell them

she have feel bad, but now she know better how to love; them she love Church, she hope she meet all in her dear Master's house. And by and by, brother Baldwin come, and he say, 'Chloe, why you no send your minister to come and see you when you sick? he never hear she sick, he gone away, and he think Chloe gone to the country a little while;' and he so sorry, he afraid she feel hurt.' Then she tell him just how the Lord lead her. He good, his friend good, the kind lady good, but the Lord better; and she keep the lesson by her, and the Lord make her strong to go many more ways she never knew before."—Watchman and Reflector.

LOVE TO CHRIST AND LOVE OF CHRIST.—When Krishna Pal, the first convert to Christ in Bengal, was on his death-bed, all who visited him were impressed with the deep peace that reigned there. The stillness of the sick chamber, broken only by the low utterance of prayer, or the feeble voice of the dying man, as he spoke of his hopes and prospects, and of the Savior to whom he owed them all, seemed to breathe nothing but tranquillity. He was asked if he loved Jesus Christ. "Where can a sinner go," he replied, "but unto Christ?" Soon after the same question was repeated. "Yes," said he, "but he loves me more than I love him."

Is it any wonder that Krishna was ready to die? He had served the Savior twenty-two years. He had braved the hatred of his countrymen when he was baptized in the name of Jesus, and had been an earnest preacher of the Gospel. He had won others to Christ. But he did not hope for heaven on account of these things. It was not because he loved Christ, but because Christ loved him.

"O thou, my soul, forget no more
The Friend who all thy sorrows bore;
Let every idol be forgot,
But, O my soul, forget him not."

are the words of the beautiful hymn which he wrote, and which thousands of Christians in this and other lands have united with him in singing. But while he desired always to remember his divine Friend, he rejoiced most of all in the certainty that Jesus would never forget him. Krishna has now been more than thirty years in the glorious presence of the Savior he loved, the Savior who so loved him. Who does not wish to follow him there? Who does not desire to lead other heathen souls into the same eternal joy?—Macedonian.

WALKING WITH GOD.—To be in the habit of asking the will of God ere we act; to be in the practice of comparing the end we propose to ourselves with the sure and certain standard set down in his holy word; to make the glory of his great name, and not our own profit and pleasure, the rule of our own schemes; to try and find the path of duty, instead of the way that is good in our own eyes; to ask faithfully what is right, rather than what is pleasant; to test things by their influence on others, as well as on ourselves—this is to acknowledge God—this is to commit our way to the Lord.

RAIMENT OF NEEDLEWORK.—The following is a quaint comment on the text, "She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework," Psalm xiv, 14: "The work of sanctification carried on in the believer's heart is a slow and costly one, and can not be completed without many a severe prick in the process."

* It was her habit to go to the adjoining towns for a few days, if she heard of revivals or special gatherings of the Church.

Editorial Sketch and Review.

THE WORLD A WORKSHOP.*

THE physical relationship of man to the earth is a question second in importance only to that of his spiritual relationship. This is the question discussed in the little volume to which we have made reference, and discussed, too, with not a little originality, enthusiasm, and eloquence. The author evidently entered upon his work con amore; with unflagging zeal he pursued it to the end, and has truly given to the world "a testimony of respect to the dignity and omnipotence of enlightened labor."

The author's great point is, "that this mundane habitation was designed and literally fitted up for the cultivation and application of chemical and mechanical science as the basis of human development." He argues that "material natures require something to do as well as to reflect on; this is indispensable to their being—the purpose of it. Employment is, therefore, an element of existence." Is it objected to such a theory that physical industry and ingenuity are of too low and too ephemeral a nature to enter into the grand and enduring plans of the Author of the universe, but that the cultivation of mind must be the object of calling the universe into existence? The author admits this to be the end, but suggests "as matter is the agent on which God has printed his thoughts, may it not be the book from which all minds are to read and to learn? We know that he has made the elevation of human nature to depend on the study and application of principles impressed upon matter, and, therefore, it is consistent with his purposes and with his greatness to educate intelligences by it. We know not that any are or can be trained up without it; and as, wherever intelligences are, they are surrounded by it, and by displays of Divine wisdom shining forth in it, is it not reasonable to infer that it is a universal medium of mental and moral tuition? for which purpose, instead of being collected into one inhabitable body, it has been gathered into an infinite number, every one different, and a theater of different phenomena."

The theory, of which we have here developed an imperfect outline, involves a few striking and grand consequences, which, however, the author does not hesitate to accept. The first of these is, that physical and mental labor entered into the original design of man's creation, and are not, therefore, mere incidents of his lapsed condition. If by the term labor, the author simply intends activity, directed to mental and physical ends, we think the view is accordant with the teachings both of nature and revelation. When created in innocence and purity, man was placed in the garden, not merely to be regaled by its beauty, to enjoy its fruit, and to wear away time in idle pleasures, but "to dress it, and to keep it." Dr. Adam Clarke beautifully remarks upon this passage, that "even in a state of innocence we can not conceive it possible that man could have been happy if inactive. God gave him work to do, and his employment contributed to his happiness; for the structure of his body as well as of his mind plainly proves that he was never intended for a merely contemplative life." What then? Did no physical evil result from "the fall?" So some, overleaping a logical chasm, whose breadth can be spanned by no such legitimate sequence, are ready to conclude. The true solution of the question undoubtedly is, that while sin weakened and perverted our physical as well as intellectual and moral powers, and this made it labor to cultivate the earth—the earth itself was also cursed and rendered more difficult of cultivation. We may, therefore, safely conclude, that while toil and labor—that is, the painful and exhausting drudgery now required of us—is an infliction because of sin, physical activity, for useful and beneficent purposes, and especially for our own development and happiness, was one of the original designs of our creation. We think, therefore, with the author, that there must be something wrong in the dislike to material labor which possesses the minds of so many. We have almost suspected that the grandest conception formed of heaven, in some minds, is a place where unbounded license will be given to laziness. "If 'pride brought on the fall,' its effects are awfully felt in the low esteem in which the elaboration of matter is held, and in the presumption that it is derogatory to spiritual exaltation. Thus, the original law, 'replenish the earth and subdue it,' is regarded by most persons as a coarse, unpleasant, and unintellectual task, because its full meaning, and its bearings on our present and future destiny, are not perceived."

Another sequence of this theory, presumptive rather than demonstrative, relates to other worlds. They are supposed to have the same physical construction as ours; that is, the condition of matter in them is essentially the same as in ours, and also the physical condition of their inhabitants. Our author says: "To those who deny them to be centers of reasoning and active populations it is useless to reply till they can show for what other purposes they are made, and how this little earth, a mere atom among them, became so strange an exception. If we had had no knowledge of the existence of other orbs it would have been unphilosophical to insist there were none beside our own; but now that we know they crowd every region of space, it would be positive folly to contend that all are barren of life and intelligence, of sciences and arts, except the one given to us. It is preposterous to suppose the divine Builder erects tenements for the purpose of keeping them empty. If they are not occupied, it is because they are not prepared to be so. It may be assumed that as soon as an orb is fitted for the reception of tenants, they are put in possession of it." These premises being admitted, and having also seen that activity is an element of existence, we are brought to infer the industrial activities of the denizens of the universe, involving infinities of modes and processes, and multiplied infinities of applications and results. "Let those," says Mr. Ewbank, "who do not sympathize with the idea that occupants of worlds around us act on matter as we do in this one—which, it should be remembered, is an integral member and sample of them—look abroad, and see how the same general laws to which it is subject govern others; how some in its vicinity resemble it in volume, density, duration of days and nights, etc.; how the red soil, the green seas, and northern snows and ice of Mars approximate to it in these particulars; how larger, more distant, and more resplendent ones, belonging to the same group, are illuminated every night, each with several moons; and how in aerolites we have metals and metallic alloys belonging to celestial regions—and then ask themselves if there is any thing unreasonable or unlikely, or if it is not in the highest degree probable and presumable, that people there add to their enjoyments and multiply their conveniences, by employing the materials and agencies placed at their disposal—in other words, that occupations akin to some of ours are followed in other spheres."

Another result of this theory, is the recognition of unity of design pervading and manifesting itself in diversity of parts. Happily for us, the universe is not a medley of mingled purposes and disconnected things. "The unity of design manifested in it is the theme of every philosopher, and not less observable and admirable is the fine chain of relationship that binds all the diverse forms and conditions of matter in one coherent whole. There are no violent transitions from series to series, but by almost imperceptible degrees differences open into species, species into genera, and genera into wider classes. And as with the contents of worlds, so with worlds themselves; for they are merely larger divisions, and not the largest, since they merge into groups or systems, and systems, in all probability, into still more and more comprehensive departments. There are no abrupt chasms in their outlines, dimensions, illumination, or movements, and by the strongest of analogies there can be none in their internal administrations. No truth is more patent than the unity of creation. There is nothing ex genere in it; nothing that stands solitary or alone; nothing that is not connected with and dependent on something else—not a boulder, a planet, or a sun—not an animal or the habits of one—not an order of intelligence or an occupation of intelligence." This broad view, when thoroughly analysed—when all its parts are thoroughly studied, only renders the conclusion still more invincible, that material natures every-where, throughout all the vast universe of God, are designed to be active—to labor. To repudiate labor, then, is to repudiate one of the designs of our creation.

Viewed in one light our earth is a mere caravansary—a temporary convenience for passing travelers, and, therefore, worthy of only a passing notice. Taken in another light, it is a theater of momentous action and of grand results, which are to be realized only by the connection of active and intelligent beings with it. Man, then, is necessary to the earth, and the earth is necessary to man. It is the manufactory; he is the manufacturer. And by working up the material before him, he not only demonstrates the unlimited capabilities of the world, but he develops also the wonderful capabilities that lie hidden in his own nature; he develops himself. The design of our mundane system is to be inferred from the materials with which we find it stored, and the attributes or adaptations of those materials. If they are indispensable to man, and yet comparatively useless till manipulated by him, then have we an indication of the original design of its Author that it should be a theater of activity on the part of man. How, then, do we find our earth? Stocked, it is true, with mineral substances of almost endless variety and number—susceptible of almost inconceivably beautiful, various, and useful applications—but alloyed, unshapen, and unwrought. Or if we look at vegetable and animal substances, elaboration is equally indispensable.

It is a sublime idea that man is designed to search out the hidden uses, the latent susceptibilities of the materials with which our earth is stored, as well as to be a practical operator in their subjugation to useful purposes. "The hypothesis," says our author, "that the chief employment of man was to till the soil and raise cattle, is an unworthy one, since it puts us much on a par with the lower tribes, in making the procuring and consuming of food the principal object of our being. If we were made to live like cattle—merely to eat and sleep—it would be true, and the earth might then be considered a mere victualing institution. But, with us, and all intelligences, food is, like the traveler's staff, an adjunct of life—a mere aid in accomplishing the purposes of existence." We must have food, it is true, but we have higher functions also. One of these is the development of the forces, processes, and principles of inorganic matter, and their subjugation to the uses of humanity.

Our author, like all enthusiasts, pushes his theory to an offensive, if not ridiculous extreme. Take an example. After admitting that nearly all matter is inorganic; that the whole bulk of the earth is so, except its skin-like surface, he proceeds to inquire why it is so. "What does this mean? Why all this immature matter, unless it be for man to work up? How otherwise are its quantity and condition to be accounted for?" When we read this passage, we could not help meditating upon the sorrowful plight we poor denizens of the earth would find ourselves placed in were all its inorganic substances worked up into mechanical or chemical implements. To us it appears evident that the design of our great Creator had reference less to the amount of inorganic matter to be "worked up" than to the development of our powers and of its uses.

In our earth we find three great storehouses of matter for the elaboration of man. These are minerals, vegetable products, and animal products.

Of minerals, it is remarkable what discrimination is made by the great Constructor of the globe, so that they may be offered to man in such forms and under such conditions as to be manageable by him. In this respect there is a remarkable discrimination noticed by Mr. Ewbank. "Those that are easily dug into are homogenous, and extend over large areas, as fields of clay, coal, sand, and marl. So also with such as can be quarried, as rocks; they are in immense and continuous masses, from which blocks of any required dimensions may be taken—monolithic temples have been dislodged." Without reflection one would think it would be desirable to have the metals provided in the same way—that is, in large masses and in their pure metallic state, so that we could have the material ready for our use, instead of the ore, which must be smelted and prepared. Suppose we had the metals in this state—laid up in solid mountain piles like granite, or in thick and solid strata—what use could we have made of them? Our author says none at all. "It would have been beyond human power to have extracted a supply from them. Had a mammoth boulder of the finest malleable iron been placed, at the birth of man, in the center of every township for the use of its inhabitants, all would have remained undiminished to this day. Like blocks of copper recently found in ancient diggings on Lake Superior, from which Indians had endeavored to cut portions with flint tools, they would have remained monuments of tautalism." Hence it is that they seldom occur except as minerals that yield to the pick, while iron, the chief of them, is found only in ores.

Iron, so abundant and so indispensable, is perhaps one of the most difficult metals to reduce to a malleable state. How pregnant with meaning the fact that ore and coal for smelting it are generally found stored together in the bowels of the earth! Is there no design in such an arrangement of Deity?

Another curious provision for the supply of man's want, and for his education as the grand elaborator in nature's workshop, is seen in the provision to supply him with cutting-tools. These are tools indispensable to a manufacturer in the metals. Let us see how our author states and solves the problem here presented: "If the substance be intended to cut all others, how is it to be cut? How formed into tools without the aid of still harder tools? Let it be remembered that before these queries were practically answered, the idea of giving to natural bodies qualities they did not already possess had not entered into the minds of men. Had mines of steel and adamant been provided specially for tools, the same difficulty would have occurred; for tools of still harder materials would have been necessary to shape and harden them." Here was a singular exigence to be provided for. The harder metal necessary for tools would have been useless, because man would have been unable to cut and shape it into tools. Had nature provided it in the shape of tools, that would have contravened one of the highest of its own purposes; namely, the education of man. How simple and beautiful the contrivance to meet this exigence! Iron is made capable of being hardened; and thus implements are made of it by which it may be cut, sawed, and shaped to suit the convenience of man. The discovery of the process by which iron could be converted into steel opened up a new continent of knowledge in the arts, and subjected it to the dominion of man.

Fire was essential to the mechanical operations of this great workshop, as well as to the comfort of man. Without it neither earthen nor metallic wares could be manufactured. He might mold the clay into the forms desired; but without fire it would remain clay forever. Without fire, the ore would remain in its native state, and the harder minerals remain unshapen and unemployed. To man as a cosmopolite it is indispensable, and his mastery over it has not a little to do with his pre-eminence over the other inhabitants of the earth. But how was fire first obtained? Did God kindle it and favor man with the blaze? or did he simply adjust the materials, and leave man to discover and apply them? Reasoning from that which is every-where observed in the economy of nature, we should unhesitatingly infer the latter. Also, according to an old tradition, the first hint received by the primeval races upon the production of fire was the ignition of trees by the friction of their trunks or branches rubbing against each other during a high wind. Our author dissents from this suggestion, and regards the primeval mode of its production as "an instinctive suggestion." "The process," says he, "was by friction, and the only instruments employed two small pieces of wood. By twirling the point of a dry stick in a rude indentation made in another, or by rubbing it to and fro in a groove, sparks were evolved and flame obtained; an apparatus so simple that Indian boys and girls have been observed to prepare it by breaking suitable pieces from a branch and gnawing the pointed one into shape. Such, from the beginning, has served the will man for a tinder box; and thus wherever fuel was he had the means of kindling it." How striking is Homer's description of Mercury kindling a fire to roast the cattle he had stolen:

"He snatch'd a branch and stripp'd the bark,
Rubbed piece 'gainst piece, till spark by spark
Was kindled, and the flame upflew."

"This description," says Mr. Ewbank, "is literally that of a Camanche or Apache after a buffalo hunt, or a foray into New Mexico."

Some will, perhaps, object to this theory of the origin of fire, that had man been left to make the discovery, he might have suffered immensely, and many of the human race might have perished for want of fire before the discovery was made. Undoubtedly these results might have followed; but they furnish no argument against fact. Were the reader cast away upon an uninhabited island, without the knowledge of this primeval device, he might perish, as many have perished, for want of this information. Just so with the various diseases for which nature has provided ample remedies. Our ignorance of those provisions prevents our cure.

In the matter of fire there are striking adaptations which, small as they seem, our author says, "have a bearing upon the general economy of the world. The conditions necessary to the evolution of a spark by friction, and to nourish it into flame, are such, we all perceive, as serve to prevent any serious results from natural abrasions. Had the necessary amount or intensity of friction been double what it is, man had made little use of fire to the present day. We do not see how, in the first ages, he could have procured it at all, nor yet in subsequent days, unless an advance in the arts supplied him with better means. Yet how the arts could exist, much less advance, without fire, it would be hard to tell. At all events, sparks could not have been drawn out of wood by individual exertion without mechanism, and what mechanism did the pure savage possess, or could he, without fire, possess?" On the other hand, had the amount of friction necessary to produce flame been less, nature would have become an incendiary herself, and flames would have been kindled every-where where there was wood to burn.

Without noticing the progressive steps by which the second great device for obtaining fire was reached—namely, the flint and steel, or tinder-box—we glance at the agency of fire in promoting the civilization of the race. "Once introduced into the hut, fire came under the management of females, and wrought a revolution in previous habits. Food was no longer consumed without cooking; roots, as well as flesh, were roasted; subsequently victuals were boiled, and the phenomena of ebullition, hot water, and steam observed. Culinary utensils were devised; rude seats, tables, and beds made their appearance. Natural vessels were superseded by artificial ones; earthenware caldrons succeeded those formed of skins, of the calabash, and joints of bamboo. Spinning, weaving, and knitting stepped in; and the comforts of a permanent habitation put an end to the miseries of roving the forests without dwellings or dress. Before these things were accomplished, man could have had but faint views of his destiny, none of the glory that awaited his posterity. It may be truly said, that the phoenix of the arts arose from the ashes of the domestic hearth, and that from it the first rays of science shot forth."

Our limits forbid any further discussion at present of the interesting topics embraced in Mr. Ewbank's volume. In our next, however, we hope to resume the subject.

Items, Literary, Scientific, and Religious.

MIDDLETON & Co.'s LITHOGRAPHING ESTABLISHMENT.—

This establishment has grown up to be not only the largest of the kind in the west, but one of the largest in the United States. A few hours spent in the various departments will be profitably employed by any lover of the fine arts. It is exceedingly wonderful to what perfection the ingenuity and skill of man have carried the delicate processes of art. We have rarely ever been more interested than in a visit to the lithographing department of Messrs. Middleton & Co. Some idea of its extent may be gathered from the fact that it occupies the third, fourth, and fifth stories of the large buildings of Livingston's Express Company. Their lithographic printing is done on the third story. Eleven presses are here employed, with capacity for printing the largest maps as well as the smallest and finest prints. The great marvel of producing colored prints from engravings on stone is here exhibited in its highest perfection. In the fourth story we find the "Artist's Rooms." From seven to ten skillful engravers are constantly employed here. A new and beautiful map of the city of Lafayette, La., has just been completed; also a landscape view of the city of Springfield, O., with some of its elegant villas and private residences. They have also a view of Cincinnati, taken from one of the hills on the Kentucky side of the river. The accuracy and minuteness of detail, not only in the outline, but also in the more prominent buildings, spires, and other points of interest, is really surprising. In the fifth story of this hive of industry we find the rooms for map-mounting and plate printing, in which department they keep some dozen presses.

The above is but a meager description of only one department. Their rooms for copper and steel-plate engravings are also worthy of a visit. But our space will not allow us to take our readers there for the present. Should they take a notion to go "on their own hook," they will find them in the Odd Fellow's Building, corner of Third and Walnut streets.

The great lithographic work executed by this house is the series of large colored plates showing the "anatomy of the brain." Some of the most eminent medical men in the country have spoken in the highest terms of this series, giving them the credit of great faithfulness in delineation. They are said to be fully equal to the steel-plate engravings by the Lazars, of London—one eminent as a physician, the other as an engraver. They have also a large number of well-executed portraits both on steel and on stone. This enterprising house, we are gratified to learn, received from the State Board of Agriculture the medal for the best specimens of lithography, and the diploma for the best specimens of maps.

Enterprise of this kind and in this direction the west should encourage by a substantial patronage. We, however, speak of the matter not by way of advertisement, but as an interest of art, science, and, we will add, religion—for the proper cultivation of the arts has much to do with the moral and religious feelings, as well as with taste and refinement.

have recently opened one of the most magnificent book-stores to be found in the country at No. 25 West Fourth-street, Cincinnati. If any one doubts whether the book-trade flourishes in the west, let them walk through this bibliographical temple. The building is five stories high in front and seven in the rear. It is built of a fine, light-colored sand-stone and beautifully ornamented. In a central niche at the second story stands a statue designed to represent Cincinnati. Within the building is light, airy, and as complete in construction as skill and money could make it. The main store-room is thirty-four feet front by two hundred deep, having a wing of thirty-four feet extending to an alley. In making the tour of the establishment, we found the basement divided into two rooms, each one hundred feet deep. One is devoted to the jobbing department; the other to the accommodation of a number of Adams book presses, in active operation. The second floor is a fine sale-room, attractively set off with tasteful shelving, neat counters, columns, desks, etc., and is by far the most elegant room in the Queen City. The upper stories are devoted to printing, binding, and other purposes connected with their extensive publishing business. The rooms are all heated by steam, gas is introduced into every part of the building, and nothing left wanting to detract from its fitness and convenience. The hoisting machinery has been judiciously placed in the wing, thereby not detracting from the fine view, and besides enabling them to receive and discharge goods in the alley, without blockading the main entrance to Fourth. Success to our enterprising friends!

PAPER-MAKING.—The consumption of paper is enormous in the United States. There are no less than 750 paper-mills, manufacturing about 270,000,000 pounds of paper per annum, valued at $27,000,000; and yet this will scarcely supply the enormous demand for the article. One effect of this large increase in the manufacture of paper has been to advance the price of rags. But a few years since they were thrown out as so much worthless rubbish. Now rags constitute no inconsiderable item in the small commercial transactions of the country. Let us see: it takes one and a half pounds of rags to make one pound of paper. The manufacture of 270,000,000 pounds of paper, then, consumes 405,000,000 pounds of rags, which, at the rate of four cents per pound, amounts to $16,200,000—the annual commerce in old rags.

The paper manufacturers have become alarmed at the fact that the source from which they derived the material necessary for the manufacture of paper, and which they had regarded as unfailing, has been comparatively exhausted—to such an extent, at least, as to render them no longer able to keep pace with the demand. The proprietors of the London Times, foreseeing the effect of this state of things upon their large establishment by increasing the cost of paper to them, offered a reward of $25,000 for the discovery of a cheap and perfect substitute for rags as a material for the manufacture of paper. Many experiments have already been tried; and though, as yet, without entire success, we may still reasonably hope, in view of what has already been accomplished, that ultimately the desired result will be attained. What well in the sight of our neighbors—will be swept away; and nothing will remain but the skeletons of our souls, shivering in the sight of men and of angels, in the day of that last and terrible winter, when the glory of this world will have waned, and death will have spread out his hand over all the generations of mankind. Nothing will remain but the naked trunk and leafless branches of our souls—except those seeds of Christian faith and love, which may have lain secretly wrapped up in the bosom of the flowers. The leaf dies; for the leaf has no life in it. The flower dies; for the flower has no life in it. But the seed, if it be the seed of Christian faith and love, has life in it, and can not die. When it falls to the ground, Christ sends his angels to gather it up, and bids them lay it by in the storehouse of heaven. By the world, indeed, it is unseen. The world perceives no difference between the flower that has seed in it, and the flower that has no seed. To the outward eye they look the same; for the outward eye sees only what is outward. But Christ knows his own: he beholds the seed within the heart of the flower, and he will not suffer it to die or to be lost. In the last day he will bring it forth, and will crown the branches again with the undying flowers of heaven.—Rev. Julius Charles Hare.

THE SLANDERER.

THE slanderer is a pest, a disgrace, an incubus to society, that should be subjected to a slow cauterization, and then be lopped off like a disagreeable excrescence. Like the viper, he leaves a shining trail in his wake. Like a tarantula, he weaves a thread of candor with a web of wiles, or with all the kind mendacity of hints, whispers forth his tale, that, "like the fabling Nile, no fountain knows." The dead—ay, even the dead—over whose pale-sheeted forms sleeps the dark sleep no venomous tongue can wake, and whose pale lips have then no voice to plead, are subjected to the scandalous attack of the slanderer—

"Who wears a mask that Gorgon would disown,
A cheek of parchment, and an eye of stone."

I think it is Pollok who says the slanderer is the foulest whelp of sin, whose tongue was set on fire in hell, and whose legs were faint with haste to propagate the lie his soul had framed.

"He has a lip of lies, a face formed to conceal,
That, without feeling, mocks at those who feel."

There is no animal I despise more than these

moths and scrays of society, the malicious censurers—

"These ravenous fishes, who follow only in the wake
Of great ships, because, perchance, they're great."

O, who would disarrange all society with their false lap-wing cries! The slanderer makes few direct charges and assertions. His long, envious fingers point to no certain locality. He has an inimitable shrug of the shoulders, can give peculiar glances,

"Or convey a libel by a frown,
Or wink a reputation down."

He seems to glory in the misery he entails. The innocent wear the foulest impress of his smutty palm, and a soul pure as "Arctic snow twice dotted by the northern blast," through his warped and discolored glasses wears a mottled hue.

"A whisper broke the air—
A soft, light tone, and low,
Yet barbed with shame and woe!
Nor might only periah there,
Nor farther go!
Ah, me! a quick and eager ear
Caught up the little meaning sound;
Another voice then breathed it clear,
And so it wandered round,
From ear to lip, from lip to ear,
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke!"

Vile wretch! ruiner of fair innocence by foul slanders, in thine own dark, raven-plumed soul distilled—

"Blush—if of honest blood a drop remains
To steal its way along thy veins!
Blush—if the bronze long hardened on thy cheek,
Has left one spot where that poor drop can speak!"

HOW PRAYER IS ANSWERED.

ONE of the pupils in a school in Germany came to his master one day in great trouble, because, as he said, God would not answer his prayer. "And what did you pray for?" "I prayed to God that he would give me a humble heart." "And why do you think that he has not heard you?" The child said, with tears, "Since I prayed for this the other boys have been cross and unkind to me. They tease me and mock me at every turn, so that I can hardly bear it." "My dear boy, you prayed that God would give you a humble heart, and why then should you be vexed, if the other boys are the means of humbling you? Here you see that God does really answer you. It is in this way he sees fit to send you a humble mind." The poor child had not thought of that.

ON TYPICAL AND ALLEGORICAL EXPLANATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.—It might be expected that, when God had determined to send his Son into the world, there would be a train and concatenation of circumstances preparatory to his coming—that the history, which declared that he was to come, should exhibit many persons and things, which would form a grand preparation for the event, though not so many of them as an absurd fancy might imagine.

There is a certain class of persons who wish to rid themselves of the types. Sikes insists that even the brazen serpent is called in by our Lord by way of illustration only, and not as a designed type. Robinson, of Cambridge, when he began to verge toward Socinianism, began to ridicule the types, and to find matter of sport in the pomegranates and the bells of the high priest's garment. At all events, the subject should not be treated with levity and irreverence: it deserves serious reflection.

With respect to the expediency of employing the types much in the pulpit, that is another question. I seldom employ them. I am jealous for truth and its sanctions. The Old dispensation was a typical dispensation; but the New is a dispensation unrolled. When speaking of the typical dispensation, we must admire a master like St. Paul. But to us modesty becomes a duty in treating such subjects in our ministry. Remember, "This is none other but the house of God! and this is the gate of heaven." How dreadful if I lead thousands with nonsense—if I lose the opportunity of impressing solid truths—if I waste their precious time!

A minister should say to himself: "I would labor to cut off occasions of objecting to the truth. I would labor to grapple with men's consciences. I would show them that there is no strange twist in our view of religion. I must avoid, as much as possible, having my judgment called in question: many watch for this, and will avail themselves of any advantage. Some who hear me are thus continually seeking excuses for not listening to the warnings and invitations of the word; they are endeavoring to get out of our reach; but I would hold them fast by such passages as, 'What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?'"

Many men labor to make the Bible THEIR Bible. This is one way of getting its yoke off their necks. The MEANING, however, of the Bible is the Bible. If I preach then on imputed righteousness, for instance, why should I preach from, "the skies pour down righteousness," and then anathematize men for not believing the doctrine, when it is not declared in the passage, and there are hundreds of places so expressly to the point?

Most of the folly on this subject of allegorical interpretation has arisen from a want of holy awe on the mind. An evil fashion may lead some men into it; and, so far, the case is somewhat attenuated. We should ever remember, however, that it is a very different thing to allegorize the New dispensation from allegorizing

the Old: the New is a dispensation of substance and realities.

When a careless young man, I remember to have felt alarms in my conscience from some preachers; while others, from this method of treating their subjects, let me off easily. I heard the man as a weak allegorizer: I despised him as a foolish preacher: till I met with some plain, simple, solid man, who seized and urged the obvious meaning. I shall, therefore, carry to my grave a deep conviction of the danger of entering far into typical and allegorical interpretations.

Accommodation of Scripture, if sober, will give variety. The apostles do this so far as to show that it may have its use and advantage. It should, however, never be taken as a ground-work, but employed only in the way of allusion. I may use the passage, "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," by way of allusion to Christ; but I can not employ it as the ground-work of a discourse on him.—Cecil.

AN EXPOSITION OF ISAIAH XVIII, 4; OR, GOD CONSIDERING WHAT HE WILL DO FOR HIS PEOPLE.—"I will consider in my dwelling-place like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."

Preachers should be very sparing of their animadversions on the translation of the Scriptures in common use; not only because they tend to shake confidence and awaken suspicions in their hearers, but because they are generally needless. It is not illiteracy that commends the present version; the ablest scholars are the most satisfied with it upon the whole. Yet, while the original is divine, the rendering is human; and, therefore, we need not wonder if an occasional alteration is necessary. This is peculiarly the case where the sense is very obscure or even imperceptible without it.

If the words as they now stand in the text remain, his "dwelling-place" is heaven, and the meaning is, that he would there consider how to succor and bless his people, for he careth for them: but a word must be supplied to show the import—"I will consider in my dwelling-place" how I can prove "like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." But the margin, and Lowth, and every modern expositor, make his "dwelling-place" not the place of his consideration, but the object: and read, "I will regard my dwelling-place like a clear heat upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." Now what his dwelling-place was we can easily determine. It was Zion—"whose dwelling is in Zion." "This is my rest forever here, will I dwell, for I have desired it." And Watts has well added—

"The God of Jacob chose the hill
Of Zion for his ancient rest;
And Zion is his dwelling still,
His Church is with his presence blest."

And his concern for the welfare of the one is far surpassed by his regard for the other. And how is this regard exercised? Here are two images.

First, "like a clear heat upon herbs." The margin again says, "Like a clear heat after rain;" and I wish, says the excellent translator of Isaiah, who has adopted it, that there was better evidence in support of it. The reason is, that he probably feared, as others in reading it may fear, that "a clear heat upon herbs" would be rather unfavorable, and cause them to droop, if not to die. And this would be the case in some instances; but not in all; and it is enough for a metaphor to have one just and strong resemblance. Read the dying words of David: "And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." Now after rain "the clear shining," or "clear heat upon herbs," would produce immediately fresh vigor and shootings. Even in our own climate the effect upon the grass and plants is soon visible; but in the East the influence is much more sudden and surprising, and the beholders can almost see the herbage thrive and flourish. Thus the Lord can quicken his people in his ways, and strengthen in them the things that remain and are ready to die. And when after the softening comes the sunshine, they grow in grace and in the knowledge of their Lord and Savior. Their faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of them toward each other aboundeth. They bear much fruit. Thus we read of "increasing with all the increase of God." This figure, therefore, expresses growth and fertility.

But the second holds forth refreshment, seasonable refreshment, "like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." How cooling, useful, welcome, delightful such an appearance is, ask the laborer in the field, in the Eastern field, bearing the burden and heat of the day. God, as the God of all comfort, realizes the truth and force of this image in the experience of his tried followers—First, in their spiritual exercises and depressions arising from the assaults of temptation, a sense of their unworthiness and imperfections, and fears concerning their safety and perseverance. And, secondly, in their outward afflictions. These may be many; and if our strength is small, we shall faint in the day of adversity. But when we cry, he answers us, and strengthens us with strength in our souls. He gives us a little reviving in our bondage; and in the multitude of our thoughts within us his comforts delight our souls. He is able and engaged to comfort us in all our tribulation. By the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ; by his word; by his ordinances; by the preaching of a minister; by the conversation of a friend; by a letter, a book, a particular occurrence of providence, a time of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord—and a cloud of dew be furnished in the heat of harvest.

Such is the God of love to his people. His consolations are not small; his grace is abundant; his care unceasing. Well may his children trust in him, knowing that he will send "the clear shining" of the sun after the rain, and also the "cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."

THE TEST AND THE EVIDENCE OF THE REALITY OF FAITH.—Does a man seek a proof of his acceptance? The reference is to facts in his own moral condition. He is to look for it in a change which is taking place in his character; a new direction of his desires; a new regulation of his affections; an habitual impression, to which he was a stranger before, of the presence and the perfections of the Deity; and a new light which has

burst upon his view respecting his relations to this life and that which is to come. He is to seek this evidence in a mind which aims at no lower standard than that which will bear the constant inspection of infinite purity; he is to seek it, and to manifest it to others, in a spirit which takes no lower pattern than that model of perfection—the character of the Messiah. These acquirements, indeed, are looked upon, not as a ground of acceptance, but a test of moral condition; not as in any degree usurping the place of the great principle of faith, but as its fruits and evidences. As these, then, are the only proofs of the reality of this principle, so they are the only basis on which a man can rest any sound conviction of his moral aspect in the sight of the Deity; and that system is founded on delusion and falsehood which, in this respect, holds out any other ground of confidence than the purification of the heart and a corresponding harmony of the whole character. Such attainment, indeed, is not made at once, nor is it ever made in a full and perfect manner in the present state of being; but, where the great principle has been fixed within, there is a persevering effort, and a uniform contest and a continual aspiration after conformity to the great model of perfection. Each step that a man gains in this progress serves to extend his view of the high pattern to which his eye is steadily directed; and as his knowledge of it is thus enlarged, he is led by comparison to feel more and more deeply his own deficiency. It thus produces amazing humility, and an increasing sense of his own imperfection, and causes him continually to feel that, in this warfare, he requires a power which is not in man. But he knows also that this is provided as an essential part of the great system on which his hope is established. Amid much weakness, therefore, and many infirmities, his moral improvement goes forward. Faint and feeble at first as the earliest dawn of the morning, it becomes brighter and steadier as it proceeds in its course, and, "as the shining light, shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—Abercrombie.

The above article contains some powerfully condensed and strikingly expressive thoughts, to which every Christian would do well to give heed. As a sufficient antidote to any theological heresy that may be found lurking in it, we simply append the following, from a good authority: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God."

SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.—"He drieth the stream that we may seek the full fountain."

How beautiful are the manifestations of Divine providence in the Christian life! Every step along his pilgrim way gives fresh token of the wisdom, goodness, and forbearing mercy of his blessed Master. The dark places in his pilgrimage, which, in their first passage, seemed like so many valleys of Bochim to his soul, have been the very steps which led to the "green pastures," where, with enlarged faith, he may repose by the "still waters" of God's unfailing love.

The lesson may be believed when the young disciple first enters the Church, and with new-born tenderness of soul receives its teachings as the holy truth of God. But its real, significant bearing upon the daily life must come home to the heart in the hour of its great need. Ah, then, indeed, it is all of grace that the light enters; for the laying down of self, calmly to repose on the bosom of infinite Love, is the life-long lesson, scarce learned, even when the distant hills of home break upon the closing eye.

To one in feebleness the winter may set in with doubt and dread, and long-waiting at home be the allotted portion. The prayer meeting, the dear Sabbath school, and the precious sermons assume a new importance. How shall life's trials be borne without their refreshing ministry? Amid the cold winds and frequent storms, how shall the Christian brother or sister bring the glad news of Zion's prosperity, how, amid the loneliness of the little circle still narrowing to closer bounds, shall the interests of Christ's Church be kept bright and warm in the soul's depths? But, O ye of little faith, the streams are dried in mercy. Deprived of the ordinances of his house he brings us to his word, and richer, clearer meaning lights up its page; we feel an individual interest in the portion, and daily bread is there for daily need. Prayer is a necessity; it covers broader fields than we have realized; the sparrow's lesson is no longer an illustration of holy writ, but a life-giving assurance that Christ brings present salvation to view. The Missionary Journal, hastily read, because outward calls are imperative, opens with unwonted delight, and we feel identified with the self-denying ones that have borne the burden and heat of the day. Not theirs only is the duty to watch and wait; we must see to it that no shadow darkens their way which we may prevent. Do we not count our temporary privations as dust in the balance, compared with their life-consecration to the service of God? Ay, do we not trace with them the drying stream that impels to the fountain?

Among the pleasant incidents of her Christian experience, which a dear mother used to relate, was a little anecdote of Chloe Spear, a colored woman, who for many years was a devoted member of good old Dr. Baldwin's Church, in Boston. It always interested us by its characteristic language and pathos, but now it seems forcibly to illustrate the truth under consideration.

Chloe had been sick some time, and none of her dear Christian friends that she prized so much visited her—but to use her own words—"she think it strange, they talk so kind to her, they so much in her mind, and why they not come? Ah, she think she make idol of them; she set them up above the neighbor and the colored friend. Then by and by the Lord show her how he enough in himself for her little soul, and she feel strong in him, and put the friend all away, and the Lord give her joy. When she staid on him, she think of the kind neighbor that come in, and do many thing to comfort her poor old body, and she tell them how she hope the Lord give them good hope in his mercy to pay them for their kindness to aunt Chloe. Now she have a text come to her mind, and she never know what that mean till the Lord bring her in a strait place: 'Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitations.'"

About Chloe's application of this text, I think she meant to imply that the instrumentality of the world was sometimes actually connected with our progress in piety, or, rather, was made subservient to it; she always said, "receive you into their houses"—but I was afraid to change the text to her repeating.

"She think, perhaps, she not feel enough for kind neighbor before, and she pray more for their poor soul, and there alone on her sick bed the Lord come near, and he make her fill with joy, and when she get there, the friend come pouring in, and they say, 'O sister Chloe, we so sorry we did not know you sick; we miss you a great while; we think you gone away.' Then she tell them

she have feel bad, but now she know better how to love; them she love Church, she hope she meet all in her dear Master's house. And by and by, brother Baldwin come, and he say, 'Chloe, why you no send your minister to come and see you when you sick? he never hear she sick, he gone away, and he think Chloe gone to the country a little while;' and he so sorry, he afraid she feel hurt.' Then she tell him just how the Lord lead her. He good, his friend good, the kind lady good, but the Lord better; and she keep the lesson by her, and the Lord make her strong to go many more ways she never knew before."—Watchman and Reflector.

LOVE TO CHRIST AND LOVE OF CHRIST.—When Krishna Pal, the first convert to Christ in Bengal, was on his death-bed, all who visited him were impressed with the deep peace that reigned there. The stillness of the sick chamber, broken only by the low utterance of prayer, or the feeble voice of the dying man, as he spoke of his hopes and prospects, and of the Savior to whom he owed them all, seemed to breathe nothing but tranquillity. He was asked if he loved Jesus Christ. "Where can a sinner go," he replied, "but unto Christ?" Soon after the same question was repeated. "Yes," said he, "but he loves me more than I love him."

Is it any wonder that Krishna was ready to die? He had served the Savior twenty-two years. He had braved the hatred of his countrymen when he was baptized in the name of Jesus, and had been an earnest preacher of the Gospel. He had won others to Christ. But he did not hope for heaven on account of these things. It was not because he loved Christ, but because Christ loved him.

"O thou, my soul, forget no more
The Friend who all thy sorrows bore;
Let every idol be forgot,
But, O my soul, forget him not."

are the words of the beautiful hymn which he wrote, and which thousands of Christians in this and other lands have united with him in singing. But while he desired always to remember his divine Friend, he rejoiced most of all in the certainty that Jesus would never forget him. Krishna has now been more than thirty years in the glorious presence of the Savior he loved, the Savior who so loved him. Who does not wish to follow him there? Who does not desire to lead other heathen souls into the same eternal joy?—Macdonian.

WALKING WITH GOD.—To be in the habit of asking the will of God ere we act; to be in the practice of comparing the end we propose to ourselves with the sure and certain standard set down in his holy word; to make the glory of his great name, and not our own profit and pleasure, the rule of our own schemes; to try and find the path of duty, instead of the way that is good in our own eyes; to ask faithfully what is right, rather than what is pleasant; to test things by their influence on others, as well as on ourselves—this is to acknowledge God—this is to commit our way to the Lord.

RAIMENT OF NEEDLEWORK.—The following is a quaint comment on the text, "She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework," Psalm xiv, 14: "The work of sanctification carried on in the believer's heart is a slow and costly one, and can not be completed without many a severe prick in the process."

* It was her habit to go to the adjoining towns for a few days, if she heard of revivals or special gatherings of the Church.

Editorial Sketch and Review.

THE WORLD A WORKSHOP.*

THE physical relationship of man to the earth is a question second in importance only to that of his spiritual relationship. This is the question discussed in the little volume to which we have made reference, and discussed, too, with not a little originality, enthusiasm, and eloquence. The author evidently entered upon his work con amore; with unflagging zeal he pursued it to the end, and has truly given to the world "a testimony of respect to the dignity and omnipotence of enlightened labor."

The author's great point is, "that this mundane habitation was designed and literally fitted up for the cultivation and application of chemical and mechanical science as the basis of human development." He argues that "material natures require something to do as well as to reflect on; this is indispensable to their being—the purpose of it. Employment is, therefore, an element of existence." Is it objected to such a theory that physical industry and ingenuity are of too low and too ephemeral a nature to enter into the grand and enduring plans of the Author of the universe, but that the cultivation of mind must be the object of calling the universe into existence? The author admits this to be the end, but suggests "as matter is the agent on which God has printed his thoughts, may it not be the book from which all minds are to read and to learn? We know that he has made the elevation of human nature to depend on the study and application of principles impressed upon matter, and, therefore, it is consistent with his purposes and with his greatness to educate intelligences by it. We know not that any are or can be trained up without it; and as, wherever intelligences are, they are surrounded by it, and by displays of Divine wisdom shining forth in it, is it not reasonable to infer that it is a universal medium of mental and moral tuition? for which purpose, instead of being collected into one inhabitable body, it has been gathered into an infinite number, every one different, and a theater of different phenomena."

The theory, of which we have here developed an imperfect outline, involves a few striking and grand consequences, which, however, the author does not hesitate to accept. The first of these is, that physical and mental labor entered into the original design of man's creation, and are not, therefore, mere incidents of his lapsed condition. If by the term labor, the author simply intends activity, directed to mental and physical ends, we think the view is accordant with the teachings both of nature and revelation. When created in innocence and purity, man was placed in the garden, not merely to be regaled by its beauty, to enjoy its fruit, and to wear away time in idle pleasures, but "to dress it, and to keep it." Dr. Adam Clarke beautifully remarks upon this passage, that "even in a state of innocence we can not conceive it possible that man could have been happy if inactive. God gave him work to do, and his employment contributed to his happiness; for the structure of his body as well as of his mind plainly proves that he was never intended for a merely contemplative life." What then? Did no physical evil result from "the fall?" So some, overleaping a logical chasm, whose breadth can be spanned by no such legitimate sequence, are ready to conclude. The true solution of the question undoubtedly is, that while sin weakened and perverted our physical as well as intellectual and moral powers, and this made it labor to cultivate the earth—the earth itself was also cursed and rendered more difficult of cultivation. We may, therefore, safely conclude, that while toil and labor—that is, the painful and exhausting drudgery now required of us—is an infliction because of sin, physical activity, for useful and beneficent purposes, and especially for our own development and happiness, was one of the original designs of our creation. We think, therefore, with the author, that there must be something wrong in the dislike to material labor which possesses the minds of so many. We have almost suspected that the grandest conception formed of heaven, in some minds, is a place where unbounded license will be given to laziness. "If 'pride brought on the fall,' its effects are awfully felt in the low esteem in which the elaboration of matter is held, and in the presumption that it is derogatory to spiritual exaltation. Thus, the original law, 'replenish the earth and subdue it,' is regarded by most persons as a coarse, unpleasant, and unintellectual task, because its full meaning, and its bearings on our present and future destiny, are not perceived."

Another sequence of this theory, presumptive rather than demonstrative, relates to other worlds. They are supposed to have the same physical construction as ours; that is, the condition of matter in them is essentially the same as in ours, and also the physical condition of their inhabitants. Our author says: "To those who deny them to be centers of reasoning and active populations it is useless to reply till they can show for what other purposes they are made, and how this little earth, a mere atom among them, became so strange an exception. If we had had no knowledge of the existence of other orbs it would have been unphilosophical to insist there were none beside our own; but now that we know they crowd every region of space, it would be positive folly to contend that all are barren of life and intelligence, of sciences and arts, except the one given to us. It is preposterous to suppose the divine Builder erects tenements for the purpose of keeping them empty. If they are not occupied, it is because they are not prepared to be so. It may be assumed that as soon as an orb is fitted for the reception of tenants, they are put in possession of it." These premises being admitted, and having also seen that activity is an element of existence, we are brought to infer the industrial activities of the denizens of the universe, involving infinities of modes and processes, and multiplied infinities of applications and results. "Let those," says Mr. Ewbank, "who do not sympathize with the idea that occupants of worlds around us act on matter as we do in this one—which, it should be remembered, is an integral member and sample of them—look abroad, and see how the same general laws to which it is subject govern others; how some in its vicinity resemble it in volume, density, duration of days and nights, etc.; how the red soil, the green seas, and northern snows and ice of Mars approximate to it in these particulars; how larger, more distant, and more resplendent ones, belonging to the same group, are illuminated every night, each with several moons; and how in aerolites we have metals and metallic alloys belonging to celestial regions—and then ask themselves if there is any thing unreasonable or unlikely, or if it is not in the highest degree probable and presumable, that people there add to their enjoyments and multiply their conveniences, by employing the materials and agencies placed at their disposal—in other words, that occupations akin to some of ours are followed in other spheres."

Another result of this theory, is the recognition of unity of design pervading and manifesting itself in diversity of parts. Happily for us, the universe is not a medley of mingled purposes and disconnected things. "The unity of design manifested in it is the theme of every philosopher, and not less observable and admirable is the fine chain of relationship that binds all the diverse forms and conditions of matter in one coherent whole. There are no violent transitions from series to series, but by almost imperceptible degrees differences open into species, species into genera, and genera into wider classes. And as with the contents of worlds, so with worlds themselves; for they are merely larger divisions, and not the largest, since they merge into groups or systems, and systems, in all probability, into still more and more comprehensive departments. There are no abrupt chasms in their outlines, dimensions, illumination, or movements, and by the strongest of analogies there can be none in their internal administrations. No truth is more patent than the unity of creation. There is nothing exi generis in it; nothing that stands solitary or alone; nothing that is not connected with and dependent on something else—not a boulder, a planet, or a sun—not an animal or the habits of one—not an order of intelligence or an occupation of intelligence." This broad view, when thoroughly analyzed—when all its parts are thoroughly studied, only renders the conclusion still more invincible, that material natures every-where, throughout all the vast universe of God, are designed to be active—to labor. To repudiate labor, then, is to repudiate one of the designs of our creation.

Viewed in one light our earth is a mere caravansery—a temporary convenience for passing travelers, and, therefore, worthy of only a passing notice. Taken in another light, it is a theater of momentous action and of grand results, which are to be realized only by the connection of active and intelligent beings with it. Man, then, is necessary to the earth, and the earth is necessary to man. It is the manufactory; he is the manufacturer. And by working up the material before him, he not only demonstrates the unlimited capabilities of the world, but he develops also the wonderful capabilities that lie hidden in his own nature; he develops himself. The design of our mundane system is to be inferred from the materials with which we find it stored, and the attributes or adaptations of those materials. If they are indispensable to man, and yet comparatively useless till manipulated by him, then have we an indication of the original design of its Author that it should be a theater of activity on the part of man. How, then, do we find our earth? Stocked, it is true, with mineral substances of almost endless variety and number—susceptible of almost inconceivably beautiful, various, and useful applications—but alloyed, unshapen, and unwrought. Or if we look at vegetable and animal substances, elaboration is equally indispensable.

It is a sublime idea that man is designed to search out the hidden uses, the latent susceptibilities of the materials with which our earth is stored, as well as to be a practical operator in their subjugation to useful purposes. "The hypothesis," says our author, "that the chief employment of man was to till the soil and raise cattle, is an unworthy one, since it puts us much on a par with the lower tribes, in making the procuring and consuming of food the principal object of our being. If we were made to live like cattle—merely to eat and sleep—it would be true, and the earth might then be considered a mere victualing institution. But, with us, and all intelligences, food is, like the traveler's staff, an adjunct of life—a mere aid in accomplishing the purposes of existence." We must have food, it is true, but we have higher functions also. One of these is the development of the forces, processes, and principles of inorganic matter, and their subjugation to the uses of humanity.

Our author, like all enthusiasts, pushes his theory to an offensive, if not ridiculous extreme. Take an example. After admitting that nearly all matter is inorganic; that the whole bulk of the earth is so, except its skin-like surface, he proceeds to inquire why it is so. "What does this mean? Why all this immature matter, unless it be for man to work up? How otherwise are its quantity and condition to be accounted for?" When we read this passage, we could not help meditating upon the sorrowful plight we poor denizens of the earth would find ourselves placed in were all its inorganic substances worked up into mechanical or chemical implements. To us it appears evident that the design of our great Creator had reference less to the amount of inorganic matter to be "worked up" than to the development of our powers and of its uses.

In our earth we find three great storehouses of matter for the elaboration of man. These are minerals, vegetable products, and animal products.

Of minerals, it is remarkable what discrimination is made by the great Constructor of the globe, so that they may be offered to man in such forms and under such conditions as to be manageable by him. In this respect there is a remarkable discrimination noticed by Mr. Ewbank. "Those that are easily dug into are homogenous, and extend over large areas, as fields of clay, coal, sand, and marl. So also with such as can be quarried, as rocks; they are in immense and continuous masses, from which blocks of any required dimensions may be taken—monolithic temples have been dislodged." Without reflection one would think it would be desirable to have the metals provided in the same way—that is, in large masses and in their pure metallic state, so that we could have the material ready for our use, instead of the ore, which must be smelted and prepared. Suppose we had the metals in this state—laid up in solid mountain piles like granite, or in thick and solid strata—what use could we have made of them? Our author says none at all. "It would have been beyond human power to have extracted a supply from them. Had a mammoth boulder of the finest malleable iron been placed, at the birth of man, in the center of every township for the use of its inhabitants, all would have remained undiminished to this day. Like blocks of copper recently found in ancient diggings on Lake Superior, from which Indians had endeavored to cut portions with flint tools, they would have remained monuments of tautalism." Hence it is that they seldom occur except as minerals that yield to the pick, while iron, the chief of them, is found only in ore.

Iron, so abundant and so indispensable, is perhaps one of the most difficult metals to reduce to a malleable state. How pregnant with meaning the fact that ore and coal for smelting it are generally found stored together in the bowels of the earth! Is there no design in such an arrangement of Deity?

Another curious provision for the supply of man's want, and for his education as the grand laborer in nature's workshop, is seen in the provision to supply him with cutting-tools. These are tools indispensable to a manufacturer in the metals. Let us see how our author states and solves the problem here presented: "If the substance be intended to cut all others, how is it to be cut? How formed into tools without the aid of still harder tools? Let it be remembered that before these queries were practically answered, the idea of giving to natural bodies qualities they did not already possess had not entered into the minds of men. Had mines of steel and adamant been provided specially for tools, the same difficulty would have occurred; for tools of still harder materials would have been necessary to shape and harden them." Here was a singular exigence to be provided for. The harder metal necessary for tools would have been useless, because man would have been unable to cut and shape it into tools. Had nature provided it in the shape of tools, that would have contravened one of the highest of its own purposes; namely, the education of man. How simple and beautiful the contrivance to meet this exigence! Iron is made capable of being hardened; and thus implements are made of it by which it may be cut, sawed, and shaped to suit the convenience of man. The discovery of the process by which iron could be converted into steel opened up a new continent of knowledge in the arts, and subjected it to the dominion of man.

Fire was essential to the mechanical operations of this great workshop, as well as to the comfort of man. Without it neither earthen nor metallic wares could be manufactured. He might mold the clay into the forms desired; but without fire it would remain clay forever. Without fire, the ore would remain in its native state, and the harder minerals remain unshapen and unemployed. To man as a cosmopolite it is indispensable, and his mastery over it has not a little to do with his pre-eminence over the other inhabitants of the earth. But how was fire first obtained? Did God kindle it and favor man with the blaze? or did he simply adjust the materials, and leave man to discover and apply them? Reasoning from that which is every-where observed in the economy of nature, we should unhesitatingly infer the latter. Also, according to an old tradition, the first hint received by the primeval races upon the production of fire was the ignition of trees by the friction of their trunks or branches rubbing against each other during a high wind. Our author dissents from this suggestion, and regards the primeval mode of its production as "an instinctive suggestion." "The process," says he, "was by friction, and the only instruments employed two small pieces of wood. By twirling the point of a dry stick in a rude indentation made in another, or by rubbing it to and fro in a groove, sparks were evolved and flame obtained; an apparatus so simple that Indian boys and girls have been observed to prepare it by breaking suitable pieces from a branch and gnawing the pointed one into shape. Such, from the beginning, has served the wild man for a tinder-box; and thus wherever fuel was he had the means of kindling it." How striking is Homer's description of Mercury kindling a fire to roast the cattle he had stolen:

"He snatch'd a branch and stripp'd the bark,
Rubb'd piece 'gainst piece, till spark by spark
Was kindled, and the flame upswew."

"This description," says Mr. Ewbank, "is literally that of a Camanche or Apache after a buffalo hunt, or a foray into New Mexico."

Some will, perhaps, object to this theory of the origin of fire, that had man been left to make the discovery, he might have suffered immensely, and many of the human race might have perished for want of fire before the discovery was made. Undoubtedly these results might have followed; but they furnish no argument against fact. Were the reader cast away upon an uninhabited island, without the knowledge of this primeval device, he might perish, as many have perished, for want of this information. Just so with the various diseases for which nature has provided ample remedies. Our ignorance of those provisions prevents our cure.

In the matter of fire there are striking adaptations which, small as they seem, our author says, "have a bearing upon the general economy of the world. The conditions necessary to the evolution of a spark by friction, and to nourish it into flame, are such, we all perceive, as serve to prevent any serious results from natural abrasions. Had the necessary amount or intensity of friction been double what it is, man had made little use of fire to the present day. We do not see how, in the first ages, he could have procured it at all, nor yet in subsequent days, unless an advance in the arts supplied him with better means. Yet how the arts could exist, much less advance, without fire, it would be hard to tell. At all events, sparks could not have been drawn out of wood by individual exertion without mechanism, and what mechanism did the pure savage possess, or could he, without fire, possess?" On the other hand, had the amount of friction necessary to produce flame been less, nature would have become an incendiary herself, and flames would have been kindled every-where where there was wood to burn.

Without noticing the progressive steps by which the second great device for obtaining fire was reached—namely, the flint and steel, or tinder-box—we glance at the agency of fire in promoting the civilization of the race. "Once introduced into the hut, fire came under the management of females, and wrought a revolution in previous habits. Food was no longer consumed without cooking; roots, as well as flesh, were roasted; subsequently victuals were boiled, and the phenomena of ebullition, hot water, and steam observed. Culinary utensils were devised; rude seats, tables, and beds made their appearance. Natural vessels were superseded by artificial ones; earthenware caldrons succeeded those formed of skins, of the calabash, and joints of bamboo. Spinning, weaving, and knitting stepped in; and the comforts of a permanent habitation put an end to the miseries of roving the forests without dwellings or dress. Before these things were accomplished, man could have had but faint views of his destiny, none of the glory that awaited his posterity. It may be truly said, that the phoenix of the arts arose from the ashes of the domestic hearth, and that from it the first rays of science shot forth."

Our limits forbid any further discussion at present of the interesting topics embraced in Mr. Ewbank's volume. In our next, however, we hope to resume the subject.

Items, Literary, Scientific, and Religious.

MIDDLETON & Co.'s LITHOGRAPHING ESTABLISHMENT.—This establishment has grown up to be not only the largest of the kind in the west, but one of the largest in the United States. A few hours spent in the various departments will be profitably employed by any lover of the fine arts. It is exceedingly wonderful to what perfection the ingenuity and skill of man have carried the delicate processes of art. We have rarely ever been more interested than in a visit to the lithographing department of Messrs. Middleton & Co. Some idea of its extent may be gathered from the fact that it occupies the third, fourth, and fifth stories of the large buildings of Livingston's Express Company. Their lithographic printing is done on the third story. Eleven presses are here employed, with capacity for printing the largest maps as well as the smallest and finest prints. The great marvel of producing colored prints from engravings on stone is here exhibited in its highest perfection. In the fourth story we find the "Artist's Rooms." From seven to ten skillful engravers are constantly employed here. A new and beautiful map of the city of Lafayette, La., has just been completed; also a landscape view of the city of Springfield, O., with some of its elegant villas and private residences. They have also a view of Cincinnati, taken from one of the hills on the Kentucky side of the river. The accuracy and minuteness of detail, not only in the outline, but also in the more prominent buildings, spires, and other points of interest, is really surprising. In the fifth story of this hive of industry we find the rooms for map-mounting and plate printing, in which department they keep some dozen presses.

The above is but a meager description of only one department. Their rooms for copper and steel-plate engravings are also worthy of a visit. But our space will not allow us to take our readers there for the present. Should they take a notion to go "on their own hook," they will find them in the Odd Fellow's Building, corner of Third and Walnut streets.

The great lithographic work executed by this house is the series of large colored plates showing the "anatomy of the brain." Some of the most eminent medical men in the country have spoken in the highest terms of this series, giving them the credit of great faithfulness in delineation. They are said to be fully equal to the steel-plate engravings by the Lazars, of London—one eminent as a physician, the other as an engraver. They have also a large number of well-executed portraits both on steel and on stone. This enterprising house, we are gratified to learn, received from the State Board of Agriculture the medal for the best specimens of lithography, and the diploma for the best specimens of maps.

Enterprise of this kind and in this direction the west should encourage by a substantial patronage. We, however, speak of the matter not by way of advertisement, but as an interest of art, science, and, we will add, religion—for the proper cultivation of the arts has much to do with the moral and religious feelings, as well as with taste and refinement.

have recently opened one of the most magnificent bookstores to be found in the country at No. 25 West Fourth-street, Cincinnati. If any one doubts whether the book-trade flourishes in the west, let them walk through this bibliographical temple. The building is five stories high in front and seven in the rear. It is built of a fine, light-colored sand-stone and beautifully ornamented. In a central niche at the second story stands a statue designed to represent Cincinnati. Within the building is light, airy, and as complete in construction as skill and money could make it. The main store-room is thirty-four feet front by two hundred deep, having a wing of thirty-four feet extending to an alley. In making the tour of the establishment, we found the basement divided into two rooms, each one hundred feet deep. One is devoted to the jobbing department; the other to the accommodation of a number of Adams book presses, in active operation. The second floor is a fine sale-room, attractively set off with tasteful shelving, neat counters, columns, desks, etc., and is by far the most elegant room in the Queen City. The upper stories are devoted to printing, binding, and other purposes connected with their extensive publishing business. The rooms are all heated by steam, gas is introduced into every part of the building, and nothing left wanting to detract from its fitness and convenience. The hoisting machinery has been judiciously placed in the wing, thereby not detracting from the fine view, and besides enabling them to receive and discharge goods in the alley, without blockading the main entrance to Fourth. Success to our enterprising friends!

PAPER-MAKING.—The consumption of paper is enormous in the United States. There are no less than 750 paper-mills, manufacturing about 270,000,000 pounds of paper per annum, valued at $27,000,000; and yet this will scarcely supply the enormous demand for the article. One effect of this large increase in the manufacture of paper has been to advance the price of rags. But a few years since they were thrown out as so much worthless rubbish. Now rags constitute no inconsiderable item in the small commercial transactions of the country. Let us see: it takes one and a half pounds of rags to make one pound of paper. The manufacture of 270,000,000 pounds of paper, then, consumes 405,000,000 pounds of rags, which, at the rate of four cents per pound, amounts to $16,200,000—the annual commerce in old rags.

The paper manufacturers have become alarmed at the fact that the source from which they derived the material necessary for the manufacture of paper, and which they had regarded as unfailing, has been comparatively exhausted—to such an extent, at least, as to render them no longer able to keep pace with the demand. The proprietors of the London Times, foreseeing the effect of this state of things upon their large establishment by increasing the cost of paper to them, offered a reward of $25,000 for the discovery of a cheap and perfect substitute for rags as a material for the manufacture of paper. Many experiments have already been tried; and though, as yet, without entire success, we may still reasonably hope, in view of what has already been accomplished, that ultimately the desired result will be attained. What man has done in the past inspires the belief that his genius is capable of further and greater achievements; that, indeed, whatever his physical and intellectual wants may crave as essential to the grand progressive movement in favor of the true interests of his race, will in time be procured and brought within the achievement of science and art.

INCREASE IN THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—From the Annual Minutes of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for the year 1854, we find the progress of the Church in membership during the year past to be as follows:

These statistics, it will be seen, show a net increase of 30,732 members during the year. The number of traveling preachers in the several conferences is 5,483, of which 5,814 are effective, the remainder being either supernumerary or supernumerary. There were 42 deaths among the traveling preachers during the year. The number of local preachers is 6,149. The total amount of missionary contributions reported from the conferences is $220,049. The largest amount is from the Baltimore conference, which raised $20,234. The German missions of the Church are also prosperous, and report 12,143 members, which is an increase of 1,368 during the past year. The contributions of the Germans for religious purposes likewise show a handsome increase.

MISSIONARY APPROPRIATIONS.—The missionary appropriation of the Methodist Episcopal Church for the year 1855 is $260,000—the same as last year. The Church South are aided largely in their operations among the Indians by Government money, and the sum total of the missionary money expended by them, including the Government appropriations, is $160,000. Of this sum $14,000, or nearly one-tenth, is spent on the California missions, and $10,000 on the work in China.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH.—The Church South publish six weekly newspapers, as follows: The Nashville Christian Advocate, at Nashville, Tenn., J. B. McFerrin, D. D., editor; the Richmond Advocate, Richmond, Va., L. M. Lee, D. D., editor; the St. Louis Advocate, St. Louis, Mo., D. R. McAnally, editor; the Memphis Advocate, Memphis, Tenn., J. E. Cobb, editor; the New Orleans Advocate, New Orleans, La., H. N. M'Yre, editor; and the Texas Advocate, Galveston, Texas, C. C. Gillespie, editor. The Sunday School Visitor is published monthly at Nashville, Tenn., by Stevenson & Owen, Book Agents, and is edited by L. D. Huston. The Home Circle, late Southern Lady's Companion, is also published by the Book Agents monthly, and is edited by Mr. Huston. The Quarterly Review is published likewise, we believe, at Nashville, and is edited by D. S. Doggett, D. D. Rev. T. O. Summers, D. D., is general Book Editor.

UNITARIANS IN THE UNITED STATES.—"The Unitarian Congregational Register, for the year 1855," has just been issued by the American Unitarian Association of Boston. It appears that there are five hundred and thirty-one ministers in the order, not including Rev. Dr. Lowell and Rev. Messrs. Theodore Parker, Samuel Johnson, Sargent, Higginson, etc. Of this number of preachers, sixty-seven are at present without a settled ministry.

There are 254 organized Unitarian societies in the country, including 2 in Canada—at Montre 1 and Toronto. There are 15 in Maine, 14 in New Hampshire, 3 in Vermont, 164 in Massachusetts, 4 in Rhode Island, 5 in Connecticut, 13 in New York, 2 in New Jersey, 3 in Pennsylvania, 4 in Ohio, 2 in Michigan, 9 in Illinois, 2 in Missouri, 2 in Georgia, and 1 each in the states of Maryland, Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky, South Carolina, District of Columbia, Wisconsin, Iowa, Alabama, Louisiana, and California, and 2 in the Canadas.

There are ten "ministerial associations;" two theological schools—one at Cambridge, Mass., and one at Meadville, Penn. The Unitarians hold "Autumnal Conventions" in each year in various parts of the country, which have been numerous attended; and also anniversary meetings in May, in Boston.

OLD SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANISM.—The Presbyterian states that Old School Presbyterianism is no where taking root more rapidly at the west than in the northern and middle portions of Illinois; that the Schuyler Presbytery alone, at its last meeting, appointed committees to organize six new Churches within its bounds; and that great interest is felt in bringing up the Churches as fast as possible to the self-sustaining point.

DR. HAWES'S CHURCH.—Dr. Hawes's Church, Hartford, Conn., is a remarkable one. It has, says an exchange, never dismissed a pastor, though an ancient Church, and never settled one who had a previous settlement. All its pastors have died with the Church. This is a notable history.

ROMISH SUPPORT OF MISSIONS.—The society at Lyons for the propagation of the faith, under the presidency of the Cardinal Archbishop de Bonald and patronage of the Pope, reports the receipt of nearly $500,000 the past year for the extension of Romanism; of this amount more than $200,000 are devoted to the support of missionaries in America! By this, Jesuits, priests, and other agents of the Roman See are enabled to operate with energy for the removal of the thick darkness shading our Protestant minds!

NEW BOOKS.

HISTORY OF THE GREAT SECESSION FROM THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the Year 1845, eventuating in the Organization of the New Church, entitled the "Methodist Episcopal Church, South." By Rev. Charles Elliott, D. D. Cincinnati: Scovmsted & Poe.—This great work is at length before the public. It comprises a large octavo volume of six hundred and four double pages. By a vote of the General conference of 1848 Dr. Elliott was requested to write that portion of the history of the Church which related to the separation of the conferences in the slaveholding states from the jurisdiction of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and their organization into a distinct ecclesiastical connection under the style of the "Methodist Episcopal Church, South." In entering upon his work, the Doctor found himself everywhere confronted with slavery. This led to a preliminary work—"Sinfulness of American Slavery"—which was published in two volumes, in 1850. The present work comprises the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church for four years, or from 1844 to 1848, with such collateral topics as are necessary to the proper elucidation of that history. The index is complete, and covers nineteen pages, giving an excellent outline of the whole work. The general subjects of the sixty chapters are as follows: Wesleyan Methodism and Slavery; Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church on Slavery; Abolition of the Slave-Trade; West India Emancipation; the American Abolition Movement; Abolition Movements in 1834; Events from January to July, 1835; do. from July to December, 1835; Events of 1836; General Conference of 1836; Events of 1837; Events of 1838; Occurrences of 1839; Occurrences of 1840; General Conference of 1840; Events of 1841; Occurrences of 1842; Events of 1843; Events from January to May, 1844; Harding's Case; Case of Bishop Andrew; Review of Bishop Andrew's Case; Determined Separation on the part of the South—the Plan; the Protest and its Reply; Events succeeding the General Conference of 1844; do., continued; Action of the Northern Conferences; Action of the Southern Conferences; Conclusion of 1844; Bishop Soule; Position of Parties; Events preceding the Convention; the Convention; Review of the Convention; Bishops Soule and Andrew vs. the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Action of the Conferences in 1845 and 1846; Events from May, 1845, to May, 1846; the Petersburg General Conference; Review of do.; Secession of Bishop Soule Proved; Southern Bishops; Infractions of the Plan; Property Question; Church Property; Relation to Church Principles; Events previous to May, 1848; General Conference of 1848; do., continued; Events of 1848; Events of 1849; Southern General Conference of 1850; the Slavery Question in 1850; Events of 1850; the New York Suit; do., continued; Review of Judge Nelson's Decision; Outlines of the Cincinnati Law Case; the Chartered Fund; the Appeal Case; Conclusion. Then follows an Appendix, comprising some one hundred and fifty pages of important documents bearing upon the case. The work will be found clear in statement and faithful in narration. It is obviously the result of much painstaking and great labor. The Doctor seems to have fairly exhausted the subject, and to have embodied here all that will ever be needed to a correct understanding of one of the greatest events in modern times—the disruption of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. We should be glad to say more, but our space forbids it. Let the work go abroad.

PAST MERIDIAN. By Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 12mo. 239 pages.—We are indebted to the author for a copy of this work. The following outline of the chapters will give some indication of its contents: The A. M.'s and the P. M.'s; Old; Reporters; the Custody of Knowledge; the Beauty of Age; Air; Domestic Anniversaries; Patriotic Recollections; Accomplishments; Privileges of Age; Literary Longevity; Westering Sunbeams; About Money; the Amenities; the Pleasures of Winter; and A New Existence. Let the person on whose head gray hairs begin to predominate make this book his companion, and it will shed sunlight upon the whole period of his past meridian. Something of the beauty of its style and the interesting and instructive nature of its discourse may be gathered from a selection found in the preceding pages of this number. We have given one specimen; let us add another, which will explain itself:

"'The baby shall not be named after me,' said a young parent of his first-born, 'for it will be old John and young John, while I am yet in my prime.' 'I wish my son had not taken it into his head to marry so early,' said a lady in a remarkably fine state of preservation; 'for now, I suppose, it must be old Madam and young Madam.' The unmarried, whose recollections can bisect a century, are prone to be annoyed at the disposition to pry into dates, and are sure that no well-bred person would be guilty of such absurd curiosity.

"Yet to cover the tracks of time, and put family records out of the way, are of little avail. There will be here and there a memory stubbornly tenacious of chronological matters, and whoever labors to conceal his proper date will usually find some Argus to watch over and reveal it."

For sale by the booksellers generally.

PICTORIAL GATHERINGS is a charming volume for the young, recently issued by Carlton & Phillips, of New York. In it we have sketches and stories relating to the condition and customs of mankind, Christian missions, the habits of animals, and a variety of other matters—all accompanied with appropriate illustrations.

THE CHILD'S SABBATH DAY BOOK, and LITTLE FRANK HARLEY, are also illustrated books issued by the Sunday School Union, 200 Mulberry-street, New York.

GREATNESS IN LITTLE THINGS; or, Wayside Violets, is the title of a work "copy-righted" by D. Anderson, and published by Dayton & Wentworth, New York, and by H. M. Rulison, Cincinnati. Some one—we don't just now remember who—says that as he advanced in years he found his respect for those who have not succeeded in life increasing. That is, he found greatness in character where success had not emblazoned it forth and made it known to the world. The object of this pleasant and quite readable volume is to show that true greatness does not consist only in shining deeds of prowess, or in carrying out the schemes of a lofty ambition; but that it may be exhibited just as truly when performing, with modesty, firmness, and self-denial, that round of daily duties—those “little things” which may alike be found in the path of all. Such a work can not but exert a healthy influence.

FANNY GRAY: a History in a Series of Six Beautiful Figures, from Neo and Esquisite Designs, Printed in Oil-Colors, in the Highest Style of the Art. Accompanied by a Poetical Description. Boston: Crosby, Nichols & Co.—We have never seen more beautiful specimens of colored printing than these figures, and we take pleasure in recommending them to parents as a most instructive entertainment for their children.

EVENINGS WITH MY CHILDREN.—This is a fine work for children, got up in quarto form, printed in large type, on fine paper, and illustrated with appropriate engravings. The subjects of the “conversations” are some of the most interesting stories related by the evangelists, principally the parables and miracles of Christ. It is really a magnificent book for children, calculated both to please and profit. Cost with colored plates, $1.75; with plates not colored, $1.25. Carter & Brothers, New York; and Moore, Wilstach & Co., No. 25 West Fourth-street, Cincinnati.

PRECIOUS LESSONS FROM THE LIPS OF JESUS, is an elegant miniature volume, admirably adapted as “a Gift to my Christian Friend.” It does not need a better guarantee of its sterling interest and value than that it is from the pen of Rev. Daniel Wise. For sale at the Western Book Concern, as well as bookstores generally.

THE CHART OF LIFE: indicating the Dangers and Securities connected with a Voyage to Immortality. By Rev. James Porter, A. M. Boston: J. P. Jewett & Co., and also J. P. Mayes.—The author of this book is well known as the author of several books which he has heretofore given to the public. This work comprises eleven chapters, on the following general topics: Influence of Correct Principles: Danger from Skepticism; Our Susceptibilities and the Moral Forces of the Gospel; Necessary Precautions; Social Hindrances; the Great Concern; Social Relations; Influence Neutralized; Christian Activity Directed; the Duty of Benevolence; and Obligations of the Few. The number of books now published with special reference to young men, and the fact that they all, if they possess any value, meet with a ready sale, is a sign of the times full of cheering promise for the future. The points presented in this work are very clearly discussed, and illustrated by pertinent and striking anecdotes. It is just such a work as will do good in the hands of a young man. For sale by Swornstedt & Poe, at the Western Methodist Book Concern.

THE GREAT JOURNEY is an allegorical pilgrimage through the valley of tears to Mount Zion, the city of the living God. It is well calculated to catch the attention of children both on account of its illustrations and allegorical character. Published for the Sunday School Department by Carlton & Phillips, 200 Mulberry-street, New York.

Two books have recently been added to Mr. Abbott's popular Franconia stories; namely, AOXES and CAROLINE. They are not a whit behind their predecessors, and complete a series which both little and great children have admired over the whole country.

PERIODICALS AND PAMPHLETS.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW, for November, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton-street, New York, has as its list of contents for November, the Wonders of the Shore, a geological paper; Popular Education in Scotland; Milman's History of Latin Christianity; the Insolvable Problem, treating of the question, Can God be known by Man? or the Philosophy of the Infinite; Kaye's Life of Lord Metcalf; Sir H. Holland on Mental Physiology; Electro Biology; Annotated Edition of English Poets; William Cooper; and Progress and Prospects of the War. We regret that our limits preclude our analyzing or transferring portions of any of the articles to our columns. Any one of the four foreign Reviews will be supplied to subscribers by L. Scott & Co. at three dollars a year, or any one of the four Reviews and Blackwood's Magazine at $5 a year, or all of the Reviews and Blackwood for $10. Address the publishers, 79 Fulton-street, New York.

THE AMERICAN PHONETIC JOURNAL, by R. P. Prosser, presents a beautiful specimen of typography. Had we type “to fit,” we should be half inclined to give a few sentences to illustrate the proposed phonetic reform.

MINUTES OF THE NORTH INDIANA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.—Besides the ordinary conference statistics, we have here a detailed report of the missionary contributions. The largest individual donation noticed was $10, and that only in a single instance. Number of members, 17,415; probationers, 3,416; local preachers, 191; churches, 253—valued at $178,575; parsonages, 43—valued at $245.85, (is it not $24,585?) number of deaths, 245; collected for missions, $3,181.95; do. for Tract Society, $368.89; do. for American Bible Society, $178.93; do. for Sunday School Union, $85.86; number of Sunday schools, 341; number of scholars, 16,917.

MINUTES OF THE NORTH-WESTERN INDIANA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, Third Session.—The number of members is 12,759; probationers, 1,980; local preachers, 117; number of meeting-houses, 197—valued at $164,900; number of parsonages, 44—valued at $22,225; number of deaths, 44; collected for missions, $4,157.26; do. for Sunday School Union, $48.39; do. for American Bible Society, $92; do. for Tract Society, $173.86; number of Sunday schools, 192; number of scholars, 9,749.

CATALOGUE OF THE WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, for 1854, has been received. The present number of students is—seniors, 27; juniors, 20; sophomores, 39; freshmen, 37; total, 123. At the time of this writing, a vigorous effort is being made to secure an endowment of $100,000 for the University. This would place it at once on a firm and independent foundation. We trust it will succeed. From this catalogue we learn that since its commencement, in 1833, the degree of A. B. has been conferred on 499; A. M. on 354; D. D. on 33; LL. D. on 7. We trust that a long and prosperous career is before this, the mother of our colleges.

CATALOGUE OF GENESSEE COLLEGE.—We are indebted to our old friend, Dr. Cummings, for a catalogue of this flourishing institution. In the College department there are—seniors, 4; juniors, 8; sophomores, 16; freshmen, 31. In the Seminary department the number of gentlemen is 416; ladies, 414. Grand total, 889. The institution is righting up nobly from the effects of the late gale that swept over it.

Notes and Queries.

THE IMPORTANCE OF MAKING A NOTE.—We don't speak of making a note in music, but of noting down whatever valuable, beautiful, or interesting thought, fact, illustration, or anecdote occurs to us in our reading, or in conversation. Of the saying, "When found make a note of," a writer once said, no less truthfully than quaintly, it is a rule which should shine in gilt letters on the gingerbread of youth and the spectacle-case of age. Every one regrets and suffers who neglects it. There is some trouble in it, to be sure; but in what good thing is there not? Reading and writing men who act upon this rule for any considerable length of time will accumulate a good deal of matter in various forms, shapes, and sizes—some more, some less legible and intelligible—some unposted in old pocket-books—some on whole or half sheets, or mere scraps of paper and backs of letters—some lost sight of and forgotten, stuffing out old portfolios, or getting smoky edges in bundles tied up with faded tape or antiquated twine. No doubt there are countless boxes, and drawers, and pigeon-holes of such things which want looking into, and would well repay the trouble. Nay, we are sure the proprietors would find themselves much benefited by now and then looking over their own collections. How many important facts, how many striking and beautiful thoughts, how many quaint or apposite illustrations—that have occurred to us—have escaped away because we made not "note" of them as an invitation to stay with us? We say to all our literary friends, "WHEN FOUND MAKE A NOTE OF."

THE AUTHORSHIP OF "THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE."—All our readers will recollect this beautiful monody. But who was the author of it?

A good authority says "the undoubted author of it was Rev. Charles Wolfe, a young Irishman, curate of Donoughmore, who died 1823, in the thirty-second year of his age." In his "Life and Remains," not only is the authorship claimed for him, but the following anecdote related concerning it. Lord Byron, Shelley, and some others were engaged one day in an interesting discussion as to the most perfect ode that had ever been produced. Shelley contended for Coleridge's ode on Switzerland; others named Campbell's Hohenliinden and Lord Byron's Invocation in Manfred. But Lord Byron left the dinner-table before the cloth was removed, and returned with a magazine from which he read this monody, which just then appeared anonymously. After he had read it, he repeated the third stanza and pronounced it perfect, and especially the lines—

"But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him."

"I should take the whole," said Shelley, "for a rough sketch of Campbell's."

"No," replied Lord Byron, "Campbell would have claimed it had it been his."

Is it not singular that the author of so beautiful a poem should be scarcely known in the literary world as a poet? And yet his claim to the authorship of this monody, it is said, is fully established both by the Archdeacon of Cloghu, who edited his Life and Remains, and also by Rev. Dr. Miller, late Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin University, and author of Lectures on the Philosophy of Modern History.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE AND TIMES UPON THE TRUE END OF SPEECH, OR TALLEYRAND'S MOTTO.—Not long since the New York Tribune quoted the maxim, that "the true end of speech is not so much to express our ideas as to conceal them," and attributed it to Talleyrand. The Times, thereupon, joggled the literary recollections of its cotemporary, and the Tribune owned up that the maxim should have been credited to Oliver Goldsmith and not to Talleyrand. That Goldsmith expressed the idea is not doubted, and that Talleyrand acted upon it is evident from his whole life. But, we are inclined to think, the idea is older than either of them. An English journal quotes these two lines, written by Young, in allusion to courts:

"Where Nature's end of language is declined,
And men talk only to conceal their mind."

Voltaire also used the expression as early as 1763. In his satiric dialogue, La Chapon et la Poularde, where the former, complaining of the treachery of men, says, "Ne n'emploient les paroles que pour dignifier leurs pensées"—they do not use words unless to disguise their thoughts. So that it is probable Goldsmith caught the idea from Young, or, more likely, from Voltaire, as Goldsmith, at this date, was just embarking in his career as an author. We should not wonder if the maxim could be traced to a still earlier date, and, very likely, its origin lies farther back toward the origin of thought than we have means to explore.

MISQUOTATIONS.—Strange blunders and perversions often occur by misquotations, especially of the poets. The following is a very current quotation of a well-known couplet of Pope:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen."

The reader's memory will, no doubt, instantly substitute such hideous for "so frightful," and that for "as."

Sad work is also not unfrequently made, even in high literary quarters, with a well-known couplet of Moore, thus:

"You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang by it still."

Scents hanging by a broken vase! Our readers, we are sure, will agree with us that all the harmony and beauty of the sentiment is utterly destroyed by this misquotation, when we give them what Moore really did say, namely:

"You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will cling round it still."

Hanging is a harsh, unsuitable term, and smacks of the halter; but clinging round is at once expressive and in harmony with the sentiment.

THE ORIGIN OF THE WORD "GROG."—A funny subject for our note department, but yet not without its interest. It is an illustration of the mode in which many of our English words came into existence. Turning over the leaves of an old book, not long since, we stumbled upon the following account of the origin of this word. The old English Admiral Vernon was a great favorite with his sailors. In bad weather he was in the habit of walking the deck in a rough groggum coat; hence he obtained the nickname of Old Groggum or Old Grug among his jolly jack tars. While in command of the West India station, and at the height of his popularity, he had the spirits given to men mixed with water instead of leaving them to drink it raw. This beverage became very popular with the men, and, in honor of the Admiral, it was sur-named, by acclamation, "grog." May not the origin of this word account for the fact that it is even to the present time more generally used among sailors to designate that vile beverage than among landmen? We so think and believe.

IMITATIVE WORDS.—The Hottentots, according to Sir Thomas Roe, call their cows Boos, and their sheep Baas. Are not these beautiful instances of imitative words?

Can the English language furnish more striking ex-amples?

COMPARATIVE EFFECTS OF MEDICINE UPON MASTER AND SLAVES.—Thunberg, an old medical practitioner, instances the fact as a curious phenomena in his practice, that his medicines acted uniformly with greater efficacy and cer-tainty upon the slaves than upon their masters. Easily accounted for we should think. The constitutions of the slaves were not so much impaired by improper diet and high living as those of their masters. Then, also, the slaves were not accustomed to medication for slight ail-ments, and their bodies had not become habituated to the contents of the apothecaries shops.

Mirror of Apothegm, Wit, Repartee, and Anecdote.

HEATHEN NOTION OF BAPTISM.—One day a savage maiden being dead after she had been baptized, and the mother happening to see one of her slaves at the point of death also, she said, "My daughter is gone alone into the country of the dead among the Europeans, without relations and without friends. Lo, now is the spring-time; she must, therefore, sow Indian corn and gourds. Baptize my slave," added she, "before she dies, that she may go also into that country whither the souls of the Europeans, after their death, go, to the end she may serve my daughter there."

A PATRIARCH LOCATED.—A clergyman, preaching a sermon on a particular patriarch, was extremely high in his panegyric, and spoke of him as far excelling every saint in the calendar. He took a view of the celestial hierar-chy, but in vain: he could not assign to his saint a place worthy so many virtues as he possessed—every sentence ended thus:

"Where, then, can we place this great patriarch?"

One of the congregation, tired at last of the repetition, exclaimed:

"As I am going away, you may put him in my pew."

HOC INCIPIT.—Many very ancient works have no title-pages, but commence thus, Hoc incipit, etc. A gentleman of more ambition than capacity, coming into possession of such a volume, had it very handsomely bound, and caused it to be lettered thus, "Works of Hoc Incipit. Rome, 1490."

LETTING OUT A COAT AND VEST.—An Irish tailor, mak-ing a gentleman's coat and vest too small, was ordered to take them home and let them out. Some days after, the tailor told the gentleman that his garments happening to fit a countryman of his, he had let them out at a shilling per week.

GENIUS AND TALENT.—The most striking feature in the history of Genius, is its courage. Talent, on the con-trary, is distinguished chiefly by its caution. The one goes forth, totally regardless of its costume, under the impulse of a glorious presage. The other never suffers itself to be seen, till it has made its toilet, under the guidance of a becoming taste.—Simms.

A HINT TO THE MARPIED.—"I have heard," says Mr. Henry, "of a married couple, who, though they were both of a hasty temper, yet lived comfortably together by simply observing a rule on which they had mutually agreed, 'Never to be both angry together.'" And he adds, that an ingenious and pious father was in the habit of giving this advice to his children when they married:

"Doth one speak free, t'other with water come;
Is one provoked, be t'other soft and dumb."

A REASON FOR LONG SERMONS.—We apprehend a great many sermons, written as well as extempore, are made long because their authors are too lazy to condense their matter and make them short. There was once a clergy-man in New Hampshire noted for his long sermons and indolent habits. "How is it," said a man to his neigh-bor, "that Parson ———, the laziest man living, writes these interminable sermons?" "Why," said the other, "he probably gets to writing and is too lazy to stop."

DIED OF WANT.—The following epitaph would be ap-propriate for the monument of every miser:

Here, crumbling, lies beneath the mold,
A man whose sole delight was gold;
Content was never once his guest,
Though thrice ten thousand filled his chest.
For he, poor man, with all his store,
Died in great want—the want of more.

CURIOUS CHINESE PROVERBS.—The ripest fruit grows on the roughest wall. It is the small wheels of the carriage that come in first. The man who holds the ladder at the bottom is frequently of more service than he who is sta-tioned at the top of it. The turtle, though brought in at the area gate, takes the head of the table. Better be the cat in a philanthropist's family, than a mutton pie at a king's banquet. The learned pig didn't learn its letters in a day. True merit, like the pearl inside an oyster, is content to remain quiet till it finds an opening. The top strawberries are eaten the first. He who leaves early gets the best hat. Pride sleeps in a gilded crown: con-tentment in a cotton nightcap.

SHAKESPEARE ON COVETOUSNESS.—Master.—I marvel how the fishes live in the sea.

Fisherman.—Why as men do a-land: the great ones eat up the little ones. I can compare our rich misers to nothing so fitly as to a whale; 'a plays and tumbles, driv-ing the poor fry before him and at last devours them all at a mouthful. Such whales have I heard on the land, who never leave gaping, till they've swallowed the whole parish, church, steeple, bells, and all.

PHYSICAL AND MORAL COURAGE.—Physical courage, which despises all danger, will make a man brave in one way; and moral courage, which despises all opinion, will make a man brave in another. The former would seem most necessary for the camp, the latter for council; but to constitute a great man, both are necessary.—Colton.

THE PERFECTION OF CONVERSATION.—The perfection of conversation is not to play a regular sonata, but, like the Eolian harp, to await the inspiration of the passing breeze.—Burke.

CAPACITY OF BEING AGREEABLE.—Nature has left every man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are a hundred men sufficiently qualified for both who, by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.—Swift.

LONGINGS FOR REST.—

When I beheld this sickle, trustless state
Of vain world's glory, sitting to and fro,
And mortal men to're'd by troublous fate,
In restless seas of wretchedness and woe,
I wish I might this weary life forego,
And shortly turn unto my happy rest,
Where my free spirit might not any more
Be vex'd with sighs that do her peace molest.

OPINIONS OF PHILOSOPHERS UPON BEAUTY.—Socrates called beauty a short-lived tyranny; Plato, a privilege of nature; Theophrastus, a silent cheat; Theocritus, a delightful prejudice; Carneades, a solitary kingdom; Domitian said, that nothing was more grateful; Aristotle affirmed that beauty was better than all the letters of recommendation in the world; Homer, that 'twas a glorious gift of nature; and Ovid calls it a favor bestowed by the gods.

THE CRITERION OF TRUE BEAUTY.—The criterion of true beauty is, that it increases on examination; of false, that it lessens. There is something, therefore, in true beauty that corresponds with right reason, and is not merely the creature of fancy.

WHAT SHAKESPEARE SAYS OF BEAUTY.—

Beauty is but a vain and doubtful good,
A shining glass, that fadeth suddenly;
A flower that dies, when first it 'gins to bud;
A brittle glass, that's broken presently;
A doubtful good, a glass, a flower,
Lost, faded, broken, dead within an hour.

And as good lost, is said or never found,
As fading glass no rubbing will refresh,
As flowers dead, lie wither'd on the ground,
As broken glass no cement can redress,
So Beauty blemish'd once, forever's lost,
In spite of physic, palting, pain, and cost.

CURING BASHFULNESS.—As those that pull down private houses adjoining to the temples of the gods, prop up such parts as are contiguous to them; so, in undermining bashfulness, due regard is to be had to adjacent modesty, good-nature, and humanity.—Plutarch.

TWO KINDS OF BASHFULNESS.—There are two distinct sorts of what we call bashfulness: this, the awkwardness of a booby, which a few steps into the world will convert into the pertness of a coxcomb: that a consciousness, which the most delicate feelings produce, and the most extensive knowledge can not always remove.

A TURKISH PARABLE.—A traveler who spent some time in Turkey, relates a beautiful parable which was told him by a dervise, and which seemed even more beautiful than Sterne's celebrated figure of the accusing spirit and recording angel. "Every man," says the dervise, "has two angels, one on his right shoulder, and another on his left. When he does any thing good, the angel on his right shoulder writes it down and seals it, because what is done is done forever. When he has done evil, the angel on the left shoulder writes it down. He waits till midnight. If before that time the man bows down his head and exclaims, 'Gracious Allah! I have sinned, forgive me!' the angel rubs it out, and if not at midnight he seals it, and thereupon the angel on the right shoulder weeps."

DULL OF COMPREHENSION.—A gentleman traveling inside of a coach, was endeavoring, with considerable earnestness, to impress some argument on a fellow passenger, who was seated in the same vehicle, and who appeared rather dull of comprehension. At length, being slightly irritated, he exclaimed, "Why, sir, it's plain as A B C!" "That may be," quietly replied the other, "but I am D E F."

NAPOLEON'S RESPECT FOR THE APOSTLES.—Napoleon having entered one of the cities of Italy, the churchwardens recommended to him the relics of their church. "Sire, will you deign to take our apostles under your protection?" "Your apostles; are they of wood?" "No, sire." "Of what are they, then?" "Of silver, sire—of solid silver." "Solid silver!" replied Napoleon, quickly; "yes, I shall help them to fulfill their mission; it has been ordained that they should go throughout the world, and they shall." Having said so, the Emperor sent the twelve apostles to the mint at Paris.

RELIGIOUS TOLERANCE.—The noblest act ever put on a statute-book in the world is this drawn up by Roger Williams: "All men may walk as their conscience persuades them, every one in the name of God. And let the lambs of the Most High walk in this colony without molestation in the name of Jehovah, their God, forever and ever."

A QUICK REPARTEE.—Governor Morris, of New York, had a high respect for Bishop Moore, a man noted not only for the purity of his character, but also for the retiring modesty of his disposition, and for the general favor in which he was held. As the story ran: A dinner was given by some one of Governor Morris's friends when he was about departing for Europe. Bishop Moore and his wife were of the party. Among other things that passed in conversation, Mr. Morris observed that he had made his will in prospect of going abroad; and, turning to Bishop Moore, said to him:

"My reverend friend, I have bequeathed to you my whole stock of impudence."

Bishop Moore replied:

"Sir, you are not only very kind, but very generous; you have left to me by far the largest portion of your estate."

Mrs. Moore immediately added:

"My dear, you have come into possession of your inheritance remarkably soon."

WHAT WE WANT.—The following lines were found at the bottom of a vote for alderman at a late election in Boston:

Experience, that's stood the test;
Conscience, to say what's right;
Intelligence, to know what's best;
Backbone, to stand the fight.

CICERO.—The great Roman orator was one day sneered at by one of his opponents, a mean man of noble lineage, on account of his low parentage. "You are the first of your line," said the railer. "And you," replied Cicero, "are the last of yours."

Editor's Table.

LITERARY WOMEN OF AMERICA.—We commence in this number a series of articles which we trust will be both interesting and profitable to our readers. We give no promise to continue the series unbroken, but shall insert them as time and opportunity enable us to get them up. Nor can we promise that each one shall be accompanied by a portrait; but this will be done as frequently as possible—probably in most cases. On the whole, we hope to give our readers a pretty fair introduction to the "literary women of America." Among them will be some whose names are already as household words, but whose history and likeness will be all the more acceptable on that account. Young as our country yet is in literature and science, she already exhibits a noble catalogue of literary women—some of whom have won literary honors in the old as well as in the new world.

THE ENGRAVINGS for this number, we trust, will be more than acceptable.

Charleston is another of our city views. It—not the view, but the city—stands prominent among the cities of the south for its commercial and political importance, as well as for its population. As Paris is the "eye of France," so Charleston is "the eye" of South Carolina. The city is situated on a peninsula, formed by the confluence of Astley and Cooper rivers, which unite immediately below it, and form a spacious and convenient harbor. Seven miles south-east from the city, this harbor communicates with the ocean at Sullivan's Island, on which stands old Fort Moultrie. The city is slightly elevated, being only nine feet above the level of the harbor at high tides. It extends from Battery Point on the south northward some three miles, and is of an average width of one and a quarter miles. The principal street is sixty feet wide, and extends north and south through the city in a straight line. It is called Meeting-street. The cross streets run parallel to each other and at right angles to Meeting-street. They run east and west, and from Astley to Cooper rivers. The houses are generally constructed of wood, are kept well painted, and most of them have piazzas extending to the roof, tastefully arrayed with vines and creepers. Within a few years all the houses built within the city limits are required to be built of brick or stone. In the suburbs the houses are surrounded by gardens, planted with orange, peach, and other ornamental and useful trees, and a profusion of vines and shrubbery. Charleston was first settled in 1680. Its population in 1850 amounted to 42,985. There are thirty-five or forty churches in the city; Charleston College is located here, and also the Medical College of South Carolina. It is a great mart for cotton, rice, and tobacco; and connecting, as it does, with a vast interior region by the railroads which radiate from it, and with the ocean by its spacious harbor and bay, it can hardly fail to rise into still higher commercial importance. In a few years probably it will be connected with Cincinnati by a direct line of railroad, and through Cincinnati with all the vast north-west.

The Portrait of Mrs. Sigourney will furnish a study to those familiar with her writings. "The more I work on this head," said our artist while engraving, "the more character I discover in it." So would we say to our readers, here is a likeness to be studied, and studied, too, in connection with her literary history and works, if you would comprehend it. No one, however, can fail to discover lines of thought—we had almost said, of sadness. It always appeared to us that her literary productions seemed to possess a chastened melancholy, and yet hopeful and trustful spirit, which indicated a soul rising, through a divine faith, above some hidden sorrow. Now, from the likeness we receive the same impression. But, without further criticism, we will leave the likeness with our readers.

P. S. We were just about doing as we promised above, when a severely Puritanical friend inquired of us, "Why did you not have Mrs. Sigourney taken with long sleeves?" We answered, "Simply for the reason that she did not have long sleeves on when she was taken." We sought not a Quaker, nor a Presbyterian, nor a Methodist portrait; but a portrait just such as would give a fair and truthful representation of the original.

ARTICLES DECLINED.—We submit to the author of "Lines Addressed to my Mother," that work and earth do not exactly rhyme; neither do throne and song; neither do way and eternity, unless in the last word we understand the orthography of the last syllable to be as we have heard it pronounced—toy; that is, eternitay.

"A Fragment" has better rhyme than poetry.

"Mary at the Savior's Tomb" and "The Grave a Place of Rest" have not quite the merit we could wish.

"Autumnal Musings" are placed on file for their appropriate season; in the mean time we would like to hear from their author again.

May the author of "Forever" realize his hope of meeting the departed in "the better land!"

"A Vision of War" will not answer.

"The Mississippi" is evidently from an unpracticed hand; in its four stanzas, the word "roll" and "rolling" occurs no less than ten times.

"A Tale of Real Life" closes rather abruptly; but we have it under consideration.

"The Babe in Heaven to its Mother on Earth" is a beautiful conception, but is not very well sustained.

"Address to the Blind" is neither rhetorical nor grammatical; the orthography is also very bad.

"The World is Not a Dreary Waste" is written rather carelessly. We give the second stanza:

"This world is not a dreary waste,
Filled only with tempestuous strife,
Which darker grows, as on we haste,
Adown the troubled stream of life;
But after every cloud departs,
And naught remains of doubt and fear,
Hope's cheering smile illumines our hearts,
And all around is calm and clear!"

"Soliloquy" is too bombastic in style, and its figures are too far fetched. Let the author prune out the exuberant words of imagination, and still continue to exercise his pen.

"Reflections at the Grave of Edith" will hardly pass.

"Christ is All I Want" we shall also have to lay aside; it needs some pruning.

"Apostrophe to the Sun" and "Graves of the Sleeping"—each possess some excellences, but not enough to warrant their insertion.

"The Birth of Christ" has hardly poetic merit enough, but we would encourage the author to use her pen.

The authors of "Morning," and also "A Western Home," are too inexperienced, and need not a little exercise before they begin to write for the Repository.

Of the poem commencing, "'Tis autumn now," we insert just one quarter. Whatever may be said of its logic, it is the best quarter so far as poetry is concerned:

"If autumn would stay
Forever away,
And summer eternal abide,
No herbage would fade,
Nor carpet be laid
Of leaves all withered and dried."

EXCERPTS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.—A kind friend commends us after the following style:

"Mr. Editor,—Your 'slaughter of poems and poets' in the last number of the Repository was, I think, a happy 'lick,' if you will allow one so young and inexperienced to commend your labors and wisdom. Many a poor fellow who can make words jingle addles his mind with the idea that he is a poet, and spends his life 'grinding out' miserable doggerel. Happy, indeed, would it have been for him if his 'poetic genius' had been 'nipped in the bud.'"

Now, who would have thought that our friend who had so little sympathy with slaughtered poets should wind up by commending himself to our auto da fe?

"A Reader of the Repository" is "down upon" us in the following style:

"Dear Sir,—We have the delightful privilege of reading and receiving instruction from the Ladies' Repository. We think it the best magazine in the country, especially for the ladies. But in the last number—November number—we found one thing that we deem exceptionable, and would not recommend it in any literature, and much less in a work devoted to religion—and we mean the marrying of cousins, really or fictitiously. Now, we think the story or article entitled 'Now' one of affecting and thrilling interest. But to have that fine girl Grace Sewall marry her cousin just clips off some of the good of that article. But to have the unsullied pages of the Ladies' Repository disfigured thus, we don't like it; for we deem it corrupt literature, and will have the tendency to make the young fair girls, readers of the Repository, think there is no harm in it. Why, the Marys and Julias, Susans and Ettas—the warm-hearted, impulsive ones—will be marrying their handsome cousins—ay, and their grandfathers and uncles, by and by, too! Now, we know it is a sin—a sin against our moral and physical natures—to really marry a cousin, and we can see the direful effects of it in most any community. And when there is not the least reason to employ this sinful practice in a fictitious story, I think it better be abandoned as silly, if not sinful. Now, Mr. Editor, just tell your able correspondent not to mar the Repository and offend its readers by mixing up or mingling together consanguineous blood by affinity."

Now, all you who are inclined to marry cousins, take warning and desist—or, at least, pay a good fee to the officiating clergyman.

N. B. We directed our printer not to follow the beautiful orthography of our correspondent, lest it might seem to be a reflection upon the inaccuracies of Noah Webster.

MISCELLANY.—Quill Pens.—The editor of the New York Mirror lately published a most lugubrious "Lament over the epidemic of steel pens." A few days thereafter he was greeted with a beautiful casket of genuine quill-pens prepared for use, and accompanied by the following sonnet from Mrs. Sigourney:

"Pens to a poet! Give the sage Lone cell and philosophic page—
Give for the merchant's toil and pain
The weekly balance-sheet of gain—
Give to the warrior, clarion-cry,
And shouting host, and victory—
Give to the miser, in his hold,
The secret sound of ringing gold—
Give to the statesman power and place—
To the lover, give his lady's grace—
But give the poet pens for use
Plucked from the pinions of a goose,
And he shall teach you flights sublime
No wing of bird hath dared to climb."

Incidents of the Money Panic in Cincinnati.—The present winter was ushered in with a great financial panic. All the banks seemed to be "going by the board;" and those who were so unfortunate as to have any money, and especially those who were so doubly unfortunate as to have their money deposited in the banks, were in great excitement. The painfully depressing scene that ensued in "the Wall-street of Cincinnati," when thousands of depositors were literally blocking up the street in front of the banking-houses that were barred against them, was somewhat enlivened by incidents—some ludicrous, others painful, but all of them instructive. We have gleaned a few of them:

A person known for his miserly propensities drew some hundreds out of the Central Bank. Some were persuaded him that the notes he had obtained were not safe, and already rumors were current that the banks which had issued them were about suspending. He was further told that some well-known pickpockets had been watching him, and that he had better look out or he would be knocked down and robbed. As may be supposed, this news harassed him very much, and after sauntering about an hour or two, with the money tightly clutched in both hands, he again deposited it in the bank.

About noon one day a man was seen hurriedly approaching one of the suspended banks. He wore no coat, the sleeves of his "check-shirt" were rolled up to the elbows, his face was covered with iron-dust, and he bore every appearance of being one of those ever-busy, toiling mechanics, whose every cent is earned by the sweat of the brow. Approaching the bank-door he was stopped by a policeman.

"Can I not get in?" he asked.

"No, sir—the bank is closed," was the reply.

"Closed!" he exclaimed, while his heart throbbed with heavy beats. "Gentlemen, this is too bad. For twenty years have I been toiling hard to get a home; but the harder I work, the farther I am from accomplishing my desire. The savings of five years I was swindled out of by a pretended friend, and now the savings of fifteen years are lost in this concern. Can a working man be protected in any way?"

A circular was placed in his hands, setting forth why the bank had suspended, and assuring depositors that they would be paid, principal and interest, in full. He sat down and read it carefully, shook his head as if he thought the statement all sham, and left as hurriedly as he came.

"This is a burning shame!" exclaimed a young man, on Third-street, in the afternoon. "I work honestly for my living, and I ought to be honestly paid. Saturday night I drew thirty dollars from my employers, and here it is, [showing thirty dollars in Circleville paper,] not worth fifty cents on the dollar to-day. Is not this downright robbery, willful plunder? The working men have no rights now, but, like sheep, must lay down and be shorn at the will of their masters, the capitalists."

"Don't block up my door, gentlemen," said a broker to the crowd listening to the above.

"Block up your door?" continued the young man. "It would be better for the people if all shaving-shops like yours were blocked up, so that no one could enter." Laughter all around.

A young man, during the run on T. B. Goodman & Co.'s bank, drew out of the said bank one hundred and thirty-five dollars. While standing in the crowd listening to what was said in regard to monetary affairs, and boasting of being successful in drawing his money, some member of the light-fingered gentry robbed him of his roll of money, leaving him worse off than he was before.

One day a rag-gatherer made his appearance at the door of one of the closed banks. Finding he could not gain admission, he gave way to the most violent expressions of grief. One would suppose from his appearance that he was not worth a dime in the world; but, displaying his account-book to an individual who attempted to console him, it was discovered that he had several hundred dollars on deposit. Last winter this same individual applied to the poor authorities for relief, and owing to his extreme poverty was supplied with fuel.

Speak not Harshly.—The genial and beautiful sentiment expressed in the following stanzas we commend to all:

"Speak not harshly—much of care
Every human heart must bear;
Enough of shadows darkly lie
Valled within the sunniest eye.
By thy childhood's gushing tears,
By thy griefs of after years,
By the anguish thou dost know,
Add not to another's woe.

Speak not harshly, much of sin
Dwelleth every heart within;
In its closely covered cells
Many a wayward passion dwells.
By the many hours misspent,
By the gifts to errors lent,
By the wrongs thou didst not shun,
By the good thou hast not done,
With a lenient spirit scan
The weakness of thy fellow-man."

God of my Mother.—Rev. Charles Morgan, of East Troy, Wisconsin, in giving an account of a religious revival in that place, says: "An infidel of talent and respectability, under the power of truth, bowed upon his knees, and cried in agony, 'God of my mother, have mercy on me!' His mother is a devoted Christian in the state of New York." "God of my mother!" How much is revealed in that simple exclamation! how conclusively it proves that this man had a mother whose faithfulness left its impress on his soul too deep to be obliterated by time and sin!

Intermediate State of the Dead.—Our acknowledgments are due to the editor of the "Bible Examiner" for the several numbers of that work containing a review of our articles upon the "Intermediate State of the Dead," in the May and June numbers of the last volume. The reviewer applies himself lustily to the work of upsetting what he considers the monstrous doctrines of those articles. He employs criticism, reason, and also a little of what appears to us to be nonsense; sometimes he is grave, and sometimes he is facetious. In the main, however, it is an honest, candid, and earnest review. We have but little comment to make upon it; indeed, we believe we will make no comment on it at all. The articles have gone through the fire so bravely that we will just leave them to their fate. It will, we opine, be a long time before the Christian world, with an open Bible in their hands, will be brought to receive the revolting doctrine, that the soul dies with the body, and is in utter unconsciousness from death till the resurrection.

By the way, we are not a little gratified that those articles have been a source of religious comfort, as well as a means of clearer insight and of stronger confirmation to a large number of persons. More than a dozen letters, as well as other indications, have been a pleasing evidence of this.

STAY GENE.—A good conscience is sometimes sold for money, but never bought with it. . . . Be slow to choose a friend, and slower to change him; be courteous to all. . . . Do good and throw it into the sea; if the fishes don't know it, God will.—Turkish Proverb. . . . More flies are caught with a drop of honey than by a hoghead of vinegar.—Id. . . . Wear your learning, like your watch, in a private pocket, and don't pull it out to show that you have one; but if you are asked what o'clock it is, tell it. . . . Love of children is always the indication of a genial nature, a pure and unselfish heart. . . . Never make that man your friend who hates bread, music, or the laugh of a child.—Lawater. . . . He that has never known adversity is but half acquainted with himself or with others. . . . Many a fool has passed for a clever man, because he has known how to hold his tongue; and many a clever man has passed for a fool, because he has not known how to make use of it. . . . The fireside is a seminary of infinite importance; it is important because it is universal, and because the education it bestows, being woven in with the woof of childhood, gives form and color to the texture of life.

OUR PROSPECTS.—Not our personal prospects, dear reader, but the prospects of the Repository were never brighter than at the present moment. The subscriptions are coming in nobly—far in advance of last year even. At the Depository in Chicago no less than three thousand—an increase of four hundred on last year—were ordered before the close of December, with a good prospect of several hundred more. Our brethren in that region really seem determined to rival New York in this respect. Well, it rejoices us to know that the Repository is so firmly intrenched in the hearts of the people that even the "hard times" can not dislodge it. We believe, too, that our brother ministers have never before exerted themselves so efficiently in its behalf. It affords unbounded pleasure to say this, and to express our gratitude for this interest.

But, brethren, friends every-where, you have been over the field once, and have gathered a noble harvest; but now, will you not glean a little? We want TWENTY THOUSAND—nothing short of twenty thousand subscribers; so that our stout old conservators of financial affairs—Swormstedt & Poe—may have no occasion to grumble at our enlargement and improvements. What say you, friends—shall the TWENTY THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS be made up?

STATE OF RELIGION.

BY BISHOP MORRIS.

THE religious affairs of the country, in their general aspect, though not such as could be desired, are sufficient to encourage effort. While some indications are discouraging, others inspire hope.

Among the systems of avowed opposition to the cause of Christ is open infidelity, in its diversified forms, which recently has assumed a degree of presumption and recklessness in its modes of attack seldom, if ever, known before in these United States. No longer careful to conceal its deformity under the habiliment of "philosophy, falsely so called," it unblushingly intrudes itself through the press, by popular lectures, and even in the witless form of Anti-Bible conventions. Thus its votaries not only reject the counsel of God, and deny the Lord that bought them, but glory in their shame. They are mostly foreigners, who brought their principles with them, and are as far from being loyal citizens as good Christians; for they aim to destroy those Bible principles which lie at the foundation of our civil institutions. By their inglorious warfare upon Christianity and the free institutions founded thereon, they assume an awful responsibility, and soon or late must meet it. But we trust that the Bible and our country will both live long after their names, with the records of their folly, shall have been blotted from the annals of time.

Another system of error, which makes a very formidable resistance to the kingdom of Christ and to the authorized means of its extension, is Popery, the "man of sin" and "son of perdition," which embodies an incredible amount of ignorance, credulity, and superstition. And though, perhaps from mere policy, it evidently assumes its mildest and least objectionable form in these United States, nothing but the want of power, it is believed, restrains it from all the wonted excesses of violence pertaining to it in Papal countries. In the mean time its crafty propagators even here are vigilantly using all the means they can command to deceive and proselyte the young and the simple-hearted, and to some extent are successful. If they opposed the sinful practices of their adherents, as zealously as they do the Bible and its saving principles, they would deserve to be encouraged; but unfortunately their religion seems to produce no reformation in morals, but rather to confirm its subjects in vicious habits. A tree is known by its fruit, and a man's religion by his conduct. Foreigners sent here from Papal countries often disturb the repose of quiet citizens by uproar and tumult; and though they know not wherefore they are come together, yet they are ready to smite with the fist of wickedness any citizens whom they regard as heretics. But this system, rotten at the core, is tottering to its fall, and will have an end. Its days are well nigh numbered. No doubt the man of sin will die hard, and linger for a time in his death-struggle; but we confidently expect the fulfillment of Paul's prediction: "Then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming," 2 Thessalonians ii, 8.

These two systems of organized opposition to the truth—infidelity and Popery—so congenial to the moral depravity and natural ignorance of man, coming between the unconverted masses of people and the pure Gospel of Christ, drive too many of them into a state of bewildered skepticism, and thus bar them out of the kingdom of God, which is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. This remark, however, applies more to foreigners among us than to American citizens.

The people generally are plentifully supplied with a fictitious and ungodly literature, calculated to increase and perpetuate their alienation of heart from God, so that the more they read of it the less they know of it, or care to know, of what is most essential to their everlasting welfare. By this means the fountains of spiritual and social life are poisoned, and the young especially have many temptations spread out before them to throw off the restraints of religion, and to participate in such worldly amusements as are found at the circus or theater, the halls of comical exhibition, or the silly dance.

But, after all, perhaps the greatest obstacle to the progress of saving truth among us at present exists in the all-absorbing pursuit of worldly gain. Wealth is the idol of the age, the patron of pride, that pampers the love of ease, luxury, and display; of travel for mere sight-seeing, and resort to places of fashionable vice; all which tend to mental dissipation, and are ruinous to experimental and practical godliness. And the inordinate love of gain is the sin of the age, the sin that besets a larger class of our citizens, and interferes more with their relative duties to God and man than any other. "But they that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition," 1 Timothy vi, 9. The recent explosion of banking institutions, with the terrible shock experienced in every department of business, is a signal rebuke to the spirit of speculation and general extravagance of the country; respecting which the chief cause of regret is, that the innocent must suffer with the guilty. May this reproof of a wise and merciful Providence influence many to consider their ways, and turn their feet to the testimonies of the Lord!

Such are some of the difficulties with which the American Churches have to contend in evangelizing the nation, and there are others too tedious to name. In our own denominational affairs there are no unusual obstacles of a general nature to the progress of the work, but only such as are common to all Churches. No visible cause of division exists, and no unpleasant controversy agitates our connection or threatens its peace, except the proposed new term of membership, which affects our influence and our prospect of usefulness injuriously, in the conferences embracing slaveholding territory, and in those sympathizing with them. Upon this unpleasant and delicate subject, in this connection, we can only say to all concerned, as Joseph said to his brethren, "See that ye fall not out by the way." One hasty, unadvised step in the premises might lead to results to be long deplored. The maxim, "United we stand, divided we fall," applies as well to ecclesiastical as to civil bodies. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

On the other hand, there are favorable indications, as to the general state of religion, sufficient to inspire hope and encourage effort. Among them the following may be briefly referred to: The augmented and still accumulating power of the religious press to supply the people with Bibles and wholesome religious publications, in such quantities and on such terms as to bring them within the reach of all classes, is a fact of very great interest among all the friends of Christian benevolence. The increasing liberality of Christians in multiplying houses of worship, in founding and sustaining institutions of learning on Christian principles, and in establishing and supporting Gospel missions, domestic and foreign, is also a fact of similar importance and encouragement to the one last named.

Another favorable circumstance exists in the increasing attention to the religious training of the rising generation, especially by juvenile publications and Sabbath school instruction; to all which should be added, on an extended scale, catechising by parents and ministers. The religious education of children is the most reliable means of drying up the sources of infidelity and error, with their streams of practical vice, and of retaining them in after life to be useful members of their respective Protestant Churches. And another inducement to this work of piety is, the easiest way of access to the hearts of parents, in many cases, is through their beloved children.

All of these modes of operation, however, with their kindred benevolent institutions, are but auxiliaries to the regular ministry of the Gospel, the great system ordained of God to save the souls of men, and which, to some considerable extent, is accomplishing his benevolent purpose. Great and effectual doors are open to preach the Gospel in our own country—to say nothing of other lands—both among foreign emigrants and native citizens. And the progress which the Gospel is making among both classes is highly encouraging.

There are revivals of religion from year to year, sufficient in number, extent, and power to justify the conclusion, that the Holy Spirit still pervades our Protestant Churches, working repentance unto life and salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, changing the hearts and reforming the lives of multitudes of people, and that our Lord is still faithful to his promise, "Lo, I am with you." These revival scenes are indispensable to strengthen the hands and comfort the hearts of ministers and private Christians, to fill our Churches with spiritual worshipers, to multiply converts to Christ, and to extend his peaceful reign over the hearts of rebellious sinners, and bring them to the obedience of faith and the enjoyment of his salvation.

Genuine revivals of the work of God are best promoted by a proper use of the means of his own appointing—such as a faithful exhibition of the plain, practical truths of the Gospel; a regular attention to the sacraments, baptism, and the Lord's supper; public prayer and praise, with reading the holy Scriptures in the congregations; faithful pastoral visitation; punctual attendance at the social meetings of the Church, for the promotion of Christian experience and the communion of saints; together with family and private devotion; and also, when occasion requires, a faithful but prudent administration of moral discipline upon the incorrigibly delinquent. Relying upon the God of our fathers in the stated use of these means, with the spirit of prayer and faith, and in the use of extraordinary and protracted efforts under corresponding circumstances, and proving ourselves personally faithful to our holy calling, we may confidently expect the rich blessings of his saving grace in a plentiful harvest of souls. In our own Church we have for some years past been favored, not with a very large, but steady increase of members and ministers, a large proportion of whom appear to be well endued with the spirit of the Gospel, and earnestly pressing to the mark of holiness, for the prize of eternal life. Various speculations have gone forth respecting the late increased demand for ministers, most of which are groundless. To us, who have surveyed the work generally, it is evident that our deficiency of laborers arises, not so much from a reduced number of candidates for the ministry, as from the multiplication of ministerial charges and open doors to new and inviting fields of Gospel enterprise; which we regard as a fact highly encouraging. Upon the whole, we do not know any reason why the course of our glorious Methodism should not be onward, and still onward, with a wider range, a deeper influence, and an increased momentum, till it shall have accomplished the object of its mission—the spread of Scriptural holiness over all lands. May the Lord hasten it in his time! Amen.

PICTURES OF LIFE.

BY FRÉDÉRIC FAINE.

MORNING.

"Do what he will, he can not realize
Half he conceives—the glorious vision flies;
Go where he may, he can not hope to find
The truth, the beauty, pictured in his mind."

"My eyes make pictures when they are shut:
I see a fountain large and fair,
A willow and a ruin'd hut,
And thee, and me, and Mary there.
O Mary! make thy gentle lap our pillow;
Bend o'er us like a bower, my beautiful green willow."

THE mind of man is artistical. It has its poetry, its paintings, its sculpture. It draws its materials from the deep recesses within and the extended universe without. It ascends the loftiest mountains, and walks amid the most distant stars, gathering into its treasure-house their varied beauties. From the marble and granite of earth it rears within its walls temples and palaces of architectural beauty; carves statues with more than Pygmalion skill, breathing into them its spiritual life, shedding over them its inward light, till they move, speak, and live. It unrolls the annals of the past, retouching with its warm pencil scenes grown cold and dim by the lapse of years. It transfers the changing present into its image-chambers, and sketches in bold perspective the shadowy future. Thus it has its own studios, and galleries filled with the pictures and images which imagination forms from its own creations, or memory traces from the scenes of life and nature.

It requires the hand of a Guido and a Shakespeare, a Dante and a Raphael, to embody these living pictures in words, to transfer these breathing images on canvas, or rear these architectural buildings into tangible forms. Yet are they daily developed in the drama of life, rendering it at once poetry and painting. The bold conceptions which the pencil can not portray, the burning thoughts that language can not clothe, are stereotyped in deeds. Some active principle, absorbing passion, or conflicting interest gives an impetus to action, and life presents to us scenes grand in their design, brilliant in their coloring, powerful in their execution; while its still, quiet pictures are frequently more thrilling, touching, beautiful.

"Life is to us a battle-field,
Our hearts a holy land."

It was winter—and winter in New England, the remembrance of which has not melted away beneath a southern residence. Early had this monarch of the year assumed his regal power, and spread over nature his wintery armor. Mountains and valleys were clothed in helmets of frost and draperies of snow; torrent, lake, and river were hushed in silence beneath his icy seal.

While Nature, robed in the court-dress of her sovereign, lay thus impassive yet beautiful at his feet, his kingly scepter was extended over the mind and heart, and all who touched it lived. It imparted vigor and activity to the mental powers; changed the latent heat of the social virtues and tender charities of life into sensible, whose genial warmth pervaded the moral atmosphere of our world.

The morning was clear and cold in the month of February, 18—. A hot breakfast of coffee, rolls, and numerous other substantialia, which never fail to grace a New England table, had strengthened the outer being, relaxing the nerves of its physical system, which the extreme cold had drawn up to their highest tension. A grate of burning anthracite was diffusing its heat throughout the parlor, giving it an agreeable summer temperature; books, work, friendly words, and more friendly looks, all invited to a fireside lounge instead of exercise in the open air.

I hesitated, when the merry tinkling of sleigh-bells, the quick footsteps crushing the frozen snow, the glad laugh of childhood without, and, above all, the still small voice within, reminding me of duties to be performed beyond my own family circle, decided me. Throwing on my winter wrappings, in a few moments I was breathing the keen, frosty air, and feeling its invigorating influence, in the streets of P.

It was one of Winter's richest gala days, when, it would seem, he had disrobed himself of his gorgeous apparel, and taken every gem and jewel from his kingly diadem to adorn the cold but fair form of Nature. I paused in the broad opening of — street, to take in the scene, which, far as the eye could reach, was spread out before me, closing on one side by a blue line of hills—on the other by the still deeper blue of the ocean, the voice of whose many waters was distinctly heard.

The bright skies poured forth their fullest light around the far-off mountain-tops, over the leafless forest, the open country, and crowded city. Earth in her robes of whiteness, the glittering roofs and spires, the shining atmosphere of silvery net-work, gave back each dazzling glance to the clear heavens. The trees waved their crystallized branches and pendant brilliants in the sunlight; and the islands—emeralds in the greenness of summer—were now pearls in the crystal bosom of the bay, which lay as unmoved by its own deep heavings as it was impervious to the dashing oar.

The cold would not suffer me to delay. The hum of busy existence fell upon my ear; and as I passed along, I found the dwellers of this crystallized world eager and earnest in the development of life in all its varied forms and pursuits. Here were gay parties in open sleighs, already commencing the pleasures of the day; there the lawyer, with his green bag, was hurrying to the courts; the merchant to his counting-room or the 'Change; children, whose cheeks glowed and fingers tingled with the cold kisses of the morning air, skipping joyfully along to their school-rooms; the markets swarming with buyers and sellers; messengers, cloaked and hooded, passing to and fro, on errands of business and mercy, through the thronged streets.

I threaded my way, giving and receiving many a friendly greeting, till I arrived at a humble dwelling, which for more than a half century had been the Widow's Home. I entered a small room. Beside the warm fire sat the grandmother, the mother, the daughter, and prattling grandchild. The old lady held her knitting in her hand; before her lay the open Bible, which she was reading aloud to her daughters, who were silently plying their needles, while the little girl played by their side.

Their countenances were expressive of patient endurance, quiet resignation, and cheerful hope. There was even an expression of meek triumph in the eyes of the aged one, as she raised them from the word of life, as if she rejoiced that with her the contest was nearly over, the victory almost won; while the suffering, subdued looks of the youngest showed it had only commenced with her, and time had but partially healed the deep wounds of her heart. They were widows.

"Bless me!" exclaimed each kind voice, "you here, my dear Miss —, this cold winter morning!"

"Yes, I am here this delightful, bright morning. Came to see how you are; come to warm my heart among you—"

"Right glad are we to see you; but here, sit down and warm your feet."

And I found myself in the warmest corner of their perfectly neat and well-arranged apartment.

"It is unnecessary for me to inquire, my dear Mrs. Crosby, how you are getting on this long winter, for I perceive you are comfortable."

"O yes," replied she, "so many kind friends has our heavenly Father blessed us with. To be sure, in the fall it did look dark; Susan's great affliction, grandmother's increasing weakness, the little one's sickness, all pressed upon us. But I knew even then we should be sustained; that He who had so often taken from us our earthly props would not leave nor forsake us. We have not trusted in vain. How many helps we have had! Our dear pastor has not only poured the wine and the oil of the blessed Gospel into our sorrowing hearts, but he has ministered to our temporal wants. He gave us money. As I placed it in my purse, 'This is good seed,' said I to Susan; 'our purse will not be empty this winter.' Even so. A plenty of work, the kindness of friends, or, rather, the goodness of God, has made it unto us like the meal and oil of the woman in Scripture." The good woman's gratitude made her eloquent; and what eloquence surpasses that which flows from a grateful heart!

One of the most interesting features of life is woman—her position and its relations, her character and its results. Her physical organization and natural instincts place her in dependence, from which flows all those social endearing ties that receive their authority alike from nature and revelation. The weaker vessel, her station on the waters of life is by the side of the stronger, to whom she looks up for support and defense as they buffet together the stormy waves; while her quick perceptions, active energy, power of endurance, and watchful tenderness render her, in the emphatic language of Scripture, a helpmeet. Sometimes, in the providence of God, the stronger one, with sails full set, in all the might and strength of manhood, is suddenly wrecked, and her little bark is left to struggle by itself on the wide waste.

Thus had it been with this humble family. They were associated with my earliest recollections. When quite a child, a friend, in one of her frequent visits, took me to the "Widow's Home." The grandmother, mother, and three children were its inmates. They were invalids; appeared sick and suffering; but I remember the song of praise and thanksgiving was then on their lips. On going out my friend exclaimed, with suppressed emotion, "Never did a door close upon such suffering, good, and happy hearts!" I wondered. I could not then perceive the connection between goodness, happiness, and suffering.

Their history is neither strange nor new in the annals of domestic life. The maturity and old age of the grandmother had passed in the loneliness of widowhood. She struggled with its poverty and its sorrows, but, with a believing, hopeful heart, rested on Him who is the widow's God and the Father to the fatherless; and her home, like her own bosom, was filled with peace and joy.

In this home a daughter grew up to womanhood, married, and removed from its sheltering roof. A few brief years of happiness succeeded, and she returned stricken, bereaved. The husband of her youth, the father of her children, was cut down by the hand of death, leaving to his offspring no earthly heritage than his prayers and Christian example. With these rich treasures garnered in her heart, and her helpless infants, she sought again the maternal roof, where she found practical use for the beautiful lessons of patience, faith, and hope she had seen exemplified by her mother in her long years of widowhood.

That mother welcomed her with all the love and sympathy of one who felt the measure of her grief, and knew its remedy. They had passed through the same ordeal of affliction, and were sustained by the same faith and hope. United by affection and suffering, their lives mingled into one stream, which flowed silently onward in its humble course, occasionally agitated by the rough winds of earth, but also enlivened by its sunbeams. There yet remained to them objects of tender love and anxious solicitude—their children, one son and two daughters, for whom they toiled, and whose hands they taught to labor, and hearts to love and pray.

The son grew up, strong and manly; his heart full of filial and fraternal affection, and his mind endowed with right purposes and firm principles. He was a sailor; and if his frequent absences cast their shadows on that happy home, his return brought joy and gladness, with many substantial proofs of his thoughtful care.

The daughters were affectionate and industrious. The eldest, finding the labors of the needle injurious, it was proposed she should prepare herself for a teacher. Full of aspirations for improvement and affectionate desires to relieve her mother and grandmother from the heat and burden of the day they had borne so long, she entered school and applied herself to books with the utmost diligence. Her brother gave her pecuniary assistance. His proud heart swelled with gratification, as he marked her rapid progress; and his eyes filled with inexpressible tenderness as they rested upon her young face.

The winter was severe and inclement, but no storms prevented Mary from attending school. The exposure was too much for her delicate frame. Repeated colds terminated in a cough and other symptoms, which indicated the approach of that ruthless destroyer—consumption.

Her mother and grandmother watched each incipient step of the disease with fear and trembling. The young girl herself was full of hope. Spring would bring health, and her brother, with all her bright anticipations of future usefulness. The mother smiled through her tears, and said, gently, "My daughter, you are now in the school of suffering and disappointment, preparatory to a home of rest and peace. Is the thought of your removal thither painful?"

"Not painful to me, mother—only for you. I would still live for you—and I shall. Am I not better to-day? When George returns, his presence will make me well. Rest is not for the young; and peace—surely, in this school of suffering, there is peace—the peace which our blessed Savior left to his followers on earth."

The son and brother was expected home in a few days. Every eye brightened in that little household, and new strength was imparted to the invalid. But, alas! a silent messenger alone—a letter—brought the tidings of his death!

It were vain to speak of the sorrow of those sorrowing hearts. Its dark folds lay heavily upon their crushed spirits, and could only be lifted by the Hand which had suffered it to fall. And that Hand, which never withholds its aid from the suffering children of earth, put forth its strength to support them under present, and prepare them for future trials.

As light broke in upon their darkness, they perceived all they had lost, and all they were to lose. The shock was too great for the enfeebled frame of the sister, and they girded up their minds, by faith and prayer, for the conflict. She sank rapidly. In a few weeks she breathed out her spirit in the arms of her mother, and the widows were left in their home with their only remaining child.

They were bereaved, but not desolate. They looked upward, where God and their treasures were, and around, and found there were duties to be performed and blessings still to be enjoyed on earth. In meek resignation they prepared themselves to suffer and to do the will of their heavenly Father.

Time passed on; their daughter married, but continued to cheer them with her presence. They were happy in her happiness, when death again entered their dwelling. Her husband was the victim, and the tears of the widow and orphan again flowed in their midst.

As I sat by their fireside, and this picture passed before me, with all its lights and shadows, I felt how various the moral discipline of life. On some the chastening rod falls in open daylight, awakening the sympathy of all minds; while others receive it in the secret chambers of their hearts, and wrestle alone with sorrows that a stranger intermeddles not with. The results of this discipline were before me—the development of Christian life—the formation of Christian character, in its full and fair proportions—and I went out with faith and hope strengthened.

NOON.

"Life is before ye!" and as now ye stand
Eager to spring upon the promised land,
Fair smiles the way where yet your feet have trod
But few light steps upon a flowery sod;
Round ye are youth's green bowers."

Life is a reality. Its features are constantly changing, yet they leave their impress upon its surface—now in light, shadowy lines; then in those darker, heavier ones, which deepen till every lineament is distinct, complete, and you see and feel its truth.

As I returned, I found a winter's noon was not less life-stirring than its morning. My homeward steps were staid by a gentle rap on a window, a bright face gleaming through geraniums and rose-trees, and a hand holding up some orange flowers. The door opened.

"O do come in," said a sweet voice, "do come in, and aid me in arranging these flowers for my hair. Are they not beautiful?"

"Beautiful, indeed," I replied, looking at the rich braids of dark hair, which were wound gracefully around her head.

"And they have given me so much trouble to procure them."

"What, your hair?" I asked.

"O, no, not my hair," said she, laughing and blushing, "but these buds and blossoms. Are they not perfect?"

"Perfect! yes."

"But you are not looking at them."

I was not. My eyes rested upon the youthful being before me—the image of young happiness.

"You are just the one," she continued, "I have been wishing for all the morning. 'Give me your severe taste upon this paraphernalia we have here,' ushering me into a room where sat her mother quietly sewing amid dresses, ribbons, and laces.

"Do tell me," exclaimed I, "what all this means! Is Clara to be married?"

"No, no, not married myself, but the next thing to it. My friend Martha is to be married to-night; I am to be bridesmaid, and Edward is—" Her eyes fell beneath mine; she did not finish. I divined why it was the next thing.

"Now, dear friend, I wish you to decide the momentous question, between this, [holding up a rich white satin,] my father's present, and that, [pointing to a simple muslin,] mother's gift. Mother says the satin in compliment to father's taste. You know her old-fashioned notions of deference to the supreme head. I prefer the muslin, thin, light—light as my own free heart, upon which the folds of the satin would press too heavily."

"This once, dear Clara," I replied, "only this once, I must decide against the graver judgment of your grave mother, in favor of the light muslin and your lighter self. Leave satins till the cares of life enable you to support their weight with dignity."

"Thank you, thank you. Long will it be ere I shall be obliged to incase myself in such stiff robes. Do you know I am very unbelieving in the cares of life? Life is bright, beautiful—it is enjoyment."

"Yes, a holiday, no doubt," said I, "just as long as the sunlight of the soul is clear—"

"But when that is darkened by sorrow, my child, what will it be?" interrupted the fond mother, whose whole soul seemed gushing forth in the looks of love, which rested upon the bright personification of life before us.

"Still beautiful, mother," said the young girl, kneeling and resting her head upon her mother's lap, "if it has that faith in God, that love to man, and hope of heaven, you have taught me here to feel and to know."

A mother's love! who can describe its power to will and to do—its capacity to suffer and to enjoy? It welcomes us on the threshold of existence, and continues with us through its whole pilgrimage. Our infancy is cradled beneath the shadow of its wings, our childhood revels in its sunbeams, our youth is guided by its watchful care, and our maturer years are cheered by its unchanging sympathy. Who can measure its depth or estimate its strength when it expands itself over a large circle, much less when it is concentrated on one, who has nestled alone in its bosom, and drank alone of its deep well-springs?

Clara was an only child. In her were centered all the hopes of a proud father and tender mother. She had been to them a new existence—a second life—which, developing itself beneath their paternal care and love, had become the whole of life, uniting the past, the present, and the future. And now, as she stood in their small household, in the first blush of beautiful womanhood, what wonder if with their irrepressible affection were mingled feelings of pride and exultation!

NIGHT.

"Press onward through each varying hour;
Let no weak fears thy course delay;
Immortal being! feel thy power,
Pursue thy bright and endless way."

The short twilight of winter soon passed, and night let fall her curtain over the frozen earth. The city sent forth a blaze of light, from hall, and tower, and lowly fireside. If the pulsations of life were less visible than during the day, they were not less strong or deep, as the thronging worshippers gathered around its numerous altars to offer up their evening incense.

A long train of gay carriages, filled with the young and old, wrapped in warm furs, were at the door of Mrs. Meridan. A young gentleman stepped out of an open sleigh, flew up the steps, and entered the parlor.

"Ready, Clara?"

"All ready, Edward," was the reply.

He turned to interchange the compliments of the evening with the family, but exclaimed, "My dear Mrs. Meridan, how pale you look! Are you ill?"

"No, not ill, only a little weak. This sleigh-riding this cold night makes me nervous. And you are in an open sleigh, with your mother?"

"O yes, mamma, I begged Edward for an open carriage," said Clara; "these moving houses, which scarcely allow one a peep at the blue sky, are dreadful. Nothing so delightful as a ride in an open sleigh on a winter's star-lit night."

"But the air, my child, is so cold at this season! How long, Edward, are these wedding festivities to continue?"

"Only a few days."

"We commit Clara to your care. Return her to us in safety."

"As certainly as I return myself. Be at ease, my dear madam; can she be more precious to you than to me?"

"Yes, Edward, there may be another Clara for you in this wide world; but for us, her father and mother, there is only this one," infolding her in her arms as she wrapped her cloak around her.

"Dear mother, if my heart was not brimful of joy, you would make me sad," said Clara. "But I have felt all day

'Joy in every living thing,
Nature's bounty doth bestow,
Good and bad, still welcoming,
In her rosy path they go,
Kisses she to us hath given,'" imprinting a warm one on her mother's cheek, and then another, saying, "This for dear father when he returns to-night." She gave her hand to her lover, and in a few moments they had passed the lighted streets, and were in the open country.

The night was clear and calm. The stars looked out from their blue home on the white earth in still and quiet beauty. The moon, escaping from the warm glances of the bright-haired sun, hung her pale crescent low in the west; and the light, feathery forms of the aurora borealis streamed up from the cold north.

Beneath this silvery canopy our wedding guests pursued their onward course—the hearts of the elders of the party beating with the hopes and expectations of warm drawing-rooms, easy rocking-chairs, and fortunate escapes from cold and cough; while those of the younger ones could scarcely keep time with all the brilliant imaginings of their own rose-colored thoughts.

"How exhilarating this pure air!" said Clara. "It seems to bear us upward; the feet of our horses hardly touch the snow; we shall soon overtake yonder Charioteer, who is careering so proudly through the sky," pointing to Auriga.

"Stop, brother Edward, and place me on the starry crown of Orion, who stands there with his shining epaulettes and sword studded with diamonds," said little Mary Hartman.

"What is the greatest charm of a starlight night?" asked Mrs. Hartman.

"To me," replied Edward, "it is the idea of interminable existence which it presents, bearing upon its flowing and ebbing tides the great and silent past, the active and earnest present, with the unfathomable future."

"Friends," interrupted Clara, "yon dome of starry light 'is a loving Father's place.' I never look up to it without all the gladdening feelings of home-life. Those glittering orbs are the dwellings of his great household."

At that moment one of the carriages passed them, which gave a new impetus to their fiery steeds. The bridal hall already gleamed brightly in the distance. As they descended the hill which led to its open gates, their sleigh overturned, precipitating them all to the earth. Scarcely a moment elapsed ere they were on their feet again, interchanging kind inquiries, with the exception of Clara, who lay still and motionless as the silent snows around her. Edward raised her from the ground, but received no answer to the words of tenderness that trembled on his lips—he held in his arms the lifeless form of Clara Meridan!

They moved slowly onward, bearing with them to the marriage feast an unbidden and appalling guest—Death—his cold breath extinguishing the light and joy of the festive scene, blanching the cheeks of the young and old, chilling the warm life-blood of bold, courageous hearts. Beneath his stern glance the youthful pair plighted their mutual vows, amid the tears and sobs of surrounding friends. As the man of God invoked upon them the blessing of Heaven, he prayed yet more fervently for the stricken and bereaved.

In their happy home in — street sat the unconscious parents of Clara. Refinement and elegance spread around their united influence. Rich carpets covered the floors; soft ottomans and easy chairs invited the weary to repose; shaded lamps let fall their subdued light. An open musical instrument, upon which lay the Bride's Farewell, showed that some hand had just touched the keys. Stands of flowers shed their sweet fragrance, reminding us of fragrant youth and beauty; books and paintings all spoke of youthful taste and talent. The father had returned from his counting-house at the usual hour. His slippers were in their accustomed place, warming for his reception; his arm-chair stood in his favorite corner; his papers lay on the table ready for his perusal; but she, the loved one, the life of their home, its spirit of gladness, was not there to welcome him with her sweet smile and evening kiss.

"Clara is gone," said he, as he laid aside his thick coat for his warm dressing-gown. "It is a cold night; I hope she was well prepared to meet its piercing air. But why do I ask, when a mother's eye and a mother's love watches over her?" The mother smiled, and pressed his extended hand.

Tea was brought in; and as Mr. Meridan sipped the refreshing beverage, he turned over the papers, and attempted to read. Nothing could fix his attention—not even the politics of the day; he missed the flute-like voice of his daughter, who read to him at that hour. He threw aside the paper, with a slight degree of impatience in his manner, and as he did so raised his eyes to his wife, and for the first time observed her pale, anxious countenance. Suspecting the cause, every appearance of restlessness vanished, and he engaged her in pleasant conversation. They talked of the happy past, of the beautiful development of young life their Clara daily presented. The mother's heart grew strong, and her eyes lighted up with faith and hope.

It was an hour of sweet communion. Their full, open hearts reflected the peace and happiness of the present, while the future lay mirrored clear and bright in their child; and they thanked God for his manifold blessings. The father's hand lay upon the family Bible; he opened and read, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place throughout all generations." At that moment the bell rung, and the death-messenger entered. One loud, agonizing cry resounded through the house, succeeded by the silence and desolation of the grave.

* * * * *

Another morning dawned. The Sun poured forth his exhaustless rays upon the white-bosomed Earth, who received his homage and reveled in his beams, unmindful of her sorrowing sons and daughters. Again I went forth, and through the full tide of life made my way to the chamber of Death, where lay Clara Meridan in her last sleep—a breathless sleep. As yet Death had placed no other impress upon her than his profound repose. The thin muslin—her "mother's gift"—infolded her full, round form; the orange flowers mingled with her rich dark hair. An expression of more than peace, of joy, rested upon her calm, placid features, which seemed to say that life to her was "still beautiful;" that, untouched by care, unscathed by sorrow, she had early been called upward to minister in its higher, its holier courts. The voice of Faith spoke inwardly, saying, "I am the resurrection and the life, whosoever believeth on me shall never die."

MY LITTLE SISTER.

BY MRS. M. A. BIGELOW.

THERE is something mournfully pleasant about her memory. A multitude of sweet thoughts rush upon my mind whenever I speak of her,

"That beautiful one Who faded so early."

I was twelve years old when that sister died; and though more than as many years have cast their shadows over this heart, they have not effaced the remembrance of that gentle smile—that beaming face shines as clearly in my mind to-day, as when, with buoyant footsteps, I followed her among the flowers, and gazed into her lovely eyes. She had, I have often thought, the most beautiful face I ever beheld. A high white forehead; rosy, dimpled cheeks; clear black eyes; full of intelligence and love; sunny curls over a neck of snow. O, she was lovely; and her many acts of kindness, her words of confidence and trust, her humility, her forgiving spirit, were beautiful as the sweet face she wore; both won the love of many who still retain her remembrance in tender hearts. Yet none loved her so dearly as the little group at home; there each vied with each other in their affection for the little one. We called her Viola; and she was pure and gentle as the meek flower that bears her name. How well I recollect, when a little brother wept, or a sister experienced some slight sorrow, how quickly the tear of pity would fill her eye, and she would wind her little arms around the weeping one, and in tones of affection evince her sorrow! Dear little one! she was not to dwell long in this sin-polluted world. Five summers had scattered their beauty along her path, when she rested as if weary of her play, languished a few sad days, and died. It was a bright Sabbath morning in summer when we sat thoughtful and tearful around the little sufferer. She lay wasted and pale in her easy cradle, and for the first time in many hours a look of recognition came to her sweet face. Reaching up her little arms, she called our parents. They kneeled close by her side, and she clasped her thin white hands around the neck of each, gave them a farewell kiss, and murmured, "I love you all very dearly." Then our eldest sister came forward for one last token of affection; but, alas! it was too late. Never shall I forget her sobs and tears as she begged of the little one over whose pillow she had spent so many watchful nights for one word or kiss of affection; but all in vain; her little arms fell listless by her side, and she seemed wearied with her last effort. She could do no more, and looked satisfied and happy. Then we wept wildly when we thought that those dear arms would never more encircle our necks, or those sweet lips be pressed again to ours. They trembled faintly, as if to speak; but their music was hushed forever. Her sweet eyes unclosed, as if to look a fond farewell ere they shut in long repose. But she was beautiful in death. Never shall I forget the impressions made upon my young heart by her appearance after the spirit had fled. A smile lingered on her parted lips. They dressed her in a white shroud, and her little dimpled hands were pressed over her quiet bosom. Then they made her a little grave on the green hill-side, and the turf was laid gently on her pillow. There we planted the sweet violet and a damask rose. It is a fit resting-place for one so pure.

"To that lone spot I love to stray,
Where sleeps the dust of that dear one,
Who fled so soon from earth away,
Ere yet her life was scarce begun.
O lovely spot! O sister dear!
I almost envy thee thy bliss.
O gladly would I leave earth's care,
For such a resting-place as this!"

"THE SON OF MAN HAD NOT WHERE TO LAY HIS HEAD."

BY ELIZABETH G. BARBER.

YE whom the world esteemeth great,
Who, pillowed on a couch of state,
May close, at fall of night, the eye
Beneath a gorgeous canopy,
Remember how the Savior came
To bear our load of sin and shame.
The birds of earth, the fowls of air,
A quiet resting-place might share,
But when the shades of night were spread,
He had not where to lay his head.

And ye who share a humbler lot,
Whose dwelling is a lowly cot,
Where poverty has thrown its ills,
Where cankering care your spirit fills,
Who walk through life unloved and lone,
The Savior all your griefs hath known;
The rich, the mighty, passed him by,
With cold neglect and scornful eye;
He hungered for his daily bread;
He had not where to lay his head.

Ye stars that shine, as then ye shone,
Ye marked the Master's vigils lone!
He trod, with ministry divine,
Thy hills and vales, O Palestine!
He wandered with his faithful few
Beneath thy midnight skies of blue.
Witness thy waves, Genesaret!
Thy three-capped brow, green Olivet,
There lingering when day had fled,
He had not where to lay his head.

When moonlight slept upon the sea,
He sought thy shores, O Galilee!
When loud the wind and billows raved,
Tiberias, thy storms he braved.
The dew-drops gemmed the mountains where
The Savior bowed all night in prayer;
At eve the sufferer's tears flowed free
Amid thy bowers, Gethsemane!
And Calvary marked his life-blood shed:
He had not where to lay his head.

If thus, O suffering Son of God,
In meekness thou this earth hast trod,
In grief, in shame, in sorrow's hour,
When clouds around our path shall lower;
If care, if suffering should be
Our lot, we'll meekly bow like thee.
Content thy lot below to share,
May we as thou our burdens bear,
Rejoicing in thy path to tread,
Who hadst not where to lay thy head!

Without star or angel for their guide,
Who worship God, shall find him. Humble Love,
And not proud Reason, keeps the door of heaven;
Love finds admission, where proud Science fails.

ALTON LOCKE.*

BY G. M. KELLOGG, M. D.

A WAY-WORN man before us passes slowly;
He leaves the world of London far behind
For the first time; he leaves his home so lowly—
It long hath lost its only charm to bind.

The bells are pealing blithely, yet the chime
Wakes no regretful feeling in his heart;
He feebly toiling on, recalls the time—
A life of winters! tears refuse to start.

He owes no love to his own native city;
Like some gaunt she-wolf littered on the hill,
She feels not for her young remorse or pity—
Starvation, cold, and death may work their will.

Oft has he stood, e'en in the rain and sleet,
Fierce hunger's pangs uncloyed, at an old stall,
Plucking from dog-eared books the bitter-sweet,
That fruit of Eden's tree with core of gall.

We see him now upon the dusty road;
The freighted cars pass swiftly to the town,
With laughing passengers—a merry load—
The jolly squire and happy country clown.

He hears a sparkling brook, which sings along,
Opening to wonders new his darkling eye;
It woos him on with its sweet tinkling song
To groves of rugged oaks and lindens high.

Much had he read, but never had he been
Where he could breathe the soft and genial air,
Which o'er the senses can so sweetly win,
And smooth the wrinkles from the brow of care.

The park-fence climbed, he sees the grassy waves,
Now fanned and rippled by the sighing breeze;
In this new beauty fount his soul he laves;
In blissful murmurs sinks upon his knees.

Each slender blade he kisses o'er and o'er;
The pent-up stores of feeling forth do well;
He feels an ecstasy unknown before,
While down his mellowed cheeks tears thickly fell.

TO NELLY.

QUAINT and wondrous little angeling,
White-armed, floating, airy thing;
Art thou not a flower changeling,
Stolen from the elfin king?

Shut thy waxen lid so tender,
On thy violet, azure eye;
Bend thy form so lithe and slender,
As dew-laden lilies lie.

Sleep, thy Savior watches by thee,
Tender truant from the skies!
Sleep, all evil powers fly thee,
Till the dawn shall bid thee rise.

*The above is suggested by an affecting scene in Alton Locke, the tailor-poet, by Kingsley, who is represented as never having seen the fresh green grass in his life before.

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

BY MRS. BITHIA B. LEAVITT.

CHAPTER III.

LUCY WARNER was always up bright and early. The first hour of the morning was invariably devoted to her religious duties; and, however early such occasions might require her to rise, that hour was always provided for in her calculations, and kept inviolably sacred from all intrusion. Till her mother awoke she assisted the only servant they could afford to employ in neatly arranging the house, preparing her mother's breakfast, and performing other little duties of a domestic nature.

One morning, a few days after the interview with her uncle, Lucy passed through the usual routine of duty, and as her mother still slept she sat down by the parlor window to read. In vain she essayed to follow the author; her thoughts would wander into the future. "I wonder when uncle will come," was just fitting through her mind, when a faint sound from her mother's room arrested her attention, and caused her to spring from her chair and hasten to her bedside.

"Air—air—Lucy; I—faint—for—air," whispered the sufferer, gasping for breath. In an instant Lucy had wheeled the lounge on which Mrs. Warner always slept into the adjoining parlor. The doors were opened, the curtains flung back, and, for some minutes, Lucy stood fanning her beloved parent with the most intense solicitude. Her heart sickened with terror as she noticed the face assume a more deathlike hue, and clasping her hands wildly she exclaimed, "O mother, mother, speak to me; speak, speak but one word and say you are not dying! Look at me, my mother; my mother, will you not speak to your child? O who will come? Hannah, run quickly for the doctor, and then for my uncle!"

"Your uncle is here," said a voice; and turning her eyes to the door Lucy beheld Mr. Spencer hurrying toward the couch with a wine-glass in his hand. He and Clara had come into the room just as Lucy was speaking, and in an instant perceiving his sister was only fainting he had opened the first closet he saw and procured the wine. He gently raised the head, and Lucy conveyed a few drops into her mother's mouth. In a few moments Mrs. Warner unclosed her eyes and then shut them again, while an expression of pain and disappointment passed over her features. Again she opened them with a clearer vision, and murmured, "Ah! Lucy, my child, you here, and Henry my brother, and Clara, too! I am glad to see you, but I thought I was going home."

"And you are going home, sister; to the home of your childhood—the home you loved so well. I have come to bring you to your own room; the same you used to occupy in your girlhood, and from which you can see the hills you loved, and the little lake, and catch its refreshing breezes. The carriage is here, but I fear you will not be able to ride now."

"You are very kind, dear brother. My girlhood's home was a happy one, and my husband's home was a happy one; but, brother, I have another home, far more bright, far more beautiful," and the small white finger pointed upward. "There, there's the home to which I thought I was going. Bright angels are there; angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim, redeemed spirits, too. Among them is your father, Lucy; yea, redeemed," she repeated, "redeemed—redeemed—from what—for what—by whom? Ah! when we can fathom perdition we shall know from what; when we can scale heaven's glories shall we know for what; when we can estimate the worth of blood divine, shall we comprehend by what we are redeemed. Yea," she continued, "your father is there, near the throne, I doubt not; but, ah! a greater bliss than seeing him awaits me in my home—God in Christ, my Savior; and you will come, too, Lucy. Yea, you have chosen the lowly Jesus as your portion here; you will dwell in his glorious presence for evermore. Cling to the cross, dearest; cling, cling, never loosen your grasp, and it will bear you to the skies—to bliss—to your Savior's bosom. O what glory flows from the cross to illumine the death-bed of the Christian! Its beams pierce the grave, and all is light; they stream into heaven, and all is glory. My home! my home! O what transporting views of heaven burst upon me!" she exclaimed in ecstasy. "Transporting! transporting!" She paused, and turned suddenly to her brother and asked:

"Brother, are you prepared for the place in which you find me? This time you must meet. In this place you must lie. You must go to the grave. The judgment will require your presence. Heaven or hell must be your home. My brother, are you training for these events? Alas! I fear not. These are awful truths, but they are truths. O my brother," and, in the fervor of her feelings, she half raised herself on her pillows, and bent her clear eye, through which her very soul spoke, "my brother, treat not this great subject with contempt, and regard it as fit only for the 'weaker sex.' You know," she continued solemnly, "that life is a fact; you know that death is a fact; you know that happiness and misery in this life are facts. Be assured that judgment and eternity, heaven and hell, are just as certainly facts, living realities. Study them as such, I beseech you. Clara, my dear child, let me persuade you to seek the Savior. In vain you will attempt to draw happiness from the gayeties of life. The fountain is not pure; the streams must necessarily be impure. Your immortal spirit can never be satisfied with—," she paused and whispered, "O I faint again. No, no. Lucy, dearest, my Lucy, look to the All-sufficient for strength. Lucy, my hour is come—your hour is come. Blessed Savior, thou hast washed me; take me to thyself!" The heart beat quickly, the speaking eye turned toward her beloved daughter in exquisite love and tenderness, the lips murmured gently, "Jesus, support my orphan child and train her for thy glory," a slight quiver passed over the frame, and the purified spirit fled to the bosom of its Savior, God.

CHAPTER IV.

"I wonder where they can be. I never saw such a looking bureau; every thing is topsy-turvy. Who could have been here?" and the young lady pushed in one drawer and pulled out another in such quick succession as to almost shake the elegant mirror from its position and overturn the various knickknacks that ornamented the top. If she had just then glanced into that mirror, she would have seen reflected a face that had been beautiful, and would be so again, but just then a frown sat upon the brow and overshadowed the whole countenance. But she was too intent upon finding "them" to give even a glance, natural as was the position for such a contemplation. "Can not you tell me if you have seen them," she at length exclaimed, shutting up the last drawer and turning impatiently around. The person addressed was about her own age, and, though neither so beautiful in feature nor symmetrical in form as herself, there was a charm in her countenance that would rivet attention from the very difficulty of explaining it. Perhaps it was the deep black in which she was robed that made her countenance more impressive. Perhaps the sentiment of the author with whom she was communing called forth the peculiar softness of expression. The other was also dressed in the deepest mourning, which exhibited her fair complexion in its most perfect beauty, and yet there was a marked contrast between the individuals.

"Can I help you, cousin Clara," replied the lady thus addressed, laying down her book. "For what are you looking—your parasol?"

"No, no, I want my gloves. They were in this box. I am sure I put them here, but now they are gone. I'm in a hurry, and they are the only pair I have that fit me; there is no such thing as finding two pairs of gloves alike in the same pack," she added pettishly, again opening the drawer and rummaging the box that had undergone the same operation already two or three times. I hate such a hunting. This time she was more successful, for, half concealed by some article, she spied the black gloves, and exclaiming, "O, here they are! I knew I put them there," she hastily drew them on and hurried out of the room.

Lucy—for it was Lucy Warner seated there—was now a resident in her uncle's house. Lucy closed the bureau drawers, and taking up her book resumed her seat. The book remained unopened; she leaned her head against the window; a deep, heavy sigh escaped; desolation seemed to pervade her spirit. Her heart was full of foreboding fears. She knew her proneness to be discouraged in her religious life; and now, that her mother was lost to her, she became conscious how much she had rested upon her prayers and spiritual advice. O how could she survive the blighting influences to which her religion would be subjected! She bent her head upon her hand and wept bitterly. "O my mother! my mother!" she murmured, "why were you taken from me, why—" She started; her mother's words flashed through her mind, "Try, my child, through grace, to refrain from the least thought that would reflect upon the goodness of your heavenly Father." The dying voice still thrilled in her ear—"Cling to the cross, dearest Lucy; cling, cling." She raised her head; her eye fell upon her little Bible—her mother's last gift. "Precious book!" exclaimed she; "yes, thou art my guide, my friend, my counselor." She was searching the sweet words of comfort when Clara appeared and commenced taking off her bonnet.

"What is the matter, are you not going?"

"No. I told Thomas to have the carriage at the door exactly at twelve o'clock. It is nearly one, and is now too late; besides it looks like rain. This is always the way—when I have set my heart upon any thing I am sure to be disappointed. I wish Thomas would obey orders a little more implicitly," she added, throwing her gloves, handkerchief, and fan together into a work-box. Lucy noticed the act, for she thought as likely as not Clara would have a hunt for one or more of them.

"Clara, you are always finding fault with Thomas," said Mrs. Spencer, who at the moment entered the room and heard her daughter's last remark. "I am certain the carriage has been ready more than half an hour. I think you must have been the delinquent."

"To be sure I was detained a little hunting for my gloves, but that was no excuse for him. I hate to have my orders disregarded," returned Clara in an imperious tone.

"Well, well, dear, don't vex your temper with so trifling a matter; and do pray correct that expression you have a habit of saying, 'I hate.' Really you will look older than your mother in a few years, if you suffer yourself to be fretted by every little thing. See," continued Mrs. Spencer, casting a self-complaisant glance upon her handsome face, reflected from the opposite mirror, "see, I have not one real wrinkle on my face."

"Dear me, mamma, I can never be like you, and take every thing so easily. If a smooth skin depends upon amiability, I am sure to be a wrinkled up old maid. I don't feel amiably."

"That is just your trouble, Clara. If you would try and bear every thing patiently, and not permit yourself to get out of humor at every trifling circumstance that does not occur just when and in the manner you prefer, you would soon acquire an admirable equanimity of temper. This impatience of yours will perfectly ruin your countenance; and besides, Clara, it is so unlady-like to be ruffled or discomposed."

"O, I can not help how it looks, or how I look," returned the young lady in a half-vexed, half-laughing tone. "When I feel impatiently, I must speak so. I am agreeable enough at other times."

"Yes, but you can learn to control yourself."

"I am sure I should like to know how," said Clara with more earnestness of manner. "It is not so pleasant to be always in 'the frets,' as blind Billy says. But, then, I am certain," added she with an incredulous shake of the head, "I am certain it will never be by trying. You, mamma, are naturally amiable, and I am naturally unamiable, I suppose. Lucy, how do you contrive to be always so pleasant? You must belong to the naturally amiable ones."

"No, indeed," replied Lucy, speaking for the first time. "On the contrary I was very impatient and irritable when a child."

"And got over it or grew out of it by dint of trying," interrupted her cousin, laughing.

"Yes, cousin Clara, by dint of trying," replied Lucy; but the tone was serious; tears filled her eyes, and her lips quivered with emotion.

"There, you will believe now, Clara, what I have often told you!" exclaimed Mrs. Spencer, not observing Lucy's serious manner. "You can bear any thing if you only have the will to try; every thing is in the will."

"But I have tried, mamma, again and again," persisted Clara, "but it is all in vain. If I feel impatience in my heart, it is always sure to burst forth sooner or later. Are you sure that nothing will ever cause you to evince anger, or impatience, or discontent? Come, I am going to watch you and Lucy, and see if I can detect some of my own characteristic petulance."

Mrs. Spencer smiled encouragingly, but Lucy sighed to herself as she thought of the fruitless effort Clara might make, trusting thus to the power of will to accomplish that which she knew, by experience, could only result from the grace of God overcoming the natural corruption of the heart.

It was true that Mrs. Spencer seldom or never exhibited an irritable spirit; but, as Clara had correctly observed, this arose from a naturally amiable disposition, and not from any real strength of mind to conquer difficulties. Indeed, as to difficulties, she had never encountered any. Reared in the midst of wealth, and never having been obliged to deny herself any gratification which wealth could procure, it was not wonderful that Time should have but lightly pressed her brow. But wealth can not lift its possessor above the faults and infirmities of others; neither can it exclude the petty vexations that occur in the life of all, whether the possessor of a palace or inhabitant of a hut. These petty annoyances Mrs. Spencer rather expected would occur, and she, therefore, thought to intrench herself in a kind of passive indifference, which, added to her really sweet disposition, strengthened, too, by a horror of wrinkles, which she considered the inseparable companion of ill-humor, enabled her to glide along through life with a placid brow and contented heart. It has been frequently observed that persons of very great amiability of disposition seldom possess much energy of character or warmth of affection. But Mrs. Spencer could not be thus judged. Her servants were trained with the utmost precision and punctilious regard to the requirements of refined life, and all the arrangements of her household betokened a just appreciation of the neat and elegant. She was sincerely attached to her husband, and her children knew full well a mother's heart flowed out to them in kind and tender sympathies. It was not, however, that highest kind of love, that will prompt the parent to watch with unremitting solicitude the development of mental and moral character, reprove, and even chasten with undeviating firmness, whenever, from a well-formed judgment, self-controlled temper, and sanctified heart, such discipline is deemed necessary. On the contrary, Mrs. Spencer thought that if her children were well dressed, afforded the best advantages of education and society, always accompanied with an effort to keep them amused and preserved from all ill-temper, she had fully performed her duty and answered the responsibility of a parent. But her husband's views of family government, though as far removed as her own from any really noble conceptions of the destiny of the immortal spirit, were considerably more enlarged. He often censured the extreme indulgence which characterized the mother's treatment, and, indeed, prohibited some special things which he foresaw would result in indolent selfishness.

CHAPTER V.

"Jesus, support my orphan child and train her for thy glory." Two years had passed since this prayer escaped the lips of the departing mother, and thrilled the hearts of the little group that circled the dying couch. Two years! the heart still ached, the eye still gathered its moisture, the tones of that voice still betrayed a deep sorrow living in that young spirit, but the prayer, welling up from the depths of a pious heart, reached his ear and was answered. Lucy had learned to trust in the love and goodness of her God; to see his hand in every event; to believe with the heart and exemplify in her every-day life the promise, "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding; in all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." Severe as was the trial of her faith in this bereavement, the same sweet resignation was always visible; and her deportment in her uncle's family was so uniformly kind and gentle as to win the esteem and affection of all, and they united in declaring that Lucy had become quite necessary to their happiness. Mr. Spencer often lauded the "wonderful fortitude" she possessed for one so young, but little dreamed he of the source from which she derived strength thus to bear up under her deep sorrow. Plans were occasionally formed in her mind for her own maintenance; but whenever she spoke of them to her uncle, or in his presence, they were not only discouraged, but actually vetoed.

"Lucy, child," said her uncle one day, after such an allusion had been made, "what nonsense does come into your young head sometimes! You do not act at all with your usual good sense. Would you deprive me of the pleasure of having my own sister's child under my roof as one of my family? and tell me, what would your aunt do without you? You know she consults you about every thing. I tell you, Lucy," and the tone was not the cold, haughty tone of former years, but that of kindness and subdued feeling, "I tell you, you are master and mistress, too, here. When I propose any measure to Mrs. Spencer, I always get for an answer, 'Well, we will ask Lucy—see what Lucy thinks,' and it is Lucy here and Lucy there, and, indeed, Lucy, the unconscious Lucy, rules the whole of us. Here, Mary," continued Mr. Spencer, as his wife and daughter entered the room, "here, Lucy is at the old story, asking if we are not tired of her, and all such nonsense. Can not you say something to stop her from thus annoying us every little while?"

"Nonsense, indeed," replied Mrs. Spencer, smiling; "you know, Lucy, we can not live without you; so why do you talk so foolishly? But there is one thing, Mr. Spencer, that, in our good opinion of ourselves, we have altogether overlooked. Again and again have we assured Lucy that we could not possibly dispense with her—for, indeed, how could we?—but we have never thought of asking her, or even thinking, perhaps, that she could live without us. Are you tired of us, Lucy?"

"O no, no, dear aunt," replied the affectionate girl, while the tears filled her eyes, "I am happy—happy as I could be," and she glanced upon the deep mourning in which she was robed; "but I fear I am doing no good in the world, and to live—"

"No good!" exclaimed Mr. and Mrs. Spencer, and Clara, simultaneously. "No good!" continued Mr. Spencer, "think of all the little ragged children you have picked up and clothed, and actually so overcome my prejudices, you would call them, I suppose, as to bring them en masse to my own library on Sundays to teach them—well, at least some of the decencies of life, if you do not accomplish all [and the lip was without its former curl] your ardent imagination desires and expects. And there—to say nothing of the good you do in various ways to your aunt, and Clara, and me, too—look, there is little Frank, who is climbing on your lap; why, you are to him nurse, and teacher, and friend, and playmate. Come," said he, assuming an ironical tone, "come, Franky, let us send Lucy away—naughty Lucy!"

"No, no, not naughty Lucy; dood tousin Lucy. I love tousin Luly," and the little fellow, in his zeal to evince his affection, almost smothered his cousin with his caresses. "Luly won't do way?" continued the child inquiringly, looking with a distressed glance, first at his cousin and then to his parents. "Luly do way and leave Fanky? Fanky die."

"No, indeed, Franky," said Clara, "we'll not let 'tousin Luly' go away; so, Lucy, if you are not, as mamma says, really tired of us, don't distress us by forming any more of your wise plans. You know how hard I have been trying to be amiable, and I must have you here to encourage me. Papa, have you not observed how pleasant I am all—I mean a great deal—at any rate, some of the time?"

Clara blushed, as she felt that candor required her thus to modify her expression. Mr. Spencer laughed outright as he noticed the gradation of terms Clara employed. Mrs. Spencer smiled encouragingly; but Lucy, observing the mortified look spreading over Clara's countenance, put little Frank gently down, and throwing her arm around her cousin said, as if she had not heard her last remark, "Dear Clara, I feel your love and kindness, and my heart repays it in gratitude at least," and then turning round exclaimed in a fervent tone:

"My dear uncle and aunt, you forget not the orphan: O that you would remember the orphan's God! You lavish your affections upon one who is unworthy of that affection; one who does nothing for you: O that you would love Him who does all things! Happy, happy, happy would I be, could I be the humble instrument of drawing your attention, and if attention, your hearts' best tribute would be given to Him who hath purchased for you riches, and glory, and eternal life. Uncle, the religion of the cross guided my father through life, the religion of the cross sustained my mother, and, imperfectly as I have shown forth its power, the religion of the cross has enabled me to endure my orphanage, and even rejoice amid my sorrows. O, the cross! the cross! What power there to alleviate the sufferings of the human family, to lift them above circumstances, to open up communion even with the God of heaven and earth! The cross! the cross! Glory be to that Savior who died upon the cross to lift me—to lift you, my uncle—you, my aunt—you, my cousins—the world, from death to life, from poverty to riches, from ignominy to glory." Lucy paused; she had never before spoken so freely; she glanced timidly toward her aunt, but instead of reading indifference or displeasure, she beheld her gently wipe away the falling tear; but Mr. Spencer, without speaking, arose hastily and left the room. "He is offended," thought Lucy to herself; but quietly committing what she had said into the hands of God, whom she knew would take care of his own cause, she silently and fervently offered up a petition in his behalf. Little Frank stood gazing into her face with childish wonder, but when she ceased speaking with one bound he sprang to her side; and as she returned his sweet endearments, he whispered in her ear, "Tousin Luly hug Fanky, but Luly don't love Fanky, if Luly do way; will tousin Luly do away?" he persisted with such a distressed countenance as to make Lucy and Clara exclaim simultaneously, "No, no, Franky dear, tousin Luly will stay as long as you want her." The child drew a long breath, as if relieved from some great weight, and again putting his plump little arms around his cousin's neck said, in a soft, gentle tone, "Now Fanky learn to be dood, and Fanky do to heaven."

From that day Lucy was more than ever a favorite. Well that the lessons of early discipline were hers; well that the prayers of a pious mother had ever been ascending in her behalf; well that that last prayer of faith was that she might be trained for God's glory, not her own; well that the Bible had been her most cherished and confidential friend; well that the mercy-seat was daily, ay, hourly, visited; well that the Holy Spirit reigned in that heart to purify and guide; well! else the day of prosperity had proved the day of dark adversity; else, when the destroying angel hovered over that dwelling, seeking its fairest treasure, coveting its brightest jewel, the heart had been weak in itself, the spirit had been unable to render consolation and wield the influence indispensable to undisciplined hearts and rebellious wills. It was but one week from that day little Frank lay tossing upon his couch, rolling his head from side to side, exclaiming in piteous accents, "O Luly, tousin Luly, my head so sick, my head so sick. Won't Luly make Fanky well? Fanky be dood if Luly make sick do way." Ah! those heart-rending words, that exquisitely imploring look! The parents stood by in speechless agony; the sister wept the affectionate but unavailing tears; but Lucy it was—Lucy, the Christian—who soothed the pain, watched the pulse, administered to his every want, and anticipated his every desire. Ah! Lucy, Lucy, thy faith now shines resplendent as when thy mother died. Now, in this season of thy recurring trial, when the nerves are taxed, the heart's sincere submission required, holy resignation demanded, thy faith, more bright and clear, seeks, obtains, lives upon the declaration of God's holy word. Four days passed, and still the little fellow moaned in pain. In his more easy moments, Lucy succeeded in diverting his mind by simple stories of the Savior's love, and he would frequently exclaim, with childish delight beaming from his sweet countenance, "Fanky love Jesus, cause Jesus died to make Fanky dood. When Fanky die, Fanky do live with Jesus."

The shadows of evening were gradually veiling the room. Lucy was seated at the bedside. The door opened and some one advanced. "Hush; be very quiet; move gently," whispered she, "he has just fallen into a sweet sleep, from which we may hope every thing." It was Mrs. Spencer who approached, with swollen eyes and dejected look; for from the first hour of her boy's illness, her usual calmness had fled, leaving nothing upon which her soul could be staid. There was even at times a fretfulness betrayed, as she wandered around the house, uneasy and unhappy, and presenting a striking contrast to the suffering but chastened Lucy. Upon Mrs. Spencer's solicitation Lucy, who had not left her charge even for the refreshment of food or sleep, yielded her place; but, as if conscious of something wanting, the little fellow opened his eyes, and seeing her receding figure, spoke in a low tone, "Luly do way, Fanky die." The whisper reached her ear, and returning to his couch Lucy gently assured him of her presence. As he recognized her voice, he feebly placed his little hand within hers, and looking up into her face said, as plainly as words could have done, "Don't leave your little Fanky." The hand was cold, and as Lucy gazed into that upturned eye, O what a change had been wrought! It was sparkling with unwonted brilliancy. The little form lay perfectly quiet, freed, apparently, from all suffering; and as Lucy, with a thrill of anguish darting through her very soul, bent over to scrutinize him more closely, the truth flashed upon her, it was the ease preceding death. Suppressing, with a strenuous effort, the exclamation that rose to her lips, she whispered to her aunt to watch him closely, and then quickly rung the bell. As the father and sister hurried to the bed the little fellow gently unclosed his eyes, and, pointing to the ceiling, exclaimed, "Up there, up there, I want to do up there! Dood by," and kissed his little hand in token of separation. They looked—they looked again—he had gone "up there."

"Jesus, support my orphan child and train her for thy glory!" Two years had passed, in which this prayer had been signally answered through the silent influence Lucy's Christian character had exerted in her uncle's family. Four years sped into eternity, and the pious petition still lived in its fruits. The family mansion, with its elegances, was no longer in the possession of Mr. Spencer. Through various losses by derangements in the commercial world, his property was first mortgaged, then sold to relieve his pecuniary embarrassments, till, at length, his own loved home passed into the possession of strangers. Within view of its lawns and its trees, its fruits and its flowers; within view, too, of the lake, whose tiny waves still danced and sparkled to the morning sun; ay, within sight of the cherished spot where slept their little boy, a small but comfortable house became the home of the reduced family. But while the elements were in action that wrought out this great change in the temporal circumstances of the Spencer family, other agencies, more secret but none the less certain, were producing a moral revolution in the character of its members, connected not with time only, but whose results reached into the far future, ay, even into the great forever. Whither now was the restless mind of Clara roaming? The amiable and gentle aunt—was the brow still placid and the heart unruffled? Ah! as the strings of an instrument, when stretched beyond the power of their tension, quiver and snap asunder, so Mrs. Spencer's nerves, weakened by the loss of her favorite child, and the subsequent reverses that crowded upon her family, became exhausted by their own intense action. For months she lay upon her couch in almost an unconscious existence; but before the silver chord was finally loosened, her voice, in feeble accents, proclaimed a Savior's love, the superiority of grace over nature, and acknowledged there was in Lucy's modest and unaffected piety, an element to which she had always been a stranger. And that haughty uncle, before whose "stern, dark eyes" the young and timid Christian had once shrunk abashed—did the brow contract and the lip curl in scorn as he passed her room one evening and heard her voice in prayer? The tone was fervent—the spirit was evidently struggling to grasp the Immutability. Faith was gaining the victory, and in a voice thrillingly distinct she ended, "Holy Spirit, for the sake of Jesus, who died for his salvation, convince my dear uncle of the truth of thy holy religion. O thou wilt! thou wilt!" she repeated again and again, her faith still strengthening with each repetition. The words caught his ear; he paused; a change passed over his features. Like a gleam of sunshine darting to the bosom of a dark cloud flying over its surface the radiance of light and beauty, even such was the change. The door was opened, and the skeptic bowed at Lucy's side; he bowed before Lucy's God and acknowledged himself a sinner.

And Clara—the impulsive, wayward Clara—has she still no object, no aim in life? At the family altar, morning and evening, a trio unite in supplications. The Bible-class, that has been dispersed for the want of a teacher, is reassembled. The poor have found a new friend—the sick a gracious comforter; and as the father and daughter sit together and contrast their present life with their former experience, they speak with notes of praise and thanksgiving of the joys of salvation, brought into their hearts by Lucy Warner's Christian influence.

Need I make any moral from my narrative? Need I say that religion in the heart is the great soother and tranquilizer of this life's troubled scenes? The matter is with the reader, and he must decide whether he has an influence, as a Christian, to do good in the world.

PASSING AWAY.

BY W. OSCAR FIERCE.

As onward ages roll

To endless day,

'Tis graven on the soul—

"Passing away."

As swells the dew-drop bright,

From night's cold ray;

So in the sunbeam's light—

"Passing away."

Down in the ocean's deep,

Where treasures lay;

Waves o'er its bosom creep—

"Passing away."

Around morn's star-lit brow

Soft breezes play,

With kisses blush its glow—

"Passing away."

Or sweep from nature's lyre

Her own wild lay—

Each fainter strain expire—

"Passing away."

Death calls the fairer flowers,

Blown in life's day—

Fast fly the fleeting hours—

"Passing away."

All, from the skies that glow

Each glimmering ray,

To earth with beauty's blow—

"Passing away."

Man's joy and happiness given,

Touched with decay—

All, all, this side of heaven—

"Passing away."

In hope, then, spread the sod

O'er mortal clay,

And rest thy soul on God—

"Passing away."

REASON AND INSTINCT.

LORD MONBODDO maintained that man is only an improvement on the monkey, occurring as a result from the general tendency to advancement claimed to exist in nature. He seemed to think that man bore a relation to the monkey somewhat like that which the frog bears to the tadpole, and that as the tadpole becomes the frog, so the race of man was produced by a change at some remote period of the creation, of the monkey into a man. This ridiculous notion of the erudite but fanciful Scotch philosopher is really but another phase of the more recent theory of gradation, or development, as it is sometimes called, which in different forms is now advocated by so many European philosophers. And, although few, comparatively, adopt this theory definitely and fully, there is quite a disposition among many to obliterate the distinctions by which the Creator has in so marked a manner separated man from the inferior animals. It is well, therefore, that we should have a clear idea of these distinctions.

It is often very loosely said that while man is governed by reason, instinct rules in the animal. If it be meant by this that, as a general rule, reason predominates in man, while instinct does so in animals, the statement is a correct one. But if it be meant that animals are wholly governed by instinct, and that man is distinguished from them as a reasoning animal, it is not correct. For some animals do reason; that is, if making inferences be considered as reasoning. In tracing out the differences between man and animals, I shall not attempt to show what the nature of instinct is. This is a great mystery, and all attempts to solve it have utterly failed. I shall content myself, therefore, with pointing out some of the differences between instinct and reason. In doing this it is not always easy to say just where the one begins and the other ends, so intimately are their phenomena often mingled together.

The actions of instinct are more unaccountable than those of reason. In the operations of reason we see something of the processes by which results are reached. But it is not so with instinct. For example, as a man travels over an unexplored country, we can understand by what means he obtains a knowledge of the country, in order to guide him on his journey. The processes of his reasoning in regard to this we can comprehend. But when an insect travels with unerring certainty to its place of destination without any guide marks that we can see, or when a swarm of bees or a flock of birds wing their flight to distant places, or when bees construct their honey-comb with the exactness of mathematics in obedience to the best principles for such a structure, we can not understand the processes which lead to the result. It seems to be produced by an impulse from a cause extraneous to the animal, guiding it as if it were a mere machine. The little intelligence of the animal seems to have only an incidental connection with this impulse. It, therefore, merely controls somewhat the circumstances under which the instinct acts.

I will introduce here an illustration, a little incident recorded in my note-book many years ago. The account of it runs thus: I was much entertained to-day in watching the movements of a very small winged insect—about one-third of the size of a common fly. He was dragging a dead spider across the road. Every now and then he would drop his load, and run forward a little, springing about here and there, and then would go back and take up his load again. His movements in this way were so quick and apparently so irregular, that they seemed to be without an object. But I observed, that although he thus ran about here and there, his course in its general bearing was a very straight one. Soon a wagon passed along directly over where the insect was, separating him from his load, and disturbing the whole surface of the ground. He, however, soon found his load, and then with a good deal of apparent reconnoitering he went on again in the same general course. In the latter part of his journey he traveled over and amidst a heap of stones. Here he would occasionally leave the spider and disappear, and then return again to take his load. Again a little farther on I would see him emerge from his concealed pathway, and so on to the end of his journey. His place of destination was a hole in the sand beneath a flat stone. Now, how did this insect in his journey to his home—which to him was a long one, though only three rods—manage to keep so straight a course? Was it in the same way that men manage in their journeys, guided by way-marks, and by information obtained from others? Following out this idea, suppose then a man to be at the same distance from his home in proportion to his size that the insect was from his home. According to this supposition he must be over three thousand miles from home. Suppose the direct line to his home lay across an uninhabited country, so that he can get no information from others. This makes his case parallel with the insect's, for we saw him meet no other insects on the road. Now, if he knew the exact direction in which his home lay, he could not, without his compass, move with any precision toward it. And if he had wandered away from it without a compass, as the insect did from his home, how would he know in what direction it lay? And yet the insect traveled toward his home as if he preserved exactly amid all his wanderings the points of the compass. The surface over which he went was very irregular. He had to cross or wind around eminences, which were to him as large as hills and mountains are to man, and yet he was not embarrassed; and when he went among the stones he had more and greater difficulties to encounter than man meets with in passing through the wildest countries. Again: suppose that the traveling man should meet with some whirlwind or some convulsion of nature, which should separate him from his burden, and disarrange, in some measure, the face of the country about him, just as the traveling insect was served by the commotion of the horse's feet and the wheels of the wagon. Would he find his load as easily as the insect did, and go on his way with as little hesitation?

So little has the intelligence to do with the instinct, and so nearly mechanical therefore are the actions of the latter, that they are governed by an invariable rule. It is as invariable almost as are the movements of a machine. For this reason there are no improvements or alterations in the acts of instinct. The bird and the bee, for instance, have no change of fashion in their architecture from age to age. The honey that fed John the Baptist, or that which was found by Samson in the carcass of the lion, was deposited in the same hexagonal cells which are constructed by the bees of the present day. And each bird builds its nest precisely in the same way that its ancestral birds have ever done.

Instinct moves straight on to its result, and it does so blindly. It exercises no intelligence in regard to the purpose for which the result is intended, or the circumstances which tend to defeat this purpose. It evidently, in some cases, never knows any thing of the purpose aimed at by its acts, as, for example, when an animal makes provisions for a progeny which it is never to see. "It is scarcely possible," says Carpenter, "to point to any actions better fitted to give an idea of the nature of instinct, than those which are performed by various insects, when they deposit their eggs. These animals will never behold their progeny; and can not acquire any notion from experience, therefore, of that which their eggs will produce; nevertheless they have the remarkable habit of placing, in the neighborhood of each of these bodies, a supply of aliment fitted for the nourishment of the larva that is to proceed from it; and this they do, even when they are themselves living on food of an entirely different nature, such as would not be adapted for the larva. They can not be guided in such actions by any thing like reason; for the data on which alone they could reason correctly, are wanting to them; so that they would be led to conclusions altogether erroneous if they were not prompted, by an unerring instinct, to adopt the means best adapted for the attainment of the required end."

Instinct is a strict routinist, while reason readily accommodates itself to endlessly varying circumstances. In illustration of the above characteristic of instinct, I will cite a few examples. The hen will sit on pieces of chalk shaped like eggs, as readily as she will on the eggs themselves. Her instinct is so blind as to be deceived by this general resemblance. The flesh-fly often lays its eggs in the carrion-flower, the odor of which is so much like that of tainted meat as to deceive the insect.

The care which animals exercise in relation to their progeny seems to be governed to a great extent, perhaps wholly, by a blind instinct. All care is given up when care is no longer needed, and with it what appears to be affection is given up also. In animals there is no such lasting affection of the parent for the progeny as there is in man; for in them it is merely instinctive, and not rational and moral in its character, and it, therefore, lasts only so long as it is needed to carry out the purposes for which this particular instinct is designed. Indeed, in some cases there can be no affection in all the care which is instinctively exercised by the parent, for it is put forth for progeny which the animal is destined never to see. And in those cases among animals in which the family state exists, it is a mere temporary affair, and as soon as the offspring is able to take care of itself it is no more to the parent than any other animal of the same tribe is.

But some animals have intelligence as well as instinct. When this intelligence is shown in the mere power of imitation it is of a low order. The parrot that learns to imitate man in speech is nothing like as intelligent as some animals that have no such power. Some animals have really a reasoning intelligence—that is, they make rational inferences. Their reasoning is sometimes, as before remarked, so mingled with the operations of instinct, that it is difficult to distinguish them accurately. In the case of the beaver who labored so faithfully in obedience to a blind instinct, there was some exercise of reason, as, for example, when he "judged" his work. But it is difficult to point out definitely the line between instinct and reason in such a case. There are some animals, however, in whom the workings of a reasoning intelligence are to be seen with perfect distinctness. But their reasoning differs from that of man. The inferences which the reasoning animal makes are individual; while man goes beyond this, and makes general inferences, and, therefore, discovers general truths. Newton's dog, Diamond, saw apples fall to the ground, as well as his master. And he was capable of making some inferences in regard to them; but they were individual inferences. For example, if an apple-tree were shaken, and the dog were hit by a falling apple, whenever he saw other apples falling he would infer that he might be hit again, and would infer also that it was best for him to get out of harm's way. This would be the extent of his reasoning. But his master inquired into the cause of the fall of the apple, and by considering this and other similar phenomena, he deduced general principles, which govern the movements both of the atoms, and the worlds of the universe.

The inferences which are formed by animals are mere results of the association of ideas, and the process, therefore, really hardly merits the appellation of reasoning. Thus, in the case of Newton's dog, supposed above, the idea of the falling apples was associated in his mind with the hurt experienced when he was hit, and prompted the getting out of harm's way. When such associations are extended and complicated, it appears at first thought as if the animal acted in view of general truths, arrived at by the same process of reasoning that man employs. But it is a mere extension of mental associations. Thus, Newton's dog probably associated the idea of being hit and hurt with other falling bodies beside apples. And so, too, various circumstances might come to be associated with the falling of bodies, and thus complicate the mental process which occurred when he saw any object falling near him.

To show somewhat the extent to which this mental association operates in the brute mind, I will allude to some examples. A wren built its nest in a slate quarry, where it was liable to great disturbance from the blastings. It soon, however, learned to quit its nest, and fly off to a little distance, whenever the bell rang to warn the workmen previous to a blast. As this was noticed, the bell was sometimes rung when there was to be no blast, for the sake of the amusement in seeing the poor bird fly away when there was no need of alarm. At length, however, it ceased to be deceived in this way, and when it heard the bell ring it looked out to see if the workmen started, and if they did then it would leave its nest. In this case the bird merely learned to connect in its mental associations two circumstances with the blasting, instead of the one from which it at first took the warning. The operation of this mental association is shown in a little different manner in the following case. Some horses in a field were supplied with water in a trough which was occasionally filled from a pump. As the supply was not always sufficient, one of the horses, more sagacious than the rest, whenever he, on going to drink, found the trough empty, pumped the water into it by taking hold of the pump-handle with his teeth, and moving his head up and down. The other horses seeing this, would, whenever they came to the trough and found it empty, tease the one that knew how to pump, by biting and kicking him, till he would fill the trough for them. In this case the horse that did the pumping associated in his mind the motion of the pump-handle, as he had seen it done by his master, with the supply of water. And while they associated this supply with his pumping, he knew what their teasing him meant, because he associated it with their motions about the trough, indicating so plainly that what they wanted was water. But I will give a still stronger case. A dog belonging to a Frenchman was observed to go every Saturday, precisely at two o'clock, from his residence at Locoyarne to Hennebon, a distance of about three-quarters of a league. It was found that he went to a butcher's, and for the purpose of getting a feast of tripe which he could always have at that hour on Saturday, their day of killing. It is also related of this dog, that at family prayers he was always very quiet, till the last pater-noster was commenced, and then he would uniformly get up and take his station near the door, in order to make his exit immediately on its being opened. The narrator of these facts thinks that the first fact shows, that the dog could measure time and count the days of the week. But this can not be so. The dog undoubtedly associated in his mind the time at which he could get the tripe, with something that occurred on Saturday at that hour at his master's house, just as he associated the concluding of family prayers with something that occurred as the last pater-noster was read, perhaps with some peculiarity in the manner of his master when he came to that part of the service.

Animals learn the relation between cause and effect by this mental association, and act upon the experience thus gained. This is manifest in the examples I have cited. And it may be observed in many acts that we witness occasionally in the higher animals. Thus, for example, as my horse was cropping some grass, he took hold of some that was so stout, and yet so loosely set in the ground, that he pulled it up by the roots, and, as the dirt which was on it troubled him, he very deliberately knocked it across the bar of a fence till he got all the dirt out, and then went on to eat it. Here was a knowledge of cause and effect which was derived from previous experience through mental association. You see the same thing when you see a cat jump up and open the latch of a door, or a horse unbolt the stable door to get out to his pasture. But in all such cases the knowledge of cause and effect differs from the same knowledge in man in one important particular. In the animal it is always an individual knowledge; that is, a knowledge of individual facts; while in man it is often a knowledge which has relation to general truths or principles.

From the facts stated in the last few paragraphs it is clear, that Carpenter is not correct in saying, that "the mind of man differs from that of the lower animals, rather as to the degree in which the reasoning faculties are developed in him, than by any thing peculiar in their kind." While there is much in common between them in their modes of mental action, especially if man be compared with other animals in the period of his infancy and childhood, there is, as you have seen, one attribute of the human mind which is wholly peculiar to it, and never exists in any degree in any other animal. And this attribute, the power of abstract reasoning, or, in other words, the power of deducing general truths or laws from collections of individual facts, constitutes the great superiority of the human mind, in distinction from the mind of the brute.

It is this attribute which is the source of language in man. This can be readily seen by observing what is the nature of language. It is a collection of corresponding vocal and written signs of an arbitrary character, arranged according to certain general rules or principles. Other animals do have a kind of language of a very limited character. It is the language of natural signs. It is composed of cries and motions, which vary in different tribes of animals, so that each tribe may be said to have its own natural language. But animals never invent and agree upon any arbitrary signs, as is done continually by mankind in the construction and extension of language. This they can not do, because abstract reasoning is required for such an invention.

General principles are observed in the construction and arrangement of arbitrary signs, and, as I have shown, brutes know nothing of principles.

This attribute also is the source of man's belief in a Creator. If he had not the power of deducing general truths from individual facts, he could neither discover the truth that there is a first great Cause, nor appreciate or even receive it, if it were communicated to him. Not the faintest shade of such an idea can be communicated to any of the inferior animals, however high their mental manifestations may be, and simply because the structure of their mind is such that they know nothing of general principles.

Man differs from other animals also in having a conscience, or a knowledge between right and wrong, and a sense of obligation in relation to it. This moral sense is supposed by some to be a mere result of the exercise of the power of abstract reasoning. But others suppose that the sense is implanted as a distinct quality or power, and that the office of the reasoning power in relation to it is to bring the evidence before it for its decision. I shall not discuss this point, but will merely remark in regard to this subject, that there is no doubt as to the existence of such a sense in man. Some attempt to throw doubt over it by pointing to its perversions, maintaining that it is a mere creature of circumstances, varying almost endlessly in different parts of the world. But it would be just as rational to attempt to show, that there is no such thing as a sense of the beautiful in man, by appealing to the evidences of perversions of taste, which ignorance, bad education, and foolish and novelty-loving fashion have induced.

In those cases in animals in which this moral sense has been supposed to exist, it is nothing but slavish fear. It has been said by some one that man is the god of the dog; but it is sacred trifling to compare the attachment of an animal to its master and its fear of his displeasure, with the intelligent regard of man for his Creator as a holy and benevolent being. We ordinarily recognize the distinction between man and animals, as to the existence of a conscience, in the language we use. We never attach the idea of moral character to the acts of an animal except by the force of association, and then only slightly and loosely. We are not apt to speak of punishing a dog, for this word implies a moral fault as the occasion of the infliction. We whip him, sometimes, simply to associate in his mind the smart with the act done, so as to prevent him from doing it again, and sometimes to vent our ill feeling for the harm done us on the poor dog that has so innocently done it. It is related of Sir Isaac Newton that he had a favorite little dog called Diamond, who, being left in his study, overset a candle among his papers, and thus burnt up the almost finished labors of many years, and yet the philosopher only said, "O Diamond! Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done." Newton was both a wise and a good man, and while he saw that whipping the dog would do no good in preventing any similar accident in future, he had no ill feeling to vent on poor Diamond, who certainly had a better and more rational master than most dogs have.

The mental distinction between man and animals may be thus summed up. The animal is governed by instinct, and in the higher orders by a kind of reasoning which is based upon mental association. Man has, in addition to instinct and this lower order of reasoning, the power of abstract reasoning. In the lower orders of animals probably instinct rules alone.

Instinct, you have seen, can not be improved by education. It always acts in the same way throughout the life of an animal, and through the succeeding generations of the tribe. It has no accumulated experience, either individual or traditional. But it is otherwise with the two kinds of reasoning power. These can be educated, and they have an experience. But here there is a marked difference between the two kinds of reasoning. The lower kind of reasoning, that of mere association, which is the only kind possessed by animals, is altogether individual, and is not at all traditional. However wise an animal may become, there is no transmission of his wisdom to his posterity. No animal can start from a point of knowledge gained by his ancestor, as a vantage-ground, and thus make greater advances than his predecessors. Each animal, in acquiring experience as to the relations of cause and effect, has to begin at the beginning, and learn every thing for himself. The higher form of reasoning, that which man alone possesses, is absolutely essential to the transmission of experience from one generation to another. It is necessary to the transmission even of that experience which is gathered by the other power of reasoning, as well as that which is gathered by itself. The amount of improvement which can be effected where there is only the lower kind of reasoning to act upon, is very wonderful in the case of some of the docile animals. The dog, the elephant, the monkey, etc., are familiar examples. By the skillful and persevering use of mental association in the training of animals, results can be obtained, that resemble very closely those which come from man's power of abstract reasoning. And in some cases the animal accumulates quite a large individual experience. But his race is none the wiser for it. It is none of it transmitted to another generation.

We see then the basis of improvement in man. It is not his power of making inferences merely. The brutes do this. It is his power of making general inferences, or, in other words, deducing general laws or principles from individual facts. And as this power distinguishes man from the inferior animals, so a superior degree of it ordinarily constitutes the intellectual superiority of one man to another. This is seen very readily in inventions and discoveries.

When this characteristic power of the mind of man is fully developed, its achievements are often so wonderful, that they give us some realization of the great truth, that man is created in the image of God. As we witness the demonstration of such facts as Newton discovered, or the unerring calculations of an eclipse, or listen to a perfect argument as it develops grand truths, and leads us with a majesty of thought almost divine, straight on to mighty conclusions, we take in the full meaning of the assertion, that "the soul is that side of our nature which is in relation with the Infinite," and we see the folly of those dreamers in science, that look upon man as making merely the highest order in the animal kingdom. We see that the chasm between him and other animals is truly "impassable." We see that we are in a mental region of which the most intelligent of them know nothing—that though they live like us, having the same senses, seeing the same beautiful things, and hearing the same voices of nature, and like us have thoughts, and emotions, and desires, they are shut out from an upper region of thought and feeling in which we freely roam, and from which we look with aspirations unknown to them to another world beyond.

CROWNS OF REJOICING.

SWEET and wholesome thoughts are suggested by the affectionate and endearing appellations which the apostle Paul applies to Christians: "My brethren, dearly beloved and longed for; my joy and crown; my dearly beloved." "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ, at his coming? for ye are our glory and joy." What tenderness, what love, what confidence, what deference, too, are breathed from his very heart in these expressions!

THE MOTHER'S DREAM.*

BY KATE HARRINGTON.

WEARILY the mother's eyelids
For a moment closed,
While the little one beside her
Peacefully reposed.
And, as from her heart was lifted
All its weight of care,
Came there to her soul a vision
Beautifully fair.

Noiselessly a form descended Clothed in snowy white,
From whose pinions seem suspended
Beams of golden light.
And a glorious, shining pathway
Marked the way it came,
Till it hovered o'er her darling,
Whispering its name.

Then it sang a sweet, low anthem,
Learned in realms of day,
Till it charmed the guileless spirit
From its house of clay.
And it clasped the part immortal
Fondly to its breast,
Leaving nothing, save the casket,
On its couch to rest.

Wildly throbbed the dreamer's bosom,
As her cheek was fanned
By light pinions, gliding upward
To the spirit-land.
Then the yearning love within her
Oped her tear-dewed eyes,
And she found the jewel lent her
Gathered to the skies.

FRIENDSHIP.

BY H. N. POWERS.

I SAW a blue-eyed, artless child,
Beneath a snow-wreath trace his name.
The sun was on his cheek—he smiled,
And thought 'twould gild his words the same;
But though the beamy kiss was dear,
Each letter faded with a tear.

I saw a sage, all worn and gray,
Scanning the starry scroll of fame;
And as his life-pulse ebb'd away,
He read in living light his name;
But Hate's dark froth dashed out the glow—
He perished with no name below.

I saw Affection's gentle hand
Upon a heart engrave its name;
Sweet Memory's dew the words embalmed,
And Hope beamed on it with its flame.
Two angels watched it as their prize;
Time sped—it bore it to the skies.

AFTER MANY DAYS.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

"WON'T John be surprised, though! and to think I earned it all myself, too! I'll strike his eye the first moment he comes in, for I shall have it stand right there under the looking-glass," and little Mrs. Strong rested the handle of her tin dipper on the edge of a large earthen bowl, half filled with rich pumpkin liquid, and glanced toward an opposite door which led into a small front parlor. You would have known at once that the thoughts of the little woman were very pleasant ones by the happy twinkling of her blue eyes, and the smiles that every now and then revealed the two dimples hidden just above the curving of her fair, smooth cheek.

It was a bright morning on the higher side of November, and the sunshine looked with a real Joan smile into the pleasant little kitchen, and wrote golden ballads on the striped carpeting, and laid its bright stereotyping upon the newly white-washed walls; but after all, the little woman by the table, with her checked apron and happy, beaming face, was the sweetest picture there. "I 'spose all the neighbors will stare dreadfully when they see it," continued Mrs. Strong, as she deposited the contents of her ladle in the heart of a rich pie-crust, "but I'm sure they can't say that I'm extravagant, as I earned the whole sofy with my own hands, taking in those plain shirts from Williams. I always thought the parlor looked dreadfully bare, too, with nothing but the table and the chairs, and those pictures over the mantle. I must hurry along with this baking to ride over to town with farmer Williams, and engage them to send it over to-morrow. How cheap it was—with that carving on top, too! It was as much as I could do to keep from telling John what I'd set about doing when he was here in September; but I'm so glad now I contrived to hold my tongue. Bless me, there's baby waking up in just the wrong time, too!" The low cry of the half-awakened child put all Mrs. Strong's dreams to flight, as she hurried into the bedroom.

They were poor people—the Strong's. You must have guessed that already, reader; but the sunshine looked into many a gorgeous parlor, and lay in rosy flakes about the crimson drapery of many a palace home, and found less of real happiness and heart-light than dwelt behind the chintz curtains of John Strong's cottage, in the suburbs of the little village in L——.

He was a journeyman carpenter, it is true; and his wages were low, and his employment often called him, for months, from his young wife, and the sweet child that of late had come to gladden his home; but their memories always lay like dew and sunshine about his strong, honest heart, and nerving it for its daily toil, and gathering round his pillow sweet home dreams, which many a rich man might have envied.

John had been absent from home since the late summer, and the days were now hanging on the skirts of winter. No wonder the wife's heart quickened at the thought of his return.

"There, I've got just tart enough left for another pie," said Mrs. Strong—it was a strange habit she had of talking to herself—as she scoloped with her thumb and forefinger the rim of her last pie. "I'm sure I don't know what to do with it. We've got enough to last a whole week after thanksgiving, and—dear me, why didn't I think of it before?" continued the amiable little woman, as she achieved the first crust circle, "I'll fix it as nice as I know how, and give it to that little boy across the street. Poor little fellow! I don't b'lieve he or his mother have had any thanksgiving, for I've a notion they're terrible poor. She looks like a real lady when I've seen her in the garden, and her large eyes and pale, mournful features always make my heart ache, though somehow I never yet could find courage to speak to her. The boy shall have the pie though, that's certain. I'll call him across the street and give it to him, may be 'twill open the way to make acquaintance."

"Little boy, little boy, just come across the road here, I've got something for you."

The child was standing in the front door of the old brown building, and the November wind was sifting through the long golden curls that dropped like a bright cloud about his fair child-face, as he looked wistfully up and down the road, when Mrs. Strong's voice arrested him.

She was leaning over the little white gate, and there was something in her face that would have brought almost any child to her side. The boy did not wait for a second invitation.

"Come in, just a minute," said Mrs. Strong, in her kind, motherly way, as she took his hand and led him into the kitchen, "here's a nice thanksgiving tart pie I've been making for you to-day. Don't you love pie, little man?"

A sudden light gathered into the brown eyes of the child. "Yes, ma'am," he said, "I love it, and so does mother, too."

"Does she? Well, I think it's quite too bad we haven't been more neighborly since you came here. My name's Mrs. Strong; now, what's yours?"

"My name's Willie Gregory, ma'am," replied the child, with his eyes fastened on the pie.

"And your mother and you live all alone across the road, don't you?" queried Mrs. Strong, as she parted away the golden curls from the fair, broad forehead.

"Yes, ma'am, we've lived alone since papa died; it was a long time ago, and mother hasn't hardly smiled since." The little fellow's lip quivered, his eyes grew moist, and the tears hung like twin dew-drops on his long brown lashes.

"Dear me, haven't you any father? Poor child!" Mrs. Strong spoke with a choking in her throat and a quick glance toward the cradle in the corner.

"I like you," said the child, drawing up closer to the little woman, and resting his hand in hers. "I shall tell mother so, and when she gets well I'll ask her to come over and see you. You see she's sick now, and we didn't have any dinner to-day. I don't know what we shall do, for mamma says she hasn't any money, and can't get to grandpa. He lives a long ways off, you see."

Mrs. Strong did not speak another word; she rose up quickly and went into the pantry—a moment later she returned, carrying in one hand a large bowl of bread and milk, in the other a plate of cake.

"Now, Willie, sit right down here," she said, placing a chair by the table, "and eat till you can't eat another mouthful. Haven't had any dinner—poor child! poor child!"

It was a pleasant scene that the dying day-beams looked in to see that beautiful boy, as he turned from the table to Mrs. Strong's face and said, while the large spoon was poised awkwardly in his little red fingers, "O, ma'am, it tastes good, so good, and I was so hungry."

"Well, then, Willie, don't stop to talk about it, only eat—eat just as long as you can," Mrs. Strong answered, with tears of genuine womanly sympathy glistening and sparkling in their travel down her cheeks.

"Mamma will be so frightened if I stay any longer," said Willie at last, laying down the spoon, for he had obeyed to the letter Mrs. Strong's repeated injunctions. "Please, ma'am, can't I go now, and take the pie, too?"

"Yes; and, Willie, I want you to tell your mother that I'm coming over to see her this evening."

A low, soft voice answered to Mrs. Strong's knock. She opened the door and went in. No wonder she started at the story of utter destitution the opening of that door revealed.

A tallow candle was burning on the table, and the light flowed over the pale brow of the woman who lay on the bed in one corner.

"Your boy said you were ill, Mrs. Gregory," said Mrs. Strong, advancing to the bedside, "and I thought I would just run over and see if there was any thing I could do for you."

"You are very kind, ma'am, and—" the words were broken by a quick sob, the woman placed her hand over her eyes, and the tears trickled fast as April drops through her small slender fingers. "It is very foolish in me to give way in this manner," at last murmured the invalid, recovering herself, and giving her hand to Mrs. Strong, but it is so long since I have heard any words of sympathy that your kindness makes quite a child of me."

Her lady-like manner was so strangely in contrast with her meager surroundings, that the quick, tender little heart of Mrs. Strong was more touched than ever. "If you were only able to walk over to my house," she said, "I could fix you very comfortably; but as you can't do that, I must make up a fire here and bring you over a cup of tea; we can talk afterward, you know," she added, anticipating the thanks of the invalid; for Mrs. Strong's benevolence always partook more largely of a practical than a theoretical character.

A little later, when a bright wood fire was lifting its columns of ruddy flame up the black mouth of the chimney, and dropping its crimson glow on the bare walls of the uncarpeted floor, Mrs. Gregory sat up on her low couch, and, with her hand fastened in Mrs. Strong's, she told briefly the story which never before had crossed her lips.

Her father was a wealthy widower, and she had been the very "light of his eyes." Her feet came up through life's brightest sunshine to her nineteenth summer, and then a very dark shadow dropped over the sunshine. Mrs. Gregory's father was desirous she should wed a friend of his—a millionaire—and a man thirty years her senior. The young, fresh heart of the girl of nineteen shrank with terror from a union so wholly antagonistic to her tastes and feelings. For the first time her father spoke harshly to her: "Ellen, it is useless to rebel against my authority. I have sworn that you shall be his wife."

And that night Ellen went out from her father's home and returned to it the wife of her distant cousin, William Gregory, and the doors were closed against her.

The newly-made husband took his young wife to a southern city. He was poor, and she had brought him none of her father's vast wealth; but he obtained a lucrative situation in a large mercantile house, and Ellen Gregory forgot her early home in the quiet bliss of the six years of her wedded life. Then all its light went out very suddenly. In less than a week her husband sickened and died of fever, and his young, tenderly reared wife was left with her child without pecuniary resources in a land of strangers.

After the burial of her husband Mrs. Gregory resolved to return to her father, of whom she had heard nothing for several years.

A violent fever, induced by mental agony, brought her to the brink of the grave before she had completed her journey. She partially recovered, to find that her small stock of money would hardly defray the expense of her long illness. In the excitement of the moment she resolved to achieve the remainder of the journey on foot, and had accomplished about twenty miles. Her course had lain through L——. Physically and mentally exhausted, she learned, at the tavern where she stopped, that there was an old brown house in the suburbs to rent. She had secured two rooms of this, and for the last six weeks had managed to procure herself and her boy a precarious subsistence by the sale of her clothing.

"I have written my father several letters," was the conclusion of the sad history, "but they have been returned to me unopened, and yet I know," and the invalid lifted her head from the pillow, while the light kindled like a flame in her dark eyes, and the hectic burned in the hollow of either cheek, bright as a Damascus rose, "I know if I could see him—if I could go in suddenly, pale and dying, with my child by my side—if I should put out my arms and cry, 'Father, it is your Ellen—the Ellen that sat every night by your side, and was held every morning to your heart, and she has come back to you with her child; do not send her away, for she has come back only to die; I know that he would open his arms and say, with all his old tenderness, 'Ellen, my darling,' and when I rushed into them his tears would drop as fast as his kisses used to on the forehead of his child. His heart is proud and self-willed, but I know it well; there is a fountain there very far down, whose waters will never dry up—it is his love for his child."

"And how much would it cost for you to reach him?" asked Mrs. Strong, with a fresh shower of tears, as the beautiful invalid sank exhausted on the pillow.

"Just thirty dollars, and I can not raise one of it. O, it is not for myself that I care, but for him! In a little while he will be motherless." She pointed to the golden head that lay close to her heart, and Mrs. Strong felt that her prophecy was a true one, as she looked on those glassy eyes, on the sharp features, and the hectic hollow in either cheek; for she knew it was the mournful chirography of consumption.

* * * * *

"Thirty dollars! how I wish I had it! how gladly I would give it to her!" soliloquized little Mrs. Strong the next morning, as she drew the white coverlet over her slumbering babe and printed a light kiss on the sweet cheek, fair as a half-ripened peach blossom, as it broke over the snowy pillow.

Suddenly the mother started, and caught her breath at the thought that had flashed into her mind. In one corner of the little cupboard over the mantle-piece was a broken tea-urn, and in that broken tea-urn, carefully wrapped up in brown paper, were the thirty dollars she had been so long and diligently earning—the thirty dollars she had consecrated to her new sofa. The little woman rose up and walked the room in a hurried, perplexed manner; her cheek was flushed, and her brow was plaited, and the blue eyes of the angels looked down into her heart as she walked round the kitchen. "I've thought so much about that sofa," she murmured to herself; "I've dreamed about it at night, till it really seemed as if I'd got it, set up snugly in the parlor, and now it will be so hard to give it up," and the tears sparkled in her bright eyes. "I'd so set my heart upon it. But, then, there's that poor, dying woman and her little helpless boy—supposing it was my Mary, now?" and the young mother turned to the cradle and gazed, with overflowing eyes, a moment on the sweet sleeper there.

She did not hesitate any longer. She went to the cupboard and took down the broken tea-urn, and the blue eyes of the angels grew full of light.

An hour later Mrs. Strong entered the chamber where Mrs. Gregory was lying. She carried a small tray in one hand, and the smoke was rolling like a cloud of incense about the mouth of the tea-pot, and the toast looked very tempting, as it lay floating in its ocean of fresh milk. There was a saucer of mince-meat for Willie, too. No wonder his eyes grew brightly when he looked on it.

"Now let me fix your pillows nicely, so you can eat it at your ease," said Mrs. Strong, in her kind, bustling way. "There's the fire, too, I must brighten that up a little. I knew 'twouldn't go out; trust me for keeping a fire all night. Slept better, did you, after I left?"

"Willie, when you get through with your breakfast, if your mother's willing, won't you run over and sit by the cradle? Mary'll be awake before long, and you can play with her, you know, till I come back."

* * * * *

"Mrs. Gregory"—Mrs. Strong had come close to the bedside and was playing with her apron-string in a kind of awkward manner—"you said, last night, that thirty dollars would take you to your father. Well, I happened to think this morning I had just that sum on hand, and as I've no special, that is, no necessary use for it, why, you'll be welcome to it, so here it is," and she laid the roll of bills on the bed.

The bright eyes of the lady wandered from the money to the glowing face of the little woman, as though she did not at first comprehend her.

At last the blessed truth broke into her mind. She could not speak her gratitude; but the look of those eyes was lithographed forever in Mrs. Strong's memory, as the lady grasped her hand and sobbed, "God will reward you for this, and I—O, if he will but spare my life!"

* * * * *

"O, my dear madam, you mustn't think of it! Starting to-day in your state of health! I'll have you removed over to our house, and in a few days—"

"I may have taken my last journey. Mrs. Strong, I beg you will not frustrate me in this. What I do must be done quickly. My days are numbered; and if I do not go to him now I shall never go. Will you add a little more to the great debt which I already owe you, by securing me and Willie passages in the next stage?"

And Mrs. Strong looked on that pale, pleading face and yielded.

* * * * *

"John, did you not hear my orders? I will see no one this morning."

The old man looked up from his writing-desk with a dark frown, and the sunlight, that came in rosy smiles through the heavy damask curtains, looked very mournful as it tangled itself with his gray hairs.

"But the lady, sir; she will not be refused, and she looks so white and strange."

"Father!" What a cry that was! It wailed along the lofty walls, and the servant grew pale, and the old man sprang from his seat. She rushed wildly in—his daughter—he knew her at the first glance, though the cold, white features were all so unlike that beautiful being whom he had last seen in the flush of her ripened girlhood.

"Father," she cried, stretching out her arms, "I have come back to die. O will you not take me to your heart once more before I go home to mother in heaven!"

He looked on his daughter and her child, and the pride of many years gave way, and the stern heart at last yielded.

He opened his arms, and with a low, glad cry she sank into them.

"Yes, Nelly, darling, you shall come back here—right here to my heart, as in the old time," he said, while his tears and his kisses dropped a blessed baptismal of affection on her forehead. "You have been gone a long time, daughter—so long that your cheek has lost its bloom and your eyes the old laughter; but we will bring it back again, my pet, my treasure. Do you know how this old heart has ached for you? Look up, Nellie, and say you forgive me!" But, alas! alas! she did not look up, for she had gone, as she said, to her mother in heaven.

* * * * *

White winters and rosy summers—a score of them—had cast anchor upon the shores of the past, when, one afternoon, a young and noble-looking man stepped into a fashionable clothing saloon on Broadway and inquired why some work had not been sent home the evening previous, as had been promised.

"I am very sorry, sir," said the obsequious foreman, "but the young woman who promised to finish the wristbands has been quite ill. Tom," turning to one of the clerks, "when did Mary Strong say she would send that work in?"

"Mary Strong," repeated the young man with a sudden start, his fine dark eyes kindling with eagerness. "Who is she? Where does she reside?"

The address was furnished, and without another word he left the store.

* * * * *

"How I wish I was sleeping there, close by mamma, among the cool clover-blossoms, and the wind stirring the long grass all about me! O, I should sleep there so sweetly, and I am so very weary!" and the work dropped from the young girl's fingers, and the tears fell fast over her pale, fair cheeks, as she sat there in that old chamber, where the May sunshine only came in faint and broken. It would have made your heart ache to see her, so young, so fair, so wretched.

"How hot my head is! and it aches so, I can not see the stitches. O, if those sharp pains would not run over all my limbs—" There was a knock at the door, and the young seamstress started up, and exerting her remaining strength walked toward it.

"Good afternoon, ma'am." The young stranger lifted his hat to the seamstress in that miserable chamber with courtly grace, and his eyes were fastened with eagerness on the face whose exceeding loveliness shone out in strange contrast with the poverty about it. "May I inquire if I address Miss Mary Strong?"

"That is my name, sir." The girl's blue eyes were filled with wonder and alarm.

"And did your parents ever reside in L——?"

"Yes, sir, and my mother is buried there;" she said it with quivering lips.

"Ah! it must be the same, then. Surely God's own hand must have directed my steps this afternoon. Will you allow me to walk in? I have something to tell you which intimately concerns us both."

And sitting there in that miserable chamber, he told her a story of the past; how her mother had saved his own and himself from starvation; and how, in that last journey, when she went home to die, she had made him promise that at some future day he would repay tenfold the great debt that he owed her family.

"I remember all," he said; "child as I was, I remember, too, the blue eyes of the baby girl that opened upon me, like an angel's, as I kept watch by her cradle that morning."

"And I remember mamma's often speaking of the beautiful lady and her boy, and wondering what became of them," answered the young girl. But the surprise proved too great a one; her head dropped, and with a low moan she would have fallen to the floor had not William Gregory caught her in his arms.

"Goodness alive! mister William, what on earth have you got there?"

No wonder the old woman's eyes seemed starting from their sockets as she met the young master of the mansion in his hall, with that fair, unconscious girl, which he and a domestic were bearing toward the parlor.

"No matter now, nurse. In a little while you shall know all, only send Tom for a doctor, quick."

* * * * *

Two years more had joined the past. In one of the parlors of his elegant home sat William Gregory and Mary Strong. It was evening, and the light from the two large astrals fell in soft billows on her golden hair and May-blue eyes.

The shadows of the past had all gone off from her sweet face, and the purity of her fresh, happy heart was written on every feature, and yet there was a little shade of earnest purpose there, as she turned to the young man, saying, in reply to some remark of his, "Yes, Mr. Gregory, our term closed yesterday, and now I have been so long a pensioner upon your bounty it is surely quite time I was doing something for myself. If I could only procure a situation as assistant in some sem—"

"Mary, have you grown weary of your home, that you thus wish to try another?"

"O no, no!" Her lips grew tremulous and her eyes filled with tears. "You know I have been happy—so happy since I came here. It all seems like a long, bright dream; but then—"

"But, then, you want to teach. Well, Mary, you shall have a pupil," and he walked across the room and laid his hand gently on her shining hair.

"Will you take him?" he said, in tones whose thrilling tenderness the orphan could not misinterpret. "Will you share with him the wealth that his grandfather left him—the wealth that, but for your mother, he might never have received; and will you teach him by your gentle life and unswerving faith the way to that far-off land, upon whose shining heights both our mothers sit waiting—waiting for us!"

The head beneath his hand dropped slowly, and he saw the tears dripping on her lap, and he knew he was answered.

And, far above them, she who had "cast her bread upon the waters" looked down and found it "after many days."

A GOOD MAN'S WISH.

I FARELY confess to you, that I would rather, when I am laid in the grave, some one in his manhood should stand over me and say, "There lies one who was a real friend to me, and privately warned me of the dangers of the young! no one knew it, but he aided me in the time of need. I owe what I am to him." Or I would rather have some widow, with choking utterance, tell her children: "There is your friend and mine. He visited me in my affliction, and found you, my son, an employer, and you, my daughter, a happy home in a virtuous family." The heart's broken utterance of reflections of past kindness, and the tears of grateful memory shed upon the grave, are more valuable, in my estimation, than the most costly canopaph ever reared.—Dr. Sharp.

SMALL TALK OF LADIES.

BY MARY E. FRY.

SSMALL talk of ladies! To tell the truth, that is not a very inviting caption to meet the eye of certain strong-minded women in these United States, who are to be found on the list of modern females, if any where at all. That some of them, at least, had stronger minds, is a thing "to be devoutly wished for;" for who knows how much good they might do if they only knew how, and having found the path were willing to walk therein!

Well, then, it does seem to us in these days of "woman's rights conventions," and of reforms, whose name is legion, that one thing is entirely overlooked or forgotten, and that is, a thorough reformation in the general conversation of the fair sex. Ladies—women is getting to be an obsolete term nowadays—does it never occur to your minds what a little common sense, and what a deal of nonsense enters into your conversation when a number of you get together of an afternoon or evening? Do you not sometimes feel heartily ashamed when you reflect what a little has been said that was really worth the saying? Certainly you do. Why not, then, immediately set on foot a world-wide reformation, by each one in particular reforming her own dear self? You are all more or less ambitious; now here is a field in which you may safely venture as a reformer.

If nothing better offers, why not, as a last—perhaps we should have said a first—resort, organize purely intellectual conversational societies, somewhat on the model of those established in Hannah More's time? If, in those days of fashionable dissipation, social gatherings could be sustained where cards and plays were excluded, may we not hope the same, and even a better thing could be accomplished by the females of our own times?

The general diffusion of education, intellectual and religious, among females of our own day, is far in advance of the times of Hannah More and Doctor Johnson; why, then, is there not a corresponding advancement in their conversation and literary attainments? How is it that the educated females of those days were so brilliant in conversation with men of learning? Turn, for a moment, to the large numbers leaving our female colleges and seminaries annually, whose parchments proclaim them classical scholars. Do you find one in three hundred who is a Latinist with Sir Thomas More's daughter Margaret? Or one in twice that number reading Greek with a Lady Jane Gray? And how many will you find pursuing any particular branch of learning or science with the industry and success of Mrs. Sumnerville?

As just stated, the general diffusion is far greater than formerly, but the individual devotion really seems to be lacking among modern females.

In this short article we can not even touch the real cause, much less would our limits permit us to prescribe a remedy; there is but room to ask the question, Whence comes this universal attempting of every thing and the accomplishment of comparatively nothing? Right glad, we are sure, would the community of sensible people be, to see something like a reformation take place among the ladies on the subject of literary attainments, of conversation in general, and conferring of "degrees" promiscuously.

SPRING.

BY REV. GEORGE LOVSEK.

WINTER's fairly over!

Hear the gusty wind
Breathing out its fury—
Telling all its mind.

Little birds and crickets
Chirrup now, nor sing;
But they'll greet, with music,
Later days of spring.

Farmers, are ye ready?
Spring is here indeed;
Up, be up and doing,
Sowing precious seed.

Warmer days of summer,
Drops of fruitful rain,
Wooing, bless and brighten
Blushing fields of grain.

Spring and summer over,
Autumn, from his crest,
Shall shake off a harvest
Of the very best.

These are but the symbol
Of a better day;
Then, to fill our garner,
Let us watch and pray.

Moments measure ages—
Ages yet to be—
Just as DROPS OF WATER
Fill the SWELLING SEA!

Character neglected;
Virtue overrun;
Every hope is blasted;
Mortals are undone.

Look beyond the present,
Mourn our time misspent;
And may deeds of mercy
Build our monument!

PENCILINGS AND PORTRAITS OF FEMALE CHARACTER.

PIETY UNDER A CORONET—LADY SELINA HUNTINGDON.*

BY REV. DANIEL WISE.

MUNGO PARK, so celebrated for his extensive travels in Africa, and so lamented for his untimely end, once lost his way in a dreary desert. Wearied with long travel, half famished through long abstinence, dispirited because ignorant of the path leading to human habitations, he sat down and longed for death. As he gazed upon the vast wilderness which surrounded him, and thought of the five hundred weary miles which lay between him and the abodes of civilized man, of the savage beasts and more savage men inhabiting the deserts, and of his own utter helplessness, despair rolled in dark and oppressive clouds over his subdued soul. But in that dark moment his eye rested on some moss of extraordinary beauty, displaying all the vigor of healthy growth. Having a highly cultivated love of the beautiful in his nature, this modest plant arrested his attention, and, for the moment, threw a spell over his sad thoughts, diverting them from the sources of his despair to itself. He admired its strange beauty; he wondered at the Divine care which had nourished it to such perfection in that wild solitude, till he heard a voice in his inmost soul, saying, "Can He whose wisdom cherished this moss be unconcerned for thee, a creature bearing his own image?" His heart answered its own question. He felt rebuked for his despondency. His confidence in God revived. New strength animated his exhausted frame, and, starting up, he resumed his journey, and happily escaped the perils of the wilderness.

Is not this picture of the poor, solitary Mungo Park catching the inspiration of hope from a tuft of delicate moss growing in the midst of a vast desert very beautiful? Has it not a moral, too? If he could derive impulses to fresh exertion from a tuft of moss, should not timid, desponding Christians learn lessons of hope and faith from the examples of such as have maintained a lofty piety under circumstances eminently fitted to put their graces to the strongest test? We think so. Hence, we wish to exhibit the life and character of the LADY SELINA, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON, to our readers. They will find in her a lady who maintained the most exalted piety, through a long life, in that most difficult of spheres, the society of a proud, worldly, almost infidel, aristocracy.

Nearly one hundred and thirty years since, two ladies were seated, gravely conversing together, in an apartment of an old English mansion, situated in Donnington Park, Leicestershire. Both of them were in the full glory of early womanhood. Their air, bearing, manner, and dress indicated that they were no common personages, but that they belonged to the upper circles of society. Their conversation was earnest and serious. The countenance of one was radiant with the light of infelt joy, while a cloud saddened the intelligent features of the other. At last the former, as if summing up her previous statements to her friend, said, with emphasis, "Since I have known and believed in the Lord Jesus Christ for life and salvation, I have been as happy as an angel!"

This remark, confirmed as it was by the heavenly aspect of the fair speaker, only caused the other lady to wear a still sadder brow. Retiring shortly after to her chamber, she suffered intense mental distress. The testimony of her friend had inflicted a deep wound in her spirit. True, her life had not a vicious stain upon its surface. She had lived in almost pharisaic devotion to the forms of religion, since a well-remembered hour in her girlhood, in which, while gazing on the solemn pageantry, the pomp of funeral plumes and badges wreathed in crape, which attended the burial of a lamented playmate, she saw, with fearful distinctness, the emptiness of worldly things, and exclaimed, as the earth rattled on her dear friend's coffin, "O God, be my God, when my hour shall come!" But notwithstanding all this, she now felt that the true life had not been begotten in her spirit. To the faith which had wrought such divine joy in the soul of her friend she was an utter stranger, and her unsatisfied heart groaned in agony after that union with its Creator, which is the sole condition of its bliss. She felt her spirit to be a harp which could not yield its sweetest sounds unless its chords were swept by the breath of the Holy Spirit.

Cherishing this conviction, despite the pain it caused, and the departure of her happy friend having left her without a spiritual guide, the unrest of her mind became intolerable. She fell sick. While suffering pain of mind and body, a whisper in her heart bade her try to seek peace by means of that faith in Christ which had yielded such delightful fruitage of peace to her friend. Obeying this divine impulse, she cast herself upon Jesus, and found her heart sweetly at rest.

*A very entertaining memoir of this lady may be found among the recent publications of the American Tract Society. It is, I believe, the only biography of her ladyship published in America.

The hand of almighty love touched the chords of her affections, and they yielded music so sweet that she, too, became "happy as an angel."

The lady thus converted was SELINA, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON. The friend, whose testimony was the lancet which wounded her spirit, was Lady Margaret Hastings, her husband's sister, who, moved by curiosity to hear Mr. Wesley and his coadjutors, had been led to embrace the cross of Christ. Both were ladies of illustrious birth; but they both learned to prize their relation to Christ infinitely more than their connections with the proudest families of the proudest aristocracy in the world.

Lady Huntingdon's maiden name was SELINA SHIRLEY. Her father was Earl Ferrass. She was born on the 24th of August, 1707, and married to Theophilus, Earl of Huntingdon, at the age of twenty-one. Her earlier years were spent in the quietude of Chartley Castle, the seat of her ancestors. After her marriage, she moved, as was her right, in the most stately circles of the British nobility, and formed intimate acquaintanceship with the most literary of the nobles, with the wits, authors, and poets who graced the reigns of George the First and George the Second. The elegance and dignity of her person, the natural and graceful affability of her manners, the strength and clearness of her intellect, fitted her to shine at court, and to wield a queenly power over cultivated wits. But though compelled by the duties of her exalted station to mingle with gay and wicked nobles, she never yielded to the fascinations of those splendid follies, in the pursuit of which they were accustomed to pass their lives. The impression made upon her mind at her playmate's grave, her serious and reflective turn of mind, with her early developed aspirations after a higher life, shielded her spirit against the seductive influences of worldly amusements. Hence, up to the time of her conversion, we behold her sustaining the character of a zealous legalist, seeking salvation by deeds of charity, by acts of self-denial, and by a diligent observance of the forms of religion. But after she found that righteousness which is by faith, her life was filled up with labors for her Lord. During her youth and early womanhood she was an amiable Pharisee. In her maturity she was a noble and elect lady, doing the work of a disciple in the loftiest spirit of self-denying evangelism.

Lady Huntingdon's conversion was thorough and decided. It gave birth to a holy love for Christ, which became at once the ruling affection of her nature. Yielding herself fully to its claims, it gave character to her life, and became a perennial spring of bliss to her spirit. Hence her Christian experience, from first to last, was deep, rich, and delightful. "How solid," she writes to Charles Wesley, shortly after her conversion, "is the peace, and how divine the joy, that springs from an assurance that we are united to the Savior by a living faith! Blessed be his name!" Writing to the amiable Philip Doddridge, shortly after the death of her husband, in 1746, she says, "I am satisfied with every misery Christ does not redeem me from, that, in all things, I may feel without him I can do nothing." "My hopes are full of immortality."

Thus cherishing faith, love, and submission to the Divine will, this excellent lady continued to enter more and more deeply into the things of God to the end of her long life. Though her personal afflictions were many and severe, her duties, cares, and responsibilities numerous and weighty, and fiery trials at times powerfully tried her faith, yet we find no abatement in her spirituality, no falling off in her religious labors, no period of spiritual decay in any portion of her history. At the command of her chosen Lord, her inner life beamed into beautiful being like the morning sun; and, like the sun, that life rose with an ever-unfolding glory, till it reached the zenith of its loveliness, and was removed to shine with still greater luster in a nobler sphere. As a spiritual disciple, Lady Huntingdon must be ranked with Fletcher and his pious consort, with Lady Maxwell, with Wesley, and other devoted spirits who shone, stars of mighty magnitude, during the epoch of England's great awakening.

But it was not in spirituality alone that Lady Huntingdon excelled ordinary believers. For her unquenchable zeal for souls, her self-denying benevolence, her holy courage, her incessant activity in the cause of Christ, her various modes of aiding the spread of truth, she deserves to be ranked with the very first of the champions of Jesus. At the time of her conversion, Britain was thrilling with the first agitations of the great Wesleyan revival. Multitudes were embracing the faith of Christ; but greater multitudes were persecuting its advocates and heaping scorn upon its converts. Great men in Church and state, with the most powerful minds in the walks of literature, were particularly hostile to it; and whoever embraced it in the upper walks of life was sure to be counted an enthusiast, and despised as a fanatic. Fully aware of all this, Lady Huntingdon, from the moment of her conversion, braved the world's scorn. Her first act almost was to send for Mr. Wesley, and to openly identify herself with the great revival movement of the day. Peeress though she was, her presence graced the meetings of Wesley and his fellow-laborers. Soon she flung herself into the thickest of the battle. After her husband's death, which occurred when she was only thirty-nine years of age, she drew the most spiritual of the English clergy around her; appointed them her chaplains; held religious services in her saloons for the benefit of the highest members of the aristocracy, whom she took special pains to invite. She made journeys over large portions of England, accompanied by the eloquent Whitefield, the devoted Venn, the laborious Shirley, the blunt-spoken Berridge, the sweet-spirited Romaine, the saintly Fletcher, and their kindred spirits. These mighty men of God preached to vast multitudes, wherever her ladyship stopped to rest while on her journey, with wonderful effect. When the Established churches were closed against these holy ministers, she built chapels for their use—in great part at her own expense. When bishops refused ordination to pious youth, and college professors procured their expulsion from England's ancient halls of learning, because they were overmuch righteous, she founded colleges for their instruction. Thus, in every possible way, shrinking from no obloquy, shunning no difficulty, did this admirable woman throw the axis of her influence over the evangelical movement, and promote the growth of Christ's kingdom on earth. So unbounded were her benevolent sacrifices for her Master's work, that she spent all her munificent fortune in promoting it. She even denied herself the luxuries of her social position. At one time she sold her jewels for some thirty-five hundred dollars, and expended the money in erecting a chapel. Toward the close of her life, she reduced her domestic establishment far below what was deemed suitable to the dignity of a peeress, and even restricted herself in the matter of apparel to one new dress a year! All this was done that she might have money to spend for God!

We do not pretend that her ladyship was faultless, however, for she was human. But considering her high birth, the aristocratic and anti-evangelical influences which surrounded her, the multitude and magnitude of her enterprises, and the peculiarity of the times, the occasional manifestations of an imperial will, the unbending, almost harsh, determination with which she carried out her plans, regardless of individual opinion, which her life exhibited, must be considered venial faults—slight specks, scarcely discernible in the moral splendor which envelops her entire character. Perhaps it may not be extravagant to say, that a better and more useful woman than Lady Huntingdon has never lived.

Her death was worthy of her life. It was a gorgeous sunset at the close of a long, brilliant day. "I am well; all is well—well forever. I see wherever I turn my eyes, whether I live or die, nothing but victory." "I am as in the element of heaven itself," was her language when the death-angel brought her the summons to depart. And when her last moment came, she smiled, said, "My work is done; I have nothing to do but to go to my Father," and died! It was a lovely spectacle to witness this elect matron of eighty-four years of age, in full possession of all her faculties, gazing with such calmness in the face of death. It was fitting that she should depart from the field of her many labors with such a song of triumph pouring from her withered lips. Happy Countess! Her toils and sacrifices were richly rewarded by such a death, and the luster of her immortal crown far transcends the glory of the coronet she despised on earth.

THE CONVERSION OF A MUTE.

BY REV. JAMES L. CLARK.

ALTHOUGH the age of miracles has ceased, and wonders of healing are seldom wrought on the bodies of mankind, yet we sometimes witness miracles of grace so astonishing as to extort even from the lips of infidelity the honest confession, "This is the finger of God." One of these wonderful displays of grace which passed under my own notice was the conversion of a mute, at a time and under circumstances which were calculated to silence skepticism and glorify God.

In a settlement about three miles from P., a small town in Western Virginia, among others, there was a family of four or five young men and boys, from sixteen up to about twenty-five years of age, who were studying the works of Paine and other infidel writers. They were young men of more than ordinary reading and intelligence for that community, and were exerting a pernicious influence over the minds of the young people in the neighborhood. Joined with amiability, and, in other respects, irreproachable moral character, there was a perseverance about them in spreading their opinions which was worthy of a better cause. The leaven of infidelity had its influence through the neighborhood till the pious and God-fearing portion of the community became seriously alarmed. In their anxiety they fled to God for help, and in the fervency of their souls entreated him to stay this tide of destruction, and save their children from being swallowed up in this whirlpool of Satan. Nor was prayer the only means they used. Efforts were made; a meeting was appointed for united and public effort. A crisis had come. It was now to be determined whether Christianity should bless or infidelity curse their families.

The time for holding the meeting arrived. The children of God were there, and the followers of Paine were there also. Both parties seemed to feel that on the result of that meeting depended the success of their cause. Fervent were the prayers of God's people; vigorous were the efforts made by them to sustain the cause of their Savior. And as zealous and as persevering were the infidel party to oppose and blast the work of grace. But strong was the hand of God, and valiant was his right hand, and it triumphed gloriously. At first but little seemed accomplished, beyond an increasing seriousness among the people. After a while a few approached the altar, with streaming eyes, and hearts and lips of prayer, pleading for pardon through the merits of Jesus. Faith prevailed. The witness of the Spirit was given. And while some gave vent to their feelings of joy in shouts of praise, others, with glory beaming from their countenances, went and told their friends what God had done for their souls. This, according to infidelity, was fanaticism, enthusiasm, animal excitement, or something worse: the preachers gave them their lessons and told them what to do; they learned them to shout, and it was all hypocrisy. Thus as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, and Barjesus opposed Paul, so these men endeavored to oppose the truth and power of God. But the hour of their overthrow was at hand; a change was yet to come.

In this same neighborhood there resided a deaf and dumb young lady named Margaret B——n, who was regular in her attendance on the services of the meeting. At the institute at Stanton she had been taught to read and write. From reading her Bible she had obtained some knowledge of her condition as a sinner and some knowledge of the plan by faith in Jesus Christ. During the progress of the meeting her mind became deeply exercised upon the subject of her personal salvation. Although the exercises of the meeting were to some extent a blank to her, and though the Gospel's joyful sound and the voice of prayer and praise could not fall upon her ear, the power of God did reach her heart. And although her lips were sealed in silence, and could pour forth no confession of guilt, and in human language could not implore pardon, yet from the depths of her sin-sick soul, through her streaming eyes, flowed tears of penitence that fell in mercy's sight. At the mercy-seat, with groanings that could not be uttered, she presented the sacrifice of a broken and a contrite heart, which God did not despise. In that hour we felt the insufficiency of man. We could sympathize with her, but could not point her to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world. We could pray for her, but could not pour into her mind the precious promises of eternal truth. Hers was a solitary struggle. A struggle at which infidelity looked with surprise, if not with alarm.

In the hour of extremity, there was One who could not only sympathize with her, but who could relieve. That one was the Friend of sinners. He came to her rescue, and the hour of her release had arrived. One evening during the exercises at the altar a strange sound fell upon my ear. Turning round to see from whence it came, I saw Margaret upon her feet. The gloom that had overspread her countenance was gone. Every feature was lighted with an unearthly radiance, and seemed to beam forth with the effulgence of heaven. When I approached her she placed her hand upon her heart, and then, looking upward, pointed toward heaven, and clapped her hands in an ecstasy of joy, while in her efforts to speak her lips gave utterance to those strange sounds which had arrested my attention. If the tongue of the dumb did not then sing, the glad heart did dance for joy.

At this point of time I observed that our infidel friends were all in commotion. They had caught a sight of the converted mute, and, with feelings of the most intense curiosity, were pressing forward to get a nearer view. We promptly opened the way for them, so that they might get near her, and satisfy their curiosity. Foremost in the group stood Andrew G., in whose mind, if you might judge from appearance, a most intense struggle was going on. In the mean time the mute was passing among her female friends, pressing to her bosom those who were now as ready to rejoice with her while rejoicing as they had been to weep with her when weeping. While these things were passing, I took my position where I could watch the influence they might exert on the minds of the infidel party. The change in Margaret, with whom they were all well acquainted, was too manifest to be denied. How should they account for it? Would infidel philosophy explain the phenomenon? or would they, like the Jews, attribute the miracles of God to Satan? We shall see.

There they stood, gazing as if it were the last sight of earth. You could almost hear their hearts beat, while their faces grew white and red alternately. For a while their lips seemed as dumb as those of the converted girl. At length the leader of the party turned round to his comrades, and said, "Boys, this is not animal excitement. There is no deception in this. Margaret B. is no hypocrite. The preacher could not learn her to shout. There must be a divine reality in religion. I never saw any thing like this." Tears gushed from many of their eyes, and their hearts were subdued. Infidelity had received its death-blow, "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

The next night they were found at the altar of prayer, seeking salvation, while the work of the Lord went on gloriously. During the balance of the meeting the form of the mute might be seen passing along among the seekers of religion, looking earnestly upon their features, to catch the first smile of joy that illuminates the countenance when conversion takes place. And here was generally the first hand extended to welcome them into the family of God. The entire G. family were converted. One of them has since died a most happy and triumphant death. At our last conference another one took me by the hand, and, after referring to the past, remarked that he was making his arrangements to withdraw from worldly business, and at the next conference he expected to enter the itinerancy, and to spend his life in preaching the faith he once tried to destroy. Surely,

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

SIN.

Use sin as it will use you; spare it not, for it will not spare you; it is your murderer, and the murderer of the world; use it, therefore, as a murderer should be used. Kill it before it kills you; and though it kill your bodies, it shall not be able to kill your souls; and though it bring you to the grave as it did your head, it shall not be able to keep you there. If the thoughts of death, and the grave, and rottenness be not pleasant to you, hearken to every temptation to sin, as you would hearken to a temptation to self-murder, and as you would do if the devil brought you a knife, and tempted you to cut your throat with it: so do when he offereth you the bait of sin.

THE DAUGHTERS OF CHINA.*

BY REV. J. W. WILEY, M. D.

NOTWITHSTANDING the degrading position occupied by these females, and the low estimate placed upon them by their countrymen, we have yet hope in the daughters of China. There is but little in their social circumstances on which we can rest our hopes; but there is much in their character which inspires our confidence. The degradation and debasement in which they live can not altogether crush out of them the gentler feelings of woman's nature, and we find them still susceptible to the influence of virtuous example, and the offices of kindness and sympathy. When we think of them in their neglected seclusion, unloved and uncared for by man, unworthy of the expense and labor of even an elementary education, and left in the deepest ignorance, the prey to unmeaning superstitions, the victims of degrading national and religious institutions, and the mere instruments and creatures of man, there is little on which to build our hopes of reformation and improvement. But when we discover that in the midst of this degradation they preserve an interesting and promising character, and exhibit a nature superior to their position, and capable of development and refinement, we have confidence in the power of the Gospel to meet and alleviate their condition. Our confidence rests alone in the refining and ennobling power of the Gospel, and with any feeble instrumentality we would stand paralyzed before the gigantic evils which must be removed ere the daughters of China can be disenthralled and enlightened.

We say, that, in spite of the debasing influences which constantly operate upon them, the females of China still preserve an interesting and promising character. We have often looked upon them with admiration, and been struck with the contrast between their character and their position. In all cases we can not but discover and pity the ignorance in which they are kept. This is painfully visible in the empty and vacant expression of their countenances, in their light and trivial deportment, in their wonder and astonishment at new things and new facts, and, perhaps more than all, in the silly and unmeaning questions which they are perpetually asking. It is always easy, too, to detect in their movements the consciousness of their degradation and the sense of their inferiority. This appears most prominently in the presence of foreign females, whose freedom, accomplishments, and elegance they contemplate with admiration and astonishment. Their deportment is often such in the presence of other females, and in the quiet and happy circles of foreign domestic life, that one almost expects to hear mingling with their expressions of wonder sighs of regret that they are so low while others are so high. We have here an evidence of their painful realization of their own position, and of their appreciation and admiration of a higher and better one—a good point d'appui, as the Frenchman would say, for reformation.

Remarkable inquisitiveness and an intense desire to know are characteristics of the Chinese female. There are but few of them that would not come off with eclat in a contest of interrogations with a perfect specimen of a "down easter." In their visits to the families of foreigners their volubility keeps up perpetual conversation, and their curiosity can only be gratified by a tour of exploration through the whole establishment, and their battery of interrogations discharges itself upon every thing from the kitchen to the bed-chamber. Whatever else this proves, it proves that they still are women. It is true these questions are often of the most silly and unmeaning character; but what else could we expect from empty and untutored minds—from females whose world has been the secluded apartments of a grandee, or whose lives have been spent in degrading service and bondage? They are curious and inquiring; and their curiosity embraces all things, and their inquiries reach fully to the extent of the suggestions of their empty minds. They are apt in learning and anxious to be taught; and the females in the houses of the missionaries enter with spirit and relish into any efforts to teach them to read, or to impart to them a knowledge of useful acquirements. They listen with interest to the truths of the Gospel, readily perceive their excellence and importance, appreciate the character and the worth of its noble institutions, and, in the families of foreigners, conform with evident satisfaction to its external requirements. They seem capable of perceiving and admiring the purer morals of Christianity; and though many objections are urged by the men against the Christian Sabbath, I have never heard it spoken of but with admiration by the women.

Though surrounded by influences calculated to debase and corrupt, yet virtue and modesty are in high estimation among the females of China. The dress is always modest and becoming, and the deportment and language, except among the very lowest classes, are unexceptionable. Quietness, retirement, and diffidence in the presence of men are natural fruits of the subjection and seclusion in which they live; but in addition to these, we believe there prevails extensively among the better classes a genuine modesty springing from the finer feelings of the heart. The appearance of this modesty in the deportment of Chinese females has been remarked by all travelers among them, and is noticed in most books speaking of their character. Many, however, are disposed to call in question its genuineness, and look upon it as a deceptious timidity produced by the subjection in which they are held. We do not think so. We have looked upon it so frequently with admiration, wondering that it could exist among the demoralizing influences of heathenism; we have seen its manifestations under so many different circumstances, and have witnessed it in individual cases for so great a length of time, that we have become satisfied that it is the genuine offspring of good hearts—of female hearts—the better feelings of which the most trying circumstances have not been able entirely to destroy. We have already observed that the debasing circumstances in which they live are not voluntary with them, nor do they meet with their approbation; they feel their degradation, and in many instances their better feelings revolt against it; and we can not justly charge upon them what is not in their power to change. In many instances, too, we have found among them the gentleness and kindness of woman's nature, and seen the manifestations of hearts capable of a high degree of feeling, and giving birth to touching acts of mercy and kindness. We have seen, and in painfully trying circumstances have experienced their attention and kindness, and gladly bear testimony to the fact, that at least some female hearts in China remain warm and kind. Some of the attachments which they form with the female missionaries among them, and to their children, are deep and sincere, and in some instances are cherished with grateful remembrance by those who have lived and labored among them.

It may be thought we are disposed to give a high character to the daughters of China. We are; but it is only a high character in contrast with the debasing circumstances in which they live, and the humble position they are made to occupy. They are good, very good, in view of the circumstances in which they live; and the fact that they have preserved so many good qualities of heart and life in the midst of the moral deterioration about them, gives encouragement to hope that good fruit will follow efforts made for their improvement. But they are heathens, and these good and promising traits of character are obscured by the institutions of Paganism. They give evidence of possessing good and active minds; but those minds are ignorant and empty, or occupied by silly and worthless superstitions. They have hearts capable of deep feeling, and susceptible of kindness and sympathy; but those hearts want developing and refining under the genial influences of the Gospel. They are better than might be expected under the circumstances in which they are compelled to live; but they want the reforming light of the Gospel to shine upon those degrading circumstances, and to disenthral them from the bondage and debasement in which they are held.

But we would not be understood as conveying the idea that all the females of China present to the observer these interesting and promising traits of character. Thousands of them fall before the debasing circumstances which surround them, and exhibit the degradation which is consistent with their humbled position. In the lower walks of life they are rude, boisterous, and masculine, presenting but little modesty or gentility in their deportment, and but few of the finer feelings of female hearts. In the higher circles of life, too, when the wife has become advanced in years, and is removed from the bondage in which she may have been held to her husband's parents, and becomes herself the mother and the mother-in-law, in not a few instances she turns the tyrant herself, and uses her new authority and privileges to the utmost of her ability. It is in her household that the daughter of China appears to the least advantage. Always tasteful in the arrangements of the dress and ornaments of her person, and generally modest and gentle in her deportment without, she displays, in most instances, but little cleanliness or taste in the arrangements of her home, which is nearly always in disorder and confusion, and not unfrequently the scene of jargon and discord. Indeed, there are no homes in China—no place to be loved and cherished—no spot for the development of affection or the production of the endearing ties of love and relationship; and it is a misapplication of our high-meaning word—the family—to apply it to the domestic customs and relations of China.

But what can be done for the daughters of China? Nothing without the Gospel; and this can only operate upon them by being borne to them by the living teacher. This divine remedy for human ills and evils is all-sufficient to meet and reform the wrongs of these millions of females, and this alone can reach and improve their condition. It is the genius of Christianity alone which can exalt and refine human nature, and which in Christian lands gives to woman her high and proper position as the helpmate and companion of ennobled manhood, herself and her compeer both fitted for this high form of life by the refining and exalting influence of the Gospel. It is in the power of the Gospel to produce the same results in Pagan China—first, by ennobling man, and preparing him for a higher and purer form of life; and, secondly, by exalting and refining his weaker helpmate into a being worthy of his love, his protection, and his companionship, and thus give to the domestic life of China the sanctity and the felicity which belong to it only in Christian lands.

But how can the Gospel be brought to bear upon the females of China? It must be taught to the men, and they must learn the purer morality and enter upon the higher life of Christianity. This is a work for the male missionary; but this is not sufficient; the females themselves must be reached and taught the better form of life presented to them in the Gospel. But we have already seen that they are inaccessible to the teachings of the male missionary; evidently, then, here is a work devolving upon the daughters of Christian lands—a great and mighty work which can be accomplished by them alone. It is true, that even to these intercourse with ladies in the higher circles of life is yet limited; but in the middle and lower walks of society the intercourse of the female missionary with the daughters of China may be as extensive as she chooses to make it; and among all classes the way is open, and is still opening. There are many ways in which the devoted female missionary may be incalculably useful and accomplish much good, thus securing to herself a noble share in the honor and in the rewards of giving the Gospel to a mighty Pagan nation; and in addition to these, there are many other ways in which, as the companion and helpmate of the missionary, she is indispensable in the successful prosecution of this beneficent enterprise. Her very presence in China as a Christian female, as the wife of the Christian missionary, and the head of the missionary family, or as the unmarried female, exhibiting, in her labors and deportment, the ennobling influences of the Gospel, exerts an influence for good, the extent and might of which can not be calculated. The Christian family living in the midst of heathenism is as a city set upon a hill, which can not be hid; a center from which go forth light and life over an area which can not be measured; an illustration of the Gospel speaking louder than words; a realization, in the midst of Pagan darkness, of a form of life new and striking to the benighted nation.

The wife of the missionary also becomes his passport into Chinese society, and thus opens up to his labors new and important fields. The females frequently visit the missionary family; and there is now but little difficulty in the female missionary gathering into her house a number of native females, to whom she may tell the story of redemption and point out the way of life, and who, in these circumstances, will gladly listen to the teachings of her male companion. The missionary's house may thus be made the house of prayer, and the lady's parlor be converted into a chapel for the preaching of the Gospel. It is already thus in the houses of many missionaries in China.

But it is upon the future wives and mothers of China that the Christian female can now most successfully operate. She can reach the children, and gather them into Christian schools, where may be imparted to them during the impressionable years of childhood the truths and principles of the Gospel, and where she may train and prepare them for a higher and better form of life in the future. Schools for the young have always been recognized as very important adjuncts in the great and good work of evangelizing a heathen nation. Schools for boys have always been employed by the missionaries in China; but till recently it was impossible to open female schools. The idea of educating females was thought by the Chinese to be so novel and absurd, that it was long before parents could be induced to allow their daughters to enter the schools of the missionaries. The first attempts met only with ridicule, and in many instances proved a failure; but not despising the day of small things, and persevering under discouragements and against opposition and ridicule, the female missionaries in China have greatly broken in upon this old prejudice, and in many instances have succeeded in establishing large and successful female schools. They have shown to the parents that their daughters may be educated, and the way is now fairly opened, so that there is but little more difficulty in opening and sustaining large and successful schools for girls than attends the efforts to establish schools for boys. But at the head of these schools there must be foreign females, and this is an important department of labor which must be committed to them. The immediate teacher in the school, as is also the case in the schools for boys, must be a native scholar; but the head of the school—its presiding spirit—must be the female missionary. She must give it her name, her presence, her attention; and acquiring at least the spoken language, she must impart to these youthful idolaters the purer lessons and the sublimer truths of the Gospel.

We feel, then, that in the great Pagan empire of China a vast and promising field for usefulness is thrown open to the daughters of Christendom—a field which can be occupied by them alone, and which now calls loudly upon them to enter in and possess it. While we acknowledge that there are many difficulties to be encountered, and many serious obstacles to be overcome, we still can only look upon it as an inviting field, promising to the devoted female missionary not only a useful, but also a happy life. It is true it is a dark land, which has long been enveloped in the folds of Pagan superstitions; it is very far away; the dangers and discomforts of a long voyage must be met and endured; the society, the luxuries, the elegances of home must be forsaken; and the missionary must become habituated to a new climate, must become accustomed to a people of strange manners and customs, and must enter into intercourse with a people of unrefined habits and a difficult language. But all these things can be endured and overcome. It wants only a heart deeply imbued with the love of Christ and earnest for the salvation of souls, a cheerful temperament, and a mind well disciplined either by education or intercourse with the world, possessing a knowledge of common things, as well as of the higher branches of education; and the female missionary may enter upon this noble enterprise confident of securing to herself the best of all forms of happiness—the blissful consciousness of God's approbation and blessing—and promising to herself a life of eminent usefulness in laboring for the temporal and spiritual good of the millions of her oppressed sisters in China.

But then there are thousands anxious to glorify God and do good who can not personally consecrate themselves to this noble work, and yet the field lies open before them, asking for their sympathies, their prayers, their labors, and their contributions. They may give their counsels, their influence, and their sympathies to this work; they may bear it upon their prayers to the throne of the heavenly grace, imploring upon it the blessing of God; they may labor in training other minds to enter into the field; they may contribute, as God has given them means, to sustain those who have gone forth to this work, and to open opportunities of preparation to others who would gladly engage in this noble enterprise, if they possessed the means of becoming qualified for the work. The field lies open, then, to all, and to the sympathies and the efforts of all do we commend the daughters of China.

MISSION OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

THE annexed beautiful and touching extract purports to have come from a "Discourse on the Mission of Little Children:"

"No one feels the death of a child as the mother feels it. The father can not realize it thus. True, there is a vacancy in his home, and a heaviness in his heart. There is a chain of association that at set times comes round with its broken link; there are memories of endearment, a keen sense of loss, a weeping over crushed hopes, and a pain of wounded affection over them all.

"But the mother feels that one has been taken away who was still closer to her heart. Hers has been the office of constant ministration. Every graduation of feature developed before her eyes—she detected every new gleam of infant intelligence; she heard the first utterance of every stammering word; she was the refuge of its fears, the supplier of its wants; and every task of affection wove a new link, and made dearer to her its object. And when her child dies, a portion of her own life, as it were, dies with it. How can she give her darling up, with all these loving memories, these fond associations? Timid hands that have so often taken hers in trust and love—how can she fold them on its sinless breast, and surrender them to the cold grasp of Death? The feet whose wanderings she has watched so narrowly—how can she bear to see them straightened to go down into the dark valley? The head that she has pressed to her lips and bosom, that she has watched in peaceful slumber, and in burning, heart-saddening sickness, a hair of which she could not see harmed—O, how can she consign it to the darkness of the grave? It was a gleam of sunshine, and a voice of perpetual gladness in her home; she had learned from it blessed lessons of simplicity, sincerity, purity, and faith; it had unsealed within her a gushing, a never-ebbing tide of affection; when suddenly it was taken away, and the home is left dark and silent; and to the vain and heart-rending aspiration, shall that dear child never return? There breaks in response the cold grave silence—never more! O never more! The heart is like a forsaken mansion, and those words go echoing through its silent chambers."

While speaking of the death of children, these quaint and touching lines by Lydgate, an early English poet, come familiar to the minds of all:

"Ah, welladay! most angel-like of face,
A child, young in its pure innocence,
Tender of limbs, God wrote full guiltless,
The goodly faire that lieth here speechless,
A mouth he has, but words hath he none;
Can not complain, alas! for none outrage,
He grutcheth not, but lies here all alone,
Still as a lamb, most meek of his visage;
What heart of steel could do him damage,
Or suffer him to die, beholding the manere,
And look benign of his twin eyen clere?"

SLEEP-WALKING.

NO phenomenon in the human economy is calculated to excite so much surprise as that called somnambulism, or sleep-walking. If sleep be the intermediate state betwixt wakeful life and death, somnambulism is a condition intermediate betwixt sleep and wakefulness. In perfect sleep, all the organs or faculties composing the mind, together with the external senses and the powers of voluntary motion, are in a state of rest or torpor. Dreaming is a slight approach to wakefulness, seeing that some of the cerebral organs are then in a state of activity, while others are quiescent. In dreaming, the external senses may or may not be in a state of activity. Some people, for example, can be led to dream of particular subjects by the talk of others placed near them when sleeping; while other dreamers are totally insensible to all sounds emitted within the range of their organs of hearing. In ordinary dreaming, too, the powers of voluntary motion are often exercised to a slight extent. A dreamer, under the impression that he is engaged in an active battle, will frequently give a bed-fellow a smart belaboring. Often, also, in cases of common dreaming, the muscles on which the production of the voice depends are set in action, through the instrumentality of that portion of the brain which is not in a quiescent state, and the dreamer mutters, or talks, or cries aloud.

All these partial demonstrations of activity in the external senses, and in the powers of voluntary motion, form an approach to that remarkable state termed somnambulism, in which all or nearly all of the senses, and of the muscles of the body, are frequently in perfect activity, the torpor of a part of the cerebral organs being the only feature rendering the condition different from that of waking life. The degrees in which the preceding characteristics are observable in somnambulism vary, as is natural, in different cases; and the causes of this, as well as of the condition itself, are well and forcibly explained by Mr. Macnish in his Anatomy of Sleep. "If we dream that we are walking, and the vision possesses such a degree of vividness and exciting energy as to arouse the muscles of locomotion, we naturally get up and walk. Should we dream that we hear or see, and the impression be so vivid as to stimulate the eyes and ears, or, more properly speaking, those parts of the brain which take cognizance of sights and sounds, then we both see any objects, or hear any sounds, which may occur, just as if we were awake. In some cases, the muscles only are excited, and then we simply walk, without hearing or seeing." In other cases, for the reasons given, we both walk and see; and in a third variety, we at once walk, see, and hear. In the same way, the vocal organs alone may be stimulated, and a person may merely be a sleep-talker; or, under a conjunction of impulses, he may talk, walk, see, and hear.

These brief explanations may aid in preventing the reader from being puzzled by the philosophy of this curious condition of the bodily system, or from being disposed to discredit the cases related. The simplest and perhaps least surprising cases are those in which the locomotive powers alone of the body are set in action by the vividness of a dreaming impulse. The person rises, strikes his head or body against something, and awakes. A leap from bed is also a comparatively common and slight species of somnambulism. In the belief of being compelled to cross a ditch by the pursuit of a bull, a gentleman bounded some time since from bed, and at one spring found himself placed upon a dressing-table which stood a short way from the foot of the bed. A few inches farther, and he would have passed through, or at least struck, a window. But such cases have little interest in comparison with those in which the somnambulism is not momentary, but of continued duration. The following case is related by Smellie in his Philosophy of Natural History: "Near thirty years ago, I had an opportunity of examining a striking example of somnambulism. Within a mile of Edinburgh, I happened to reside for some time in a farmer's house. Mr. Baird, my landlord, had a servant-maid, whose name was Sarah. I was not long there, when I learned from the family that Sarah, particularly after receiving an affront, or being angered, was accustomed to rise in her sleep, to go out, and to walk about the fields. My curiosity was excited, and I begged to be informed the first time that Sarah should rise in her sleep. A few nights afterward one of Mr. Baird's sons awakened me, and told me that Sarah had got out of bed. I immediately hastened to the apartment where she slept. When I arrived, Mr. and Mrs. Baird, one of their sons, and a servant-maid, Sarah's companion, were present. Sarah was in the midst of them. I took my seat by her. We began immediately to converse. She answered any questions that were put to her pretty distinctly; but she always mistook the person who spoke, which gave us an opportunity of assuming any character within the circle of her acquaintance.

"I knew that one of the farmer's servants, whose name was John Porteous, was a lover of hers; and, therefore, I addressed her in the style which I supposed John might have sometimes done. From that moment she began to scold me, and in the most peremptory manner forbade me ever to speak to her again on that topic. The conversation was accordingly changed. I talked of her mistress, who was in the room, because I knew that they had occasional quarrels. Till now, I suspected that the whole was a trick, but for what purpose I could not discover. Sarah, however, abused Mrs. Baird in the harshest terms; she said but the other day she had been accused of stealing and drinking some bottles of ale; that her mistress was suspicious, cruel, and narrow-minded. As the mistress of the house was present when these and other opprobrious terms were used, I began to be shaken in my preconceived notion of imposture, and, therefore, changed the object of my experiments and inquiries. I examined her countenance, and found that her eyes, though open, wild, and staring, were not absolutely fixed. I took a pin, and repeatedly pricked her arm; but not a muscle moved, not a symptom of pain was discoverable. At last she became impatient to leave the room, and made several attempts to get out by the door; but that was prevented by the domestics. Perceiving her inability to force the door, she made a sudden spring at the window, and endeavored to throw herself over, which would have been fatal to her. To remove every suspicion of imposture, I desired the people, with proper precautions to prevent harm, to try if she would really precipitate herself from the window. A seemingly free access was left for her escape, which she perceived, and instantly darted with such force and agility, that more than one half of her body was projected before her friends were aware. They, however, laid hold of her, and prevented the dreadful catastrophe. She was again prevailed upon, though with much reluctance, to sit down. She soon resumed her former calmness, and freely answered such questions as were put to her. This scene continued for more than an hour. I was perfectly convinced, notwithstanding my original suspicions, that the woman was actuated by strong and natural impulses, and not by any design to deceive. I asked if any of the attendants knew how to awaken her. A female servant replied that she did. She immediately, to my astonishment, laid hold of Sarah's wrist, forcibly squeezed and rubbed the projecting bones, calling out at the same time, 'Sarah! Sarah!' By this operation Sarah awoke. She started with amazement, looked around, and asked how so many people came to be in her apartment at so unseasonable an hour. After she was completely awake, I asked her what was the cause of her restless and violent agitation. She replied, that she had been dreaming that she was pursued by a furious bull, which was every moment on the point of going her."

In the preceding case there is one point worthy of especial note, and this is the insensibility of the girl to pain when her arm was repeatedly pricked. As will be shown afterward, this is a phenomenon which has recently thrown quite a novel interest over somnambulism, and made it a subject of greater importance.

The somnambulist in Smellie's case had not apparently the perfect power of vision. She did not or could not recognize the persons about her, yet she saw a window, and would have leaped through it, knowing that a passage was practicable. The true condition of the vision in somnambulism is, indeed, the point most difficult to comprehend. The boy who, according to the common story, rose in his sleep and took a nest of young eagles from a dangerous precipice, must have received the most accurate accounts of external objects from his visual organs, and must have been able to some extent to reason upon them, else he could never have overcome the difficulties of the ascent. He dreamed of taking away the nest, and to his great surprise found it beneath his bed in the morning in the spot where he only thought himself to have put it in imagination. The following case, mentioned by Mr. Macnish, is scarcely less wonderful. It occurred near one of the towns on the Irish coast: "About two o'clock in the morning, the watchmen on the Revenue Quay were much surprised at descriing a man disporting himself in the water, about a hundred yards from the shore. Intimation having been given to the revenue boat's crew, they pushed off and succeeded in picking him up; but, strange to say, he had no idea whatever of his perilous situation, and it was with the utmost difficulty that they could persuade him he was not still in bed. But the most singular part of this novel adventure was, that the man had left his house at twelve o'clock that night, and walked through a difficult, and to him dangerous road, a distance of nearly two miles, and had actually swum one mile and a half when he was fortunately discovered and picked up." The state of madness gives us, by analogy, the best explanation of the condition of these climbers and swimmers. With one or more organs or portions of his brain diseased, and the rest sound, the insane person has the perfect use of his external senses, yet may form imperfect conclusions regarding many things around him. The somnambulist, with his senses in activity, but with some of his cerebral organs in a torpid state, is in much the same position as regards his power of forming right judgments on all that he hears or sees.

The story of the sleeping swimmer is borne out by a statement from an indisputable authority—Dr. Benjamin Franklin. The Doctor relates that on one occasion, while bathing in a hot salt-water bath, he fell asleep, and floated on his back in that state for nearly an hour, as his watch testified to him.

Sometimes, in the case of a person liable to somnambulism, it is possible to direct the thoughts of the dreamer to any given subject, by acting on the external senses. Smellie, the writer already quoted, gives the subjoined instance:

"Mr. Thomas Parkinson, then a student of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, was accustomed to talk and answer questions in his sleep. The fact was known to his companions. To amuse ourselves, two of us went gently into his chamber while he was asleep. We knew that he was in love with a young lady in Yorkshire, the place of his nativity. We whispered her name repeatedly in his ear. He soon began to toss about his hands, and to speak incoherently. He gradually became more calm and collected. His imagination took the direction we intended. He thought he was stationed under the lady's window, and repeatedly upbraided her for not appearing and speaking to him, as she had so often done on former occasions. At last, he became impatient, started up, laid hold of his books, shoes, and every thing he could easily grasp. Thinking his mistress was asleep, he threw those articles against the opposite wall of his chamber. By what he said, we learned that his imaginary scene lay in a street, and that he was darting the books and shoes at the lady's window, in order to awake her. She, however, did not appear; and after tiring himself with frequent exertions, he went quietly into bed without awakening. His eyes were nearly shut; and although he freely conversed with us, he did not seem to perceive that any person was present with him. Next day we told him what had happened; but he said that he had only a faint recollection of dreaming about his mistress."

It is consistent with our own knowledge, that many country surgeons, who ride much by night, and pursue a most laborious life generally, sleep perfectly well on horseback. This, however, although a position in which the bodily motion is not entirely passive, is not properly somnambulism. Perhaps the most perfect sleep-walkers were Sir John Moore's soldiers, many of whom, in the disastrous and fatiguing retreat to Corunna, were observed to fall asleep on the march, and yet go on, step by step, with their waking companions. Many tradesmen have been known to get up by night and work for a time at their usual employments, without being at all aware in the morning of what they had done. Gall mentions a miller who did this. One of the most extraordinary cases of this order, however, is that of a student of divinity at Bordeaux, who was accustomed to rise in the nighttime, and to read and write without the use of his eyes. This case is stated in the French Encyclopedie, under the word Noctambule, and is attested by the Archbishop of Bordeaux. This prelate, in order to test the young man, interposed an obstacle between his eyes and the paper on which he was reading or writing, but he read and wrote with equal facility and equal accuracy as before. Macnish, who repeats this story, does not mention the fact of the eyes not being used, though this is the most marvelous feature in the case. The reading may not have been aloud, and may only have been apparent. But as for writing accurately without the use of the eyes, this was certainly a feat which few waking persons could have accomplished. In addition to these cases, many others might be gathered, and particularly from Mr. Macnish's Anatomy of Sleep; but that book is so accessible, that it is enough to refer to it for further information. We shall only mention one other case which is there given. It is that of Dr. Blacklock, who "on one occasion rose from bed, to which he had retired at an early hour, came into the room where his family were assembled, conversed with them, and afterward entertained them with a pleasant song, without any of them suspecting he was asleep, and without his retaining, after he awoke, the least recollection of what he had done." Being blind, his family would have the more and greater difficulty in discovering his unusual condition.

Somnambulism, it was stated at the close of the farm-servant's case, had of late years assumed a new and more interesting aspect. This has arisen from the discovery—if it be allowable to call it a discovery—that animal magnetism is capable of inducing a peculiar state of somnambulism, and that, during the continuance of that state, sensation or sensibility is destroyed. It has been seen that Smellie found the farm maid-servant to have lost sensibility in her arms. This is a statement corroborative of the account given of magnetic somnambulism. Taking advantage of this absence of sensibility, surgeons, it is said, have performed upon magnetic somnambulist the most severe and painful curative operations, without inflicting on the parties a moment's suffering of the slightest kind. The patient's mind, meanwhile, seems in a perfectly sound and active state, but without the power of remembering any thing that passed in the unmagnetized state. A Parisian lady, aged sixty-four, who had a cancerous breast, was magnetized, and it was found that somnambulism could be induced. In her waking state she was deeply averse to the operation; but in her magnetized state it was proposed to her, and she consented at once. The breast was operated upon, and cut off without the slightest seeming pain to her. On waking, she was, it may be believed, much surprised. This case, it has been alleged, is but one of several, where the like has been done; and some of the most respectable medical men of Paris have borne witness to the truth, or at least apparent truth, of these allegations. On this score alone, animal magnetism seems worthy of a full and fair inquiry. It would be a wonderful thing, indeed, if we could arrive at means by which all the painful operations to which the human body is rendered liable by disease or accident, could be performed without suffering to those who undergo them.

Somnambulism, or a tendency to it, most commonly arises from causes not apparent or discoverable. Where it occurs in persons not accustomed to exhibit any such propensity, some disorder of the digestive functions may generally be suspected, and the restoration of these functions to a healthy state may put a stop to the practice. But in confirmed cases, nothing can be done but to lock the doors, bar the windows, and keep dangerous objects or instruments out of the way; or a cord may be affixed to the bedpost and the arm of the sleep-walker. As a general rule, the somnambulist should be taken to bed before being waked.—Chambers's Home-Book.

A CHILD'S FANCIES ABOUT HEAVEN.

BY MISS SERENNA BALDWIN.

SOMETIMES I think of dying, but I don't know how 'twill seem,

Only I think I'll shut my eyes, and go like in a dream;

Then the angels they will meet me, all dressed in shining white,

And take me up to heaven, like a little cloud of light.

Then we'll sail, and keep on sailing, all over lovely bowers,

And I shall smell the sweetness of all the heavenly flowers;

And then we'll hear the music they make on harps of gold,

And see the ancient prophets who lived in days of old;

But we'll go, and keep on going, till we come to God's dear Son;

Then he'll smile, and take me by the hand, and say, "I'm glad you've come;"

Then my mother she will kiss me, and say, "My dear, dear boy,"

And the angels will be very glad to see us have such joy.

Then I'll be like an angel, with a beautiful bright wing,

And a golden harp to play on whenever I shall sing,

And I'll see the sapphire pavement, and the walls of dazzling stone,

And the streets of gold like crystal, and the rainbow round the throne;

And when I'm there in heaven, I'll tell you what I'll do:

In the sky I'll break a little hole, so I can look down and see you.

May be I'll be an angel, and when you come to die,

I'll come with them, and fetch you to our place in the sky.

O won't we be so happy, when we all get there together!

Then all the trouble will be passed, and all the stormy weather.

I never shall get hurt then, nor have an ache or pain,

Nor hear a cross word spoken, nor suffer any blame.

THE DISENCHANTED.

BY MRS. H. C. GARDNER.

You ask me why no more I love
To listen while she softly sings,
Or how, at last, I bear unmoved
The witchery that her presence brings.

I see the dark, exquisite eye,
The jetty bands of shining hair,
The cheek where rose and lily vie,
The faultless form, and regal air.

Most beautiful! and yet in vain
You bid me worship at her shrine;
Not all the treasures of the main
Could tempt me now to call her mine!

There is a charm, half undefined,
That makes the plainest features fair;
The peerless beauty of the mind,
The disposition sweet and rare.

Not such the charm that Meta wears!
Go, ask the aged mother why
She trembles when the step she hears
That speaks her beautiful daughter nigh.

See the fair cheek with passion glow,
The angry bosom swelling high,
The frown that clouds her brow of snow,
The lightning in her dark proud eye!

She sings the same delicious air,
In tones as thrilling as of yore;
The olden magic is not there—
The sweet delusion blinds no more.

The hollow heart I know too well;
The selfish breast unmasked I see;
The worshiped star, the queenly belle,
Hath not a single charm for me.

KEEP THE NARROW WAY.

BY MRS. M. A. BIGELOW.

CHRISTIAN, keep the narrow way
Toward the glorious realms of day!
Let not Satan fright thee back;
Still pursue the shining track.

Let thy course be onward ever;
Let thy courage fail thee never;
Toil thou in the Savior's cause,
Ever clinging to his cross.

What if earth attempt to move thee?
Know thy great Redeemer loves thee!
He has proved himself thy friend;
He will love thee to the end.

And when from thy fainting heart
All the hopes of life depart—
When thy heart beats not again,
Jesus will be with thee then.

BARNUM.

BY REV. T. M. EDDY.

"I have been a farmer's boy and a merchant, a clerk and a manager, a showman and a bank president. I have been in jails and in palaces; have known poverty and abundance; have traveled over a large portion of two continents; have encountered all varieties of men; have seen every phase of human character; and I have been, on several occasions, in imminent peril."—Preface to Barnum's Autobiography.

THE materials of this sketch is from the book put forth, with such a flourish of trumpets, by Redfield. The reverse side of the title-page is an advertisement of the American Museum, in the shape of a dedication "To the Universal Yankee Nation," stating that the pages are dated "from the American Museum, where the public first smiled upon me, and where, henceforth, my personal exertion will be devoted to its entertainment." There spoke the showman, and thus he constantly speaks. The book is throughout an advertisement, and the preciousness of the humbug is manifested in this—the public greedily buy it at the exorbitant price of the publisher. If the publishers of this magazine were to issue such a sized and such a "got-up" book at one dollar and twenty-five cents, the public and preachers would never be done grumbling.

Whoever reads the autobiography will imagine that the author had contracted to furnish a book of given size, and found the matter hard to obtain. The first one hundred and five pages contain but little of the author's history. They are almost entirely a rehearsal of "practical jokes" and smart sayings, most of which are ascribed to the wits of Bethel. This may be all right, but subsequent developments teach us that Mr. Barnum thinks nothing of changing the birthplace of subjects to secure a popular hit. And, furthermore, we have glimmering recollections of certain profusely illuminated comic almanacs in which more veracious relations, strangely similar to those gravely located at Bethel and Danbury. The trial of the eccentric minister before the consociation is too much like the case of Rev. Zeb. Twitchell, related by the Knickerbocker, a year or two ago, for us to avoid thinking that either Barnum or Old Knick has "uttered" a literary forgery.

But even this part of the book is useful as a key to the showman's character. It proves that he did not consider deception, when for the sake of gain, fun, or cuteness, as any wrong. This idea, implanted and cultivated in youth, he never lost. His life and history ignore the essential importance of truth. He has acted as though he believed, with Maximus Tyrinus, "there is nothing decorous in truth, save when profitable;" or with Plato, "He may lie who knows how to do so in fit season." These apparently harsh statements will be sustained before this article is finished. We shall see in him examples of untiring energy, indomitable perseverance, with unequalled craft and deception.

Phineas Taylor Barnum was born in the parish of Bethel, town* of Danbury, Connecticut, on the 5th of July, A. D. 1810, and was named after his maternal grandfather, who was so delighted that he immediately executed, in behalf of his namesake, a deed of gift for Ivy Island—a tract of five acres lying in the parish and town aforesaid. The old gentleman was an inveterate wag and practical joker, and being slightly older than his grandson, there seems some probability in Barnum's conclusion, that he "was a chip from the old block." His paternal grandfather was a captain of the Revolutionary militia, and much noted for waggyery. Hence he claims to have "come honestly" by his love of fun and "practical jokes."

Early in life began the development of his future character—"the boy was father to the man." He never liked "hard work," but was addicted to "head work," as manifested in shirking. The organ of acquisitiveness was large and active. He saved the pennies received from his grandsire, and soon began to "dicker." On "training days" he sat up peddler and sold molasses-candy, called "Cookania," ginger-bread, candies, and cherry rum. Thus he amassed, what then seemed, a princely fortune.

About twelve years of age he made his first trip to New York, in the capacity of assistant to a cattle-drover. The ways and sights of Gotham interested him greatly, especially a toy-shop in the neighborhood of his hotel. Having a whole dollar to spend, he bought a variety of attractive articles. On a second visit he saw others which pleased him better, and he proposed "a swop" to the lady merchant. To this she consented "for a consideration," and received back his first purchases, and he became the happy possessor of a knife, a gun, which would "go off" and propel an arrow, a watch, and a number of torpedoes. Thus equipped, he thought himself an object of envy to the whole city. Making one more visit, he saw a white molasses-candy, far superior to Bethel "Cookania," and he paid out his last eleven cents. Then he proposed another swop, and for candy went, one by one, the gun, the watch, the torpedoes, and the wonderful knife, with gimlet and cork-screw attachment; but still he was unsatisfied. He believed he could make his nose do till he reached home, and two handkerchiefs went swiftly down his throat. He finally footed up his candy operations by exchanging an extra pair of socks. Returning home his brothers and sisters eagerly demanded a sight of his dollar's worth, but he had only silence to give. His mother searched his pockets and wallet, and found them minus handkerchiefs and socks, and demanded an explanation. The young traveler made a *candi[e]*d statement, and was soundly whipped and sent to bed. Nevertheless, he was long the hero of the village green and school-house; for had he not been to York?

He next figured in the capacity of clerk in the Bethel store, where he soon became quite expert in performing the curious dental operation known as "cutting eye-teeth." The bargains he drove must have demanded a spirit not peculiarly favorable to the cultivation of the moral sense. Barnum himself, complacently as he speaks of the tricks of trade, admits the "process was calculated to cut up conscience, morals, and integrity all by the roots."

During this time he engaged in lottery speculations, and gives some useful information as to the "way the thing is done." Those who may intend to invest loose change in patronizing the "wheel of fortune," may profitably study his revelations with some care.

In 1826 Mr. Taylor, of Danbury, removed to Brooklyn, opened a grocery, and tendered Barnum a clerkship. He was now in the transition state from boyhood to manhood—the time when advice is most needed and most despised. He soon became familiar with all the details of the business, but was restless and discontented. He was never happy when under a superior, or receiving a fixed salary—the disposition to personal speculation could not be repressed. In 1827 he caught the small-pox and returned home, uncertain how he would stand in the affections of a pretty Miss Charity Hallett, a Bethel tailoress, who had pleased his fancy in the days of his first clerkship. He saw her, was more deeply smitten than ever, but says, "I did 'not tell my love, but let the worm i' the bud' feed on my pock-marked cheek." Four weeks saw him again in Brooklyn, the proprietor of a porter-house. In a few months he sold out and was clerk in a similar "institution." After a brief service he returned to Bethel and opened, in a building provided by his grandfather, a miscellaneous store, including dry goods, groceries, a barrel of ale, an oyster depot, and a lottery agency. Here he sold goods and greenhorns, and consummated various commercial transactions, which only his convenient notions of honesty could have justified. He also wrote letters for love-lorn swains, who knew not the hieroglyphics, and in some of them showed clearly that he had poetic powers of rare order. Take the following specimen:

"Lucretia, dear, do write to Jack,
And say with Beers you are not smitten;
And then to me, in love, come back,
And give all other boys the mitten.

Do this, Lucretia, and till death
I'll love you with intense distraction;
I'll spend for you my every breath,
And we will live in satisfaction."

Can posterity believe that, touching, pathetic, and Tennysonian as are these lines, the stubborn maid remained incorrigible?

November 8, 1829, he was married to the "pretty tailoress," the public verdict being that she was "too good for Taylor Barnum." The union was a happy one. She was a good wife, and still shares his fortune.

He enlarged his business with good success, and we now see

BARNUM A MARTYR!

In 1831 religious excitement in New England ran very high. Some injudicious professors of religion urged the formation of a "Christian party" in politics, and that none but Christian men should be allowed to hold office. The loud cry, "No Church and state," so often potent with demagogues, was raised. Barnum became frightened! The country was in danger and must be saved, and he must save it. He purchased a press and types, and on the 19th of October, 1831, he issued the "HERALD OF FREEDOM." It had the requisite number of exclamation points, and, to the editor, many of them were "notes of admiration." The press must speak out. He felt with the Illinois orator, "The crisis which were to have arove, have ariven." He was faithful to the occasion. He fulminated his thunders, careless of who was scathed. But there comes an end to all things. He denounced a burly butcher, who commenced a prosecution for defamation in several suits. In one, a verdict of guilty was returned, and the belligerent editor was fined one hundred dollars and sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment in the county jail. The room was papered and carpeted, and the prisoner took possession. He found himself a martyr for a great principle; friends flocked in crowds to see him; he edited his paper, and, of course, sympathy made it popular. At the close of his term he came forth, and his liberation was celebrated by a procession, bands of music, horsemen and footmen, banners, speeches, and buncomb toasts, and thus the martyr was borne to his home. Had he not deserted politics, he was in a fair way to be an available candidate for the Presidency. But in 1834 he ceased editorial life, and having previously sold his mercantile establishment, he was once more afloat.

In the winter of 1834-5 he moved to New York to seek his fortune. He had sustained heavy losses, and to economy he was yet a stranger. His adventures in seeking employment were really amusing in spite of his disappointments. Failing to obtain a feasible mercantile situation, he looked about, hoping, like Micawber and Mr. Titus Trumps, that "something would turn up." To prevent absolute want, he served as drummer to several stores. He eagerly examined the long columns of advertised "wants." According to these disinterested and trustworthy statements, fortunes were to be made in a day or two, or those already made were to be had in plenty. 'Twas laughable to see the future humbugger making his way up three or four dismal stairways and knocking at No. 80, and there ascertaining the fortune could be made by peddling some infallible life pills "on shares;" becoming agent for a self-acting mouse-trap or the extraordinary great hydro-oxygen microscope. This dancing attendance on advertised wants, with drumming variations, continued all winter, when, receiving several hundred dollars from his agent in Bethel, he opened a private boarding-house. This yielded a support.

We now reach the commencement of his grand showman-life. A gentleman mentioned the name of Joice Heth, and gave him some of the particulars of her history. She was a negress, who professed to be one hundred and sixty-one years of age, and to have been the nurse of General Washington. The proof of these statements was the testimony of the Bowling family, with whom she had lived, and a bona-fide autograph bill of sale by Augustus Washington. The latent showman was roused; he visited the old creature. He found a miserable-looking object, whose limbs were drawn, and who was withered and dried till she scarcely weighed forty pounds. So far as looks were concerned, she might have passed for twin-sister to Gliddon's mummy. He examined the testimony in favor of her advanced age, and it seemed to make a "strong case." He conversed with her. She professed to be a Baptist, and sang or repeated many hymns, only to be found in the Baptist Psalmody of the preceding century. She narrated many incidents of the Washington family, and as for "dear little George," she dressed him the first time he ever had clothes on him, and, in fact, she "raised him." Barnum was convinced, or professed to be, that she really was "George Washington's mammy;" at all events he knew he could make the people think so, and make money by the operation. So he bought her and commenced exhibition at Niblo's, assisted by one Lyman, a shrewd fellow, whose legal training, instead of making him a judge, made him deputy showman. Pamphlet lives of Joice were written; "printer's ink" was used ad libitum; patriotism was invoked, physiology appealed to, editors sanctioned the show, and the receipts were $1,500 per week. He made a tour of the principal cities, and when the rush began to abate he caused a card to be published, denouncing the whole affair as an imposture, stating that Joice was only an ingenious automaton. This absurd rumor caused thousands to visit her, and induced many to pay a second visit, that they might see whether they had been humbugged.

At last the old creature died, and a post-mortem examination, made by a physician who had been personally interested in the moon-hoax, exhibited none of the ossification essential to such advanced age. Immediately rang the cry of humbug! Lyman played off one or two ludicrous hoaxes upon Bennett of the New York Herald, and he has never forgiven Barnum therefor. The showman insists that he purchased Joice in good faith, believing in her antiquity. Perhaps so.

His next show was a foreigner named Antonio, a sort of Signor Blitz. To give him a more transatlantic prestige, the plain Antonio gave way to the more patrician Signor Vivalla; and he also gave out that he had specially imported him. When the fellow was encored Barnum would appear and regret that the Signor's inability to speak English made it necessary for him to express his gratitude, etc. And yet he admits that the fellow spoke the language very well, having spent several years in England. He also arranged that Vivalla should be challenged by another expert to a public trial of skill. Bets ran high, the public crowded to the performance and alternately cheered the rivals, who, in the pay of the arch-deceiver, "worked together" in fleecing their dupes. These are Barnum's morals!

The Vivalla humbug was finally merged in a traveling circus, Barnum and old Turner managers. Turner was as inveterate a joker as Barnum. At Annapolis Barnum was promenading in a new suit of black. Turner told the citizens that he was "E. K. Avery, the murderer of Miss Cornell." The indignation immediately boiled over. They seized him, tore his new coat off, and commanded him to stride a rail, promising him some tar and feathers. He insisted upon explanation; they were too furious; but accidentally some one called him "Avery," and he saw the hoax. He persuaded them to return in company with him to the hotel to see Turner, who met them laughing, and succeeded in persuading the mob to take the joke good-naturedly, and consoled Barnum by telling him he only sought to give notoriety to the circus. According to Barnum's code there was surely no wrong in this. "What measure ye mete shall be measured to you again." The circus was a losing business. He became involved in serious legal difficulty on account of his associates, and after rambling over the south-west, conveying his troupe now by wagon and now by steamer, at last he reached Opelousas, where the steamer was exchanged for sugar and molasses, the company disbanded, and, on the 4th of June, 1838, Barnum reached home, disgusted with the life of an itinerant showman.

He advertised for a partner in some safe business, stating that he had $2,500 to invest. He received ninety-three answers, containing a variety of propositions from patent-medicine men, pawn-brokers, lottery men, etc. After all he was humbugged. An alderman introduced to him as an honest, enterprising man, a German named Proler, a manufacturer of Cologne-water, bear's-oil, paste and water-proof blacking. Proler manufactured and Barnum sold and kept the books. They sold on long time, and soon the $2,500 were absorbed, and then the result of credit began to appear "deeply, darkly, and beautifully blue." Proler ultimately bought the entire establishment, giving his note for $2,600. Before paying it, however, he was seized with an irresistible longing to visit his "fader-land," and to seeing "home again" amid the scenes of his childhood. So he sailed for Rotterdam, leaving his business with his quondam partner, as follows:

Liabilities.—Note of hand for $2,600

Assets.—1. One very good recipe for making Cologne-water.

2. One recipe for making genuine bear's grease—without the bear. No common article, but the real genuine, that will cover a head in the situation of Uncle Ned's, with rich, glossy, curly hair, as quickly as any other composition.

3. One recipe for paste premium blacking.

4. One recipe for water-proof paste blacking. Balance in Barnum's favor being a considerable amount of experience, or "bought wit." Price not known.

To overcome these disasters he opened a saloon at the Vauxhall Gardens, but it did not pay. He turned showman again, traveling with a company of singers and theatrical performers. This had some success and adventures, among which was being sent to jail at Pittsburg in default of $500 bail, in a suit for a pipe of brandy, which—the suit, not the brandy—he says was malicious.

Home again. He attempted to make a fortune with Sears's Pictorial Bible. Advertised largely, made great sales, and sunk all his profits by trusting irresponsible agents. Finding the Bible did not suit his trading tactics, he again tried the Vauxhall saloon, and again failed. He now eked out a scanty support for his family by writing advertisements and puffs for Bowery theater, at four dollars a week. This pittance was increased by his contributions to the Sunday press. He was at the bottom of the ladder. He had tried to live by his wits and was on the verge of hopeless bankruptcy.

Just at this time the American Museum was advertised for sale by the administrator. "Our hero" told a friend he meant to buy it. "You buy the American!" was the astonished reply, "what with?" "With brass; for silver and gold have I none," said Barnum. He had several interviews with Mr. Olmstead, a wealthy, retired merchant; and by pledging, among other securities, his valuable domain of Ivy Island, which was simply an unmitigated swamp, he secured a promise that Mr. Olmstead would purchase it for him and give him time to make payment. He called on the administrator, and the agreement was made for $12,000. To his surprise he was informed, shortly after this, that the Directors of Peal's Museum, an incorporated company, had purchased it for $15,000, and had paid $1,000, to be forfeited unless the balance was paid by the 26th of December. Here was the wreck of his hopes. For a little while he felt as if paralyzed by the blow. But he gathered his energy, ascertained the terms of the contract, and made a secret bargain with the administrator, by which the Museum was to be secured to him on the terms agreed upon through Mr. Olmstead, in case the company failed to redeem their paper on the day it fell due. He then made diligent inquiry, and ascertained where were the weak points of the company which was about to consolidate the two museums. He then deliberately went to work to squib the thing to death. Several sympathizing editors gave him the use of their columns, and never did the London Punch more mercilessly

"show up" Lord Aberdeen than did Barnum the Museum company. The stock was rendered worthless. The company sent for him a few days before Christmas and offered him $3,000 per year to manage the united museums—salary and service to commence January first. He agreed to their terms and retired; they rejoicing that they had bought him off; he chuckling silently to think he had sold them. The 26th came on; the Directors felt no uneasiness, and did not even wait upon the administrator. The next morning early Barnum did, in company with Olmstead and an attorney, and secured the American. The Directors knew nothing of the transaction, and did not dream that their $1,000 were forfeited, till they received the following note; then it was too late:

"AMERICAN MUSEUM, DEC. 27, 1841.

"To the President and Directors of the N. Y. Museum:

"GENTLEMEN,—It gives me great pleasure to inform you that you are placed upon the free list of this establishment till further notice.

"P. T. BARNUM, Proprietor."

They now realized their defeat and the loss of one thousand dollars.

Now began the development of the showman's powers of economy, perseverance, and humbug. His payments were to be made by a certain time or all forfeited, and he had shown how that thing could be managed. He lived on the cheapest food, denied himself of luxuries, worked incessantly, and in one year had paid all claims out of the profits alone, and owned the Museum. He enlarged the lecture-room and converted it into a regular theater, which character it still sustains. He has largely increased the number and variety of objects on exhibition, and varied with performances by "industrious fleas, [mirabile!] educated dogs, jugglers, automatons, ventriloquists, living statuary, tableaux, gipsies, Albinoes, fat boys, giants, dwarfs, rope-dancers, live Yankees, Ethiopians, panoramas, dioramas, dissolving views, 'model of Niagara with real water,' bearded women," etc. "Printer's ink," cuts and advertisements, puffs, abuse, and certificates have all been employed without stint. If a rival was troublesome he was privately bought out, and the two establishments placed apparently in furious opposition, and Barnum pocketed the proceeds of both. To this mode of financiering we can not give the quasi approval, so common with the press. It is wrong; it is obtaining money on false pretenses, and a deliberate, protracted employment of falsehood.

Take his woolly-horse humbug. He found in Cincinnati an "Indian nag," which was a veritable curiosity. He bought and sent it home, uncertain how he would use it. Colonel Fremont and his party had been reported as lost, but the mails announced them as safe. Here Barnum saw an opening. In a few days the papers were announcing that the Colonel had succeeded in capturing a nondescript horse, which would soon be sent home. A few weeks later and there was advertised Colonel Fremont's nondescript, or woolly horse, for exhibition; that he was made up of elephant, deer, horse, buffalo, and camel, and was the richest specimen of curiosity ever received from California. This deception was willful and deliberate. It was no "practical joke;" it was sustained and continued imposture.

Akin was the cheat of the Fejee Mermaid. This was an ingeniously contrived and executed affair—half fish, half woman. A systematic succession of newspaper notices and discussions set Gotham all agog. In the midst of the stir arrived Barnum's old confederate, Lyman, now Dr. Griffin, late of Pernambuco, agent of the English Lyceum of Natural History. This gentleman, after "repeated solicitations," kindly consented to remain a few days and exhibit this wonder of the deep! Can any special pleading conceal the infamy of so deliberate and complicated a falsity? Yet Barnum seems to this day to glory in it. No wonder, for the first four weeks it was on exhibition in the museum, the receipts were $3,341.93. That covers a multitude of—.

Next he speculated with Tom Thumb. This was a dwarf of five years of age, whose parents were named Stratton, and resided in Bridgeport. Barnum saw there was money in him, and made an immediate engagement with his parents. The boy was no longer to be a child, but a show. He must become pert and be a stunted man. Barnum trained him personally. Then came an announcement that he would exhibit "General Tom Thumb, a dwarf of eleven years, and just arrived from England." This was multiplying his age by two, "with one to carry," and transferring his birthplace across the Atlantic. What was this? Was it merely "sharp?" or was it a keen humbug only? or shall we take God's law and enlightened conscience? If so, then we denominate it deliberate falsehood for money.

Tom was taken to England; by successful intriguing was admitted, with his keeper, to the royal palace more than once, and both loaded with gifts. But the main object was to make a sight of Tom Thumb an aristocratic and fashionable necessity, and in this he succeeded. Crowds flocked to his levees. The carriages of the gifted and titled stood at his door. He was also carried through Ireland and into France, where he also was admitted to the royal household and ran a successful "engagement." This was a bold and successful venture. After the return to the States, a remunerative tour was made. Tom Thumb made Barnum a fortune.

We now come to his great scheme—the most signal for its success and the boldness of the means employed. In Europe he heard the fame of Jenny Lind, but had never heard her sing. Yet he conceived the idea of bringing her to America, and giving a series of concerts in the United States and Havanna. Maturing his plan, he dispatched a Mr. Walton to England to engage the Nightingale, giving him a schedule of instructions. The contract was finally closed, and on these conditions: Jenny was to come over and give one hundred and fifty concerts. She was to be attended by a servant as waiting-maid, a male servant of herself and party, a friend as traveling companion, a secretary, who was to manage her financial business, and these were to be furnished by Barnum; he was to pay all traveling expenses, hotel bills, provide a carriage, all traveling facilities to be first-class, and Miss Jenny was to be paid one thousand dollars, in good money, for each concert. In addition, he was to pay Mr. Julius Benedict £5,000 sterling as pianist and musical director, and assistant at her concerts, and £2,500 to Mr. Giovanni Belletti, baritone vocalist. Jenny was to have the privilege of giving concerts for charitable purposes, which were to pay their own expenses; otherwise Barnum was to pay all the expenses of the concerts and to make all arrangements.

The men of Wall-street said that this speculation would ruin him. But heavy as were these expenses—and he calculated them all—he was always confident. He knew it would succeed. In his calculations he reckoned largely on the fame Jenny's love of the poor and deeds of charity would inspire in the American mind. Amid the cluster of her brilliant attractions "the greatest of all was charity." It was to relieve the poor, comfort the sick, "educate the orphan," and fill Barnum's pocket.

The enthusiasm of the populace at Jenny's landing has been told too often to need repetition. The first concert came on, and the sale of tickets convinced Barnum that the profits would be greater than was at first imagined, and he proposed to Jenny an increase in her "allowance." This, he admits, was simply a stroke of policy, to impress her with an idea of his magnanimity and generosity. The new contract also provided that she might terminate the engagement at the one hundredth instead of the one hundred and fiftieth concert, by paying him a forfeit of twenty-five thousand dollars.

The proceeds of the first concert were $17,864.05. The sale of the first ticket to the latter, Genin, for $225, caused much remark. Between him and the showman there was, no doubt, an understanding. Barnum says, "Our relations are merely those of business and friendship." It accomplished two things; it made it fashionable to bid "high" for the first choice of seat, and made Genin notorious, and thus made his fortune.

The company passed through the principal cities of the Union, and met unparalleled success, till they had given ninety-three concerts, when the contract was dissolved—Jenny paying him seven thousand dollars in addition to the $25,000 forfeited.

The total receipts of the concert tour were $712,161.84. Jenny's share was $176,675; Barnum's, $535,486.25.

Barnum's labors, during this time, were almost incredible. He had the press to manage; public opinion to manufacture; currency and exchange to see after; buildings and lodgings to provide; a heavy correspondence to conduct; hence we can believe him when he says that he received with much delight the notice closing the contract.

His subsequent history has been quite varied. He has not always succeeded. The fire-annihilator was a sad failure. His efforts to galvanize life into the New York Crystal Palace Association were fruitless. It was dead before he touched it, and he simply failed to make it "arise and walk." The public had, long before his time, included it with Dickens's "Grand United Metropolitan, Hot-Muffin and Crumpet-Baking, and Punctual Delivery Company," and neither his "printer's ink," nor his grand inauguration, nor Independence-day celebration could save it.

Thus we have rapidly traced the outline of a career which is one of the marvels of the times. We have spoken plainly because we wish to be truthful; because we believe that the influence of his character, baptized, as it is, with pecuniary success and newspaper commendation, is baleful and yet fascinating; because, while we remember, with due honor, industry, economy, perseverance, and earnestness, we can not sanction duplicity, nor praise persistent deception. The most we can say is, that Phineas Taylor Barnum has been an unscrupulous and successful manipulator of public gullibility; but he has some redeeming traits of character. If he had not, he would be a monster. If he would now be a reformer, let him go and make restitution of his ill-gotten gains.

THE LITERARY WOMEN OF AMERICA.

THE GENIUS AND WRITINGS OF MRS. SIGOURNEY.

BY THE EDITOR.

THERE is something in the personal character and history of Mrs. Sigourney—something in the general tone and spirit of her writings that would almost disarm criticism, even if occasion might here and there be found for its exercise. There is nothing in her spirit to provoke it; while on the other hand, the elevated moral tone, the deep and all-pervading religious sentiment, and the chastened, sympathizing, and subdued feeling that characterizes it, enshrine her genius as with so many sacred defenses, and defenses, too, so sacred that the attempt to break through them would seem almost sacrilegious. Coupled, as these elements are, with intrinsic worth, they not only disarm criticism, but excite a strong interest in her productions.

One trait in her literary productions can not fail to strike the attention and call forth the commendation of every reader, and that is the constant preservation of her womanly identity. She never loses the woman in the writer. Sometimes contact with the public, through the press, tends to obliterate the shrinking delicacy of woman's nature, or it becomes overtopped by the subtle spirit of ambitious aspiring. Contact with the public for nearly forty years has wrought nothing of this in Mrs. Sigourney; nor has the applause murmured by myriad tongues in both hemispheres. Her womanly delicacy gilds every page traced by her pen, and sheds a beautiful halo around her genius. For this we commend her; and in this she is a more happy example of what a female writer ought to be than almost any other that the age has produced.

One great cause of the preservation of this character, is to be found in the fact that she uniformly employs her pen with one great and paramount object; namely, that of doing good. "It is always to commend what is beautiful, to honor religion, to inculcate morality, to elevate the character of her sex, to administer comfort to bleeding hearts, to discourage false views of life, to promote social harmony, to honor the affections, to express gratitude, to excite veneration for things, present or past, that deserve veneration, to paint natural sorrows or pure joys, to fill the atmosphere around her with hopes that 'make not ashamed' and desires that need no chastening—that Mrs. Sigourney writes." She seems ever true to this principle. Mere freaks of imagination she never essays. She always has a lesson to teach, a moral to inculcate, or a religious sentiment to nurture—the object is apparent throughout, and she never once deviates from it. The solidity of her reputation, the affectionate regard in which she is held by the wise and good everywhere, result, in a great measure, from her almost instinctive adherence to this great principle. This is the reason why her name has become a household word in all lands where Christian virtues are cherished; and we may say of her as she has sung of Mrs. Hemans:

"Every unborn age
Shall mix thee with its household charities;
The hoary sire shall bow his deafened ear,
And greet thy sweet words with his benison;
The mother shrine thee as a vestal flame
In the lone temple of her sanctity;
And the young child who takes thee by the hand,
Shall travel with a surer step to heaven."

In her poem—The Muse—she has the conception of the spirit of poetry as a welcome friend accompanying her from childhood up to later years. Thus it came in childhood:

"When first it would steal o'er my infantine hour,
With a buzz or a song, like a bee in a flower,
With its ringing rhythm, and its measured line,
What it was I could scarce divine;
Calling so oft from my sports and plays,
To some nook in the garden, away, away,
To a mound of turf which the daisies crown,
Or a vine-wreathed summer-house, old and brown,
On the lilac's green leaf, with a pin, to grave
The tinkling chime of the words it gave."

Like a faithful friend, her muse bears her company as years multiply, and, conscious of its purity, she already anticipates it as a companion in heaven:

"And now though my life from its mouth doth wane,
And the wreaths of its morning grow scentless and vain,
And many a friend who its pilgrimage blest,
Have fallen from my heart and gone down to their rest;
Yet still by my side, unforgetful and true,
Is the being that walked with me all the way through.
She doth cling to the High Rock wherein is my trust;
Let her chant to my soul when I go to the dust;
Hand in hand with the faith that my Savior hath given,
Let her kneel at his feet mid the anthems of heaven."

The late A. H. Everett, one of the finest scholars and best critics this country has produced, says of Mrs. Sigourney's writings: "They express, with great purity and evident sincerity, the tender affections which are so natural to the female heart, and the lofty aspirations after a higher and better state of being which constitute the truly ennobling and elevating principle in art as well as in nature." He also adds: "If her powers of expression were equal to the purity and elevation of her habits of thought and feeling, she would be a female Milton or a Christian Pindar. But though she does not inherit

"The force and ample pinion that the Theban eagles bear, Sailing with supreme dominion through the liquid vaults of air,"

she nevertheless manages language with ease and eloquence, and often with much of the curiosa felicitas, that 'refined felicity' of expression which is, after all, the principal charm in poetry. In blank verse she is very successful. The poems she has written in this measure have not unfrequently much of the manner of Wordsworth, and may be nearly or quite as highly relished by his admirers."

It has sometimes been objected that Mrs. Sigourney rarely ever looks at nature or human life from any other than one position. To us this objection has no force so long as it is conceded that that position is the true stand-point from which all just views of nature and human life are to be obtained. That the grave, the elegiac predominate in her writings, she herself admits; but silences the objector by that true saying of Lord Bacon: "We shall find as many hearse-like harmonies as carols if we listen to the harp of David." But her elegiac strains are not those of gloom or despair, but rather of hopeful, trusting sympathy.

It has been well said that "her muse has been a comforter to the mourner. No poet has written such a number of these songs, nor are these of necessity melancholy. Many of hers sound the notes of holy triumph and awaken the highest anticipations of felicity; ay,

'Teach us of the melody of heaven.'

She leaves not the trophy of death at the tomb, but shows us 'the resurrection and the life.' Thus she elevates the hopes of the Christian and chastens the thought of the worldly-minded. This is her mission, the true purpose of her heaven-endowed mind; for the inspirations of genius are from heaven, and, when not perverted by a corrupt will, rise upward as naturally as the morning dew on the flower is exhaled to the skies."

We have a fine illustration of the almost enlivening tones of her muse when treating of such dread subjects as death and the grave in the stanzas, "A Butterfly on a Child's Grave:"

"A butterfly bask'd on a baby's grave,
Where a lily had chanced to grow:
'Why art thou here with thy gaudy dye,
When she of the blue and sparkling eye
Must sleep in the church-yard low?"

Then it lightly soar'd through the sunny air,
And spoke from its shining track:
'I was a worm till I won my wings,
And she whom thou mourn'st like a seraph sings:
Wouldst thou call the blest one back?"

There is a translucent purity of thought and feeling displayed in all her delineations of the domestic and religious affections. Her sympathies are here poured forth with all the intensity of her womanly nature. Her constructive power, her creative genius, though not of the highest order—not of that order that stands aloof from the ordinary modes of human thought, and refuses the practical lessons of experience, is by no means deficient. In her prose writings she displays a distinctness and breadth of perception, a force of argument, an aptness of illustration, and a ready command of choice and expressive words which indicate no ordinary powers of mind. She describes nature, too, and deciphers its great lessons with a delicate and truthful appreciation. These traits make her prose productions popular and useful. Poetry is her true element. Here she is at home, and her genius brightens in the smile of the muses. We can not wonder, as she was seized by the spell or borne away by the inspirations of the muse, that she should say:

"Methought 'twas no folly such garlands to twine,
As could brighten life's cares, and its pleasures refine."

Her prose writings will live long and do much good; her letters to mothers, to young ladies, to her pupils, and that genial, delightful production—Past Meridian—are works that will not soon die. But her fame will rest on her poetical and not on her prose writings. In the world of literature, in coming ages, she will be known as a poet; nor will it be by that name almost invidiously attached to her—though kindly intended—"the Mrs. Hemans of America;" for Mrs. Sigourney has as true an identity in the world of literature as Mrs. Hemans; and we doubt not that her recognition, by future ages, as a truly inspired poet will be as hearty and as enduring.

Does any one doubt whether true pathos—deep and holy pathos—is to be found in the lines of Mrs. Sigourney? let him read the poem entitled "To-Morrow," or "The Emigrant Mother," or "Unspoken Language," or "The Mohawk Warrior," or others of a similar character. We doubt whether Wordsworth ever produced any thing that speaks more tenderly or stronger to the heart than "The Emigrant Mother" and "To-Morrow." Let us take a single scene from "Unspoken Language:"

"I had a friend
Beloved in halcyon days, whom stern disease
Smote ere her prime.

In curtain'd room she dwelt,
A lingerer, while each lingering moon convey'd
Some treasured leaflet of our hope away.
The power that with the tissued lungs doth dwell,
Sweetly to wake the modulating lip,

Was broken; but the violet-tinctured eye
Acquired new pathos.

When the life-tide crept
Cold through its channels, o'er her couch I bent.
There was no sound. But in the upraised glance
Her loving heart held converse, as with forms
Not of this outer world. Unearthly smiles
Gave earnest beauty to the pallid brow;
While ever and anon the emaciate hand
Spread its white fingers, as it fain would clasp
Some object hovering near.

The last faint tone
Was a fond sister's name, one o'er whose grave
The turf of years had gathered. Was she there—
That disembodied dear one? Did she give
The lips of welcome to the occupant
Of her own infant cradle?

So 'twould seem.
But that fix'd eye no further answer delgued,
Its earthly mission o'er. Henceforth it spake
The spirit-lore of immortality."

Strength of expression as well as striking imagery are by no means wanting in Mrs. Sigourney's poems. Take the following description of the woodman. We can hardly conceive how any thing can be more compact or expressive.

"He lifts his puny arm,
And every echo of the ax doth hew
The iron heart of centuries away."

Take another specimen from the poem on "Friendship with Nature:"

"Regard not time's brief tyranny, O man!
Made in God's image; but uplift thy brow,
And by the glory of the inward light
Which falls on Nature's dial night and day,
Mark out thy journey to the realms of love."

Take also the following passage from the "Unrifed Cabinet:"

"In the mind's storehouse, gold we had, and gems Gather'd from many a tome. The key we gave
To Memory, and she hath betrayed her trust.
For when we ask her, she saith that years
And sleepless cares disturbed her, till she lost
Our stewardship of thought."

Surely it was no feeble power of thought that gave birth to conceptions so noble, and wrought them into a combination of such beauty and strength. They would not sully the page of Milton; and found among the gems of Wordsworth or Mrs. Hemans, the friends of either would be proud to own them.

Standing upon the bank of that mighty cataract, in the agony of her admiration, Mrs. Butler exclaimed, "O God! who can describe Niagara?" Let the reader drink in the inspiration and grandeur of the following lines from Mrs. Sigourney's poem entitled "Niagara," and then answer:

"Flow on forever in thy glorious robe
Of terror and of beauty. Yea, flow on Unfathom'd and resistless. God hath set
His rainbow on thy forehead, and the cloud

Mantled around thy feet. And he doth give Thy voice of thunder power to speak of him
Eternally—bidding the lip of man
Keep silence—and upon thine altar pour
Incense of awe-struck praise.

Earth fears to lift

The insect-trump that tells her trifling joys
Or fleeting triumphs, mid the peal sublime
Of thy tremendous hymn. Proud ocean shrinks
Back from thy brotherhood, and all his waves
Retire abashed. For he hath need to sleep,
Sometimes, like a spent laborer, calling home
His boisterous billows, from their vexing play,
To a long, dreary calm; but thy strong tide
Faints not, nor e'er with falling heart forgets
Its everlasting lesson, night nor day.
The morning stars that hailed creation's birth,
Heard thy hoarse anthem mixing with their song
Jehovah's name; and the dissolving fires,
That wait the mandate of the day of doom
To wreck the earth, shall find it deep inscribed
Upon thy rocky scroll.

Thou dost speak

Alone of God, who poured thee as a drop
From his right hand—bidding the soul that looks Upon thy fearful majesty be still,
Be humbly wrapp'd in its own nothingness,
And lose itself in him."

We hesitate not to say that for grandeur and beauty of imagery, for strength and felicity of expression, this poem has rarely been surpassed. It thrills the soul like the voice of the cataract itself.

The genial and sympathetic nature of the poet is well expressed in the following paragraph from a poem addressed to "The Teacher." She is seconding the plea made by the young and joyous ones for a holiday:

"It is well

To mingle sunbeams with the seed that sows
The immortal mind. Damp sorrow's moody mist
Doth quell the aspiring thought, and steal away
Childhood's young wealth of happiness, that God
Gave as its birthright. Strive to blend the glow
Of gladness with thy discipline, and urge Duty by love. Remember how the blood
Coursed through their own quick veins, when life was new,
Nor make the isthmus 'twixt the boy and man
A bridge of sighs."

We had made additional selections illustrative of other traits of Mrs. Sigourney's genius as a poet, but have not space for them here. We will only add, that the healthy moral energy which is diffused throughout her poems as well as prose writings, is constantly stealing into the reader's mind; it comes like a spirit influence—soft, gentle, but powerful. It indicates the presence of the real poet; it possesses the power of imparting greater strength and a holier tone to the better sentiments and sympathies of the heart; its drawings are ever upward and heavenward.

Scripture Cabinet.

SYMMETRICAL STRUCTURE OF THE SCRIPTURES, OR SCRIPTURE PARALLELISM.—Since the days of Bishop Lowth the parallelisms of the Bible have formed a favorite theme of inquiry with Biblical students. That eminent scholar thought he traced in the poetical parts of Scripture a correspondence between the different clauses of the same sentence, phrase answering to phrase, and thought to thought. This correspondence of different clauses he found to be sometimes identical, sometimes gradational—that is, the same thought carried further—and sometimes antithetic; and he applied the rules thus suggested to the explanation of the Psalms and Proverbs. Bishop Jebb extended these inquiries, and found that the principle was applicable to much of the prose of Scripture, and especially of the New Testament. More recent inquirers have gone further still. Mr. Boys, in his Theosis Sacra and Key to the Book of Psalms, shows that parallelism is found not only in sentences, but in entire paragraphs of Scripture, and even in epistles.

Dr. Forbes^o goes still further. He thinks that the whole Bible is written under the influence of the law of parallelism; and that this law is like one of the grand generalizations of modern science—a discovery of the last importance to the student. It explains the meaning; it determines the text; it solves difficulties of history and chronology to an extent beyond what its most sanguine friends had previously dreamed.

We can illustrate this principle of Scripture parallelism no better than by making an application of it, according to the parallelists, to the decalogue. The law consists, as all know, of ten commands, and is divided into two tables. It is not agreed, however, what the ten are, or how they are to be divided. The Masorets, Augustine, the Roman and Lutheran Churches, unite the first and second command—sometimes deleting the second—and divide the tenth into two, reckoning three commands in the first table and seven in the second. The division of Origen, adopted by most Protestants, places four in the first and six in the second. Nor do any of those authorities trace any close connection between the commands themselves.

On the other hand, the parallelists profess to discover striking connections not only between the commands, but also important significance in the numbers of the commands. But to illustrate these points. Dr. Forbes thinks that the division of the decalogue is twofold, threefold, sevenfold, and tenfold, and that the different portions are intimately connected. His conclusions will be more readily comprehended if we give them in a tabular form.

FIRST. FIRST TABLE.

1. God is to be honored and loved in himself.

- | | |
|----------|--|
| Thought. | I. I am the Lord thy God,
Which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.
Thou shalt have no other God before me. |
| | II. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth.
Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them:
For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, And showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. |

Word.	III. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. For the Lord will not hold him guiltless, That taketh his name in vain.
	IV. 1. a. Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. b. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, c. But the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. d. In it thou shalt not do any work—Thou (1) Nor thy son (2) nor thy daughter (3) Nor thy man-servant (4) nor thy maid-servant (5) Nor thy cattle (6) Nor the stranger that is within thy gates (7) e. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is. f. And rested the seventh day: g. Wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day and hallowed it.

2. God is to be honored in those to whom he gives honor.

- | | |
|-------|---|
| Deed. | V. Honor thy father and thy mother,
That thy days may be long in the land
Which the Lord thy God giveth thee. |
| | VI. Thou shalt not kill. |

BROTHERLY LOVE. SECOND TABLE.

3. God is to be loved in those who are made in his image.

- | | |
|-------|--------------------------------------|
| Deed. | VII. Thou shalt not commit adultery. |
| | VIII. Thou shalt not steal. |
- | | |
|-------|--|
| Word. | IX. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. |
| | X. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house (1) Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife (2) Nor his man-servant (3) nor his maid-servant (4) Nor his ox (5) nor his ass (6) Nor any thing that is thy neighbor's. (7.) |

This twofold division—first and second tables—implies, as always, antithetic relation—God and man, piety and morality; and the connection between the two. The few commands of each table imply—as five always does—the imperfection of each apart from the other. The threefold division—1, 2, 3—indicates, as always, the completeness of the whole, God and man, the two extremes, and our earthly parents—to whom filial piety is due—connecting us with both. The sevenfold enumeration of particulars in commands IV and X is instructive, seven being a perfect number, and moreover the number of the covenant. Other divisions again may be noticed:

*THE SYMMETRICAL STRUCTURE OF SCRIPTURE; or, the Principles of Scripture Parallelism, Exemplified in an Analysis of the Decalogue, the Sermon on the Mount, and other Passages of the Sacred Writings. By the Rev. John Forbes, LL. D., Donaldson's Hospital, Edinburgh. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark 1854. 8vo. Pp. 364.

thoughts, words, deeds, are enjoined and prohibited under both tables. The whole is made up of seventeen triplets. The series of commands to which the decalogue itself belongs—Exodus xxi, xxiii—make seven groups of ten commands each, and some have even arranged the whole of the precepts of the Jewish dispensation under seventy times seven, or four hundred and ninety in all.

It will be noticed in the fourth command that parallelism shows the reason for each precept: 1, 2, 3, (a, b, c,) answering to 5, 6, 7, (b, c, a.)

We give our readers this glimpse of the system of Scripture parallelism, but without any design of indorsing it in the extent to which it has been carried. We can not believe that any such mechanical or mathematical combination of sentences ever entered into the designs of the sacred writers. Combination, harmony, and dependence of parts there undoubtedly are in the sacred writings; but we must confess that such a studied mechanical combination as is here suggested would add nothing to the value of the sacred Scriptures in our estimation. Nay, we must confess ourself so far "behind the age" of "progressive Biblical interpretation," that we can regard it only as a fanciful chimera—affording a pleasing exercise for the imagination, and, in fine, rather innocent and useful unless pushed to an extreme.

THE FAMILY ALTAR.—Every body has read the "Cotter's Saturday Night," which, if Burns had written nothing else, would have made his name immortal. The poem opens with a description of "the toil-worn cotter" returning to his home on a shortening winter's day. The weekly moil being at an end, the cattle, mired and weary, are retreating from the plow, and the "blackening trains o' crows" are speeding away to the distant woodlands. The spade, the mattock, and the hoe are laid aside, and the rest of the Scottish Sabbath is looked for hopefully.

And now, rising in the distance over the moor, the lowly cot appears, sheltered by an aged tree. The children, "expectant wee things," are seen "wi' flitcherins' noise an' glee," "todlin stachet through, to meet their dad." He reaches the house; and there the cheerful fire, "blinkin bonnillie," and the clean hearthstone, his thrifty wife's smile, and the lisping infant prattling on his knee,

"Do a' his weary carking cares beguile,
An' mak him quite forget his labor and his toll."

Then, by and by, the elder "bairns" come dropping in, one after another, from the neighboring farmers, in whose service they are engaged. The brothers and sisters meet with joy unfeigned, and kindly inquire for each other's welfare, and severally relate what they have heard and seen. The mother, "wi' her needle an' her sheers," is making old clothes look almost as well as new. The father mixes admonition. The young folks are warned to obey the command of their master and mistress, to mind their labors with a diligent hand, "to fear the Lord alway," to mind their duty in the morning and evening, to implore his counsel and assistance; and they are encouraged to hope that they shall not seek his face in vain.

The cheerful supper is next introduced, crowning the simple board; "the halesome parritch," and "the sopp their only hawkie does afford," the pure and simple meal of the Scottish peasantry, and worthy the notice of pampered stomachs burning with indigestion.

But the following scene crowns the whole, in its matchless simplicity and beauty:

"The cheefu' supper done," a wide circle is formed around the ingle, and seriousness instinctively spreads over every face. "The sire," laying aside his bonnet, carefully turns over "the big ha' Bible," once the property and the pride of his father. He next selects a portion—Psalm—with judicious care, and solemnly commences the evening service with, "Let us worship God;" when all unite to chant their artless notes to the wild warbling measures of "Dundee," or "Plaintive Martyrs," or "Noble Elgin," the sweetest lays of Scotia.

"Compared with these, Italian trills are tame," and have no union with the praise of our great Creator.

The sacred page is next read by "the priest-like father;" and the portion is of "Abraham the friend of God," or Moses warring with Amalek's ungracious progeny, or "Job's pathetic plaint," or "rapt Isaiah's wild seraphic fire."

"Perhaps the Christian volume is the theme,
How guiltless blood for guilty man was shed;
How he, who bore in heaven the sacred name,
Had not on earth whereon to lay his head."

The Scriptures having been read, they kneel to "heaven's eternal King," while

"The saint, the father, and the husband prays;"

and hope exultingly springs up in each member of that lovely circle, that they shall all meet again in future days:

"No more to sigh, or shed the bitter tear."

What a delightful picture is here presented for our eye to gaze upon! And who, we ask, can look steadily upon it, and not discern its charms, and feel its earnest appeal to his judgment and his heart?

"Compared with this, how poor Religion's pride,
In all the pomp of method and of art;
When men display to congregations wide,
Devotion's every grace, except the heart!"

Do we wonder that the great chief of Israel's armies should resolve that "his house should serve the Lord," or that a king should "return to bless his household?" The tenderest associations are identified with the family altar. It is there the Christian father deepens the reproof or counsel he has given to his child. It is there he seeks to check the progress of corruption, and foster the early developments of grace. The family crosses and rods, as well as its triumphs and its joys, are all carried to that hallowed spot, and there "sanctified by the word of God and prayer." No new duty is entered upon, no old one is prosecuted, without a daily baptism at the family altar. It is there the father commends the child to God, when he is leaving the parental roof to tread the untrod paths of the world, and remembers him ever after, however distant. And the family altar becomes the solace and the stay of the absent one, amid the bruises of the thorny path of life. And then when death stealthily approaches, and puts out one of the lights of their habitation, the family altar becomes the fountain whence wounded hearts can draw heavenly consolation; and "the valley of Achor," where the echo of the loved one's voice is heard.

The altar in the family is like the compass in the ship—its guide; like the sun in the heavens—its light; like a stream in the desert—its solace; like the lightning-rod to the building—warding off all evil. It checks vice in the family, heals breaches in the house, cherishes domestic affections, sanctifies domestic bereavements, and when all else fails, and every comfort is withdrawn, and every endeared one is passed into eternity, it is the spot where the only surviving member may repose, and revel in the most interesting reminiscences, and luxuriate in the most brilliant prospects.

So simple, so beautiful, so endeared by a thousand interesting associations, shall we venture to put this among our "neglected things?" We fear we must—not, indeed, for the sake of making a chapter, or filling a page, but simply because it is in real life frequently slighted and neglected.

We rejoice to be able to certify, as the result of careful observation in the walks of Christian life, that there are hundreds and thousands of godly families who conscientiously attend to this duty; but in others it is criminally set aside. Perhaps it is observed in the morning, and omitted in the evening; or neglected in the morning, and attended to in the evening.

It has been said, that "those families who pray, do well; those who read and pray, do better; and those who sing, and read, and pray, do best of all." In many cases the reading of the Scriptures is omitted altogether. In other cases some members of the family are overlooked in this duty. "Some mornings since," says a writer in the Presbyterian Advocate, "I was at the house of a very worthy man, whose wife was behind him in no proposal to do good. The family were called in; husband, wife, children, and stranger; but no servants. I had read a portion of Scripture, and was leading in prayer, when I heard a rattling of knives and forks. As I knew all that belonged to the house, I could very easily tell why, and also by whom. The absence was not from any false pride, or shame to have the servants appear in the dress in which the duties of the kitchen or house were performed, or any objection; but simply sheer thoughtlessness. They did not think; which was supposed to be a sufficient excuse for neglecting it."

Reader, hast thou an altar in thy house? Perhaps thy father had; and often didst thou bend the knee there. Perhaps thou hadst an altar thyself, reared with thine own hands in brighter, better days; but those same hands have aided to break it down, and God has written Ichabod upon the ruin. Make haste to repair it; and "blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy time, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. Blessed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out." If, however, thou bend not the knee, nor lift the eye, nor sing the hymn, nor read the chapter, nor offer the prayer, tremble. The "curse" pronounced on those nations and those families which call not upon God's name hangeth over thee.

A HINT TO MOTHERS ON PRAYING WITH THEIR CHILDREN.—Late I was much struck with a little piece of history related to me by a Christian lady; and hoping that, by God's blessing, it may be useful to mothers and those who have the care of children, I give it, as nearly as I can recollect, in the words of my friend:

"How careful mothers should be to inquire into the state of their children's minds! I shall never forget what I suffered when I was a child, through my own shyness, and through my poor dear mother never questioning me as to what I felt and desired, etc. Mother never knew, but I used to be so anxious at times about my soul. I would have given any thing for her to have talked to me; and I used to wonder how ever it could be that she did not. One thing I especially remember, because it occasioned me most grief. Mother used to retire for prayer and reading once or twice in the day: I knew her times, and what she went up-stairs for; and many a time have I left my play and followed her. I used to go and listen at the door, to hear if she prayed for me; and, O! I should have been delighted to have gone with her. Sometimes I used to play with the handle of the door, hoping she would come and ask me what I wanted; but instead of that, she would come out and tell me not to interrupt her, but to go to play. O! my heart was ready to break. I never went to play; no, I used to go and shut myself in another room, and cry and sob dreadfully, and think to myself, 'I have a soul as well as mother; and I as much want praying for. I wish mother would call me in, or ask me what I have been crying for.'

"Now, my mother was one of the best and holiest of women: I never knew a fault in her, unless it was this. Had she but known my feelings, she would have taken me by the hand with delight, and have prayed with me; but she never questioned me, and I was too shy to speak. I have often been grieved to think of it."

Mothers! this simple narrative speaks volumes. Have your children ever suffered in the same manner?

JOY OVER REPENTING SINNERS.—"There is joy among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth," said the Lord Jesus: he who knew what transpired far above yon azure ceiling, as well as on the green sward beneath his feet.

Who can tell the intensity of the flame thus burning within those "ministers of fire?" Who discover the depth of love that finds utterance in their exulting joy?

"Who can tell the joys that rise
Through all the courts of paradise,
To see a prodigal return,
To see an heir of glory born?"

Great was the joy of the woman on recovering her lost piece of silver, and that of the man on recovering his lost sheep; but what is angelic joy at the return of the penitent soul? We are unable to fathom its depth; but a faint conception may, however, be awakened on a perusal of the following, related in the writer's hearing:

A pious ship captain had long prayed to a prayer-hearing and answering God for the conversion of his godless wife and daughter. The heavens were as brass: the prayers long seemed ineffectual. Years rolled by, and no spiritual change had taken place in either of the subjects of his intercession. One morning, however, he perceived tears, and heard broken accents, and gathered the words as they escaped from the lips of wife and daughter, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" His joy knew no bounds. They obtained a sense of God's favor; and with a speed to which he had for years been unaccustomed, he flew to his vessel, hauled the flags on deck in great haste, knotted them on to the flag-ropes, and ran them up to the mast-head. With one hand he pressed upon his fluttering heart; the tears of "joy and not of grief" chased each other down his weather-beaten cheeks; his other hand pointed upward; and as, with an eagle gaze, his eye penetrated the very clouds, far beyond the mast-head, "There," said he, "there they wave, and silent about, 'Victory through the blood of the Lamb!'"

But, dear reader, far above the ken of his vision, discernible only by the eye of faith, even in "the heaven of heavens," there was joy among the angels of God over these repenting sinners. Happy he who thus raises the joys of heaven.

Editorial Sketch and Review.

THE WORLD A WORKSHOP.

We concluded our previous article with some remarks and a quotation or two on fire. We resume our remarks by glancing at the necessity of having fuel with which to keep up a fire, as well as being possessed of the ability to start it. The bowels of the earth are stored with inexhaustible supplies of coal, and every thing which has been discovered about it shows what it was intended for, and of the importance attached to it by the Creator. "Its formation began with the earliest land vegetation, that no time might be lost in its preparation, and the advent of man not be unnecessarily delayed.

"The first vegetation grew rank, and, as it ripened, much of it appears to have sunk, as in peat bogs, for trunks are found in perpendicular positions. Then a new geological period brought over the whole a platen of rock, and thus closed up the products of the first carboniferous epoch, preparatory to their undergoing the requisite pressure to fossilize them.

"The annual yield of the English mines has risen to 34,600,000 tons. This enormous drain has led to inquiries respecting the future: some writers predict exhaustion within a few centuries, others contend that nothing of the kind is inferable, even with a continually increased demand. In South Wales are stores not opened. They have been examined and found to extend over an area of about 12,000 square miles, and they alone could meet the demand after all the present English coal mines are worked out. In the United States over 150,000 square miles of coal beds have been ascertained already—of these upward of 40,000 are in Illinois.

"In nothing are the manufacturing purposes of the Creator more obvious than in the article of fuel. Of what value indeed could metallic ores and soft earths have been without it? To meet the constant demand, wood, peat, turf, and other inflammable materials, are spread over the earth's surface, while its interior is surcharged with coal. It is a magazine of fuel and of materials to be heated. As long as it remains a factory, coal must be provided, and will be. There is reason to believe that the formation of this substance is now going on in the depths of our oceans—preparing a supply for workmen under new configurations of the surface."

The supplying of food does not belong to the mineral kingdom; but it furnishes that which gives food its best relish—salt. And how do you suppose, reader, salt is obtained? In most countries it is quarried as men would quarry minerals. "The mines of England have long been worked, and some are among the richest yet discovered. The consumption of salt in Great Britain is estimated at 616,000,000 pounds. Counting twenty-two pounds for each individual, and assuming this as a fair allowance for the world's consumption—and we should suppose it under rather than over the truth, since there are immense quantities consumed by cattle, and more still in various manufactures and arts not included—then the thousand millions of human beings require an annual supply of twenty-two thousand millions of pounds.

"In warm climates, the sea is a magazine of salt, the water being evaporated in wide basins, formed in the soil. That little Atlantic patch, known as Turk's Island, furnishes about fifty thousand bushels of sea salt weekly.

Salt springs are also more or less common in all countries. Were it required to quote particulars respecting the sources of rock salt, we might refer to one bed of it in Galicia, which is four hundred and sixty miles long, ninety miles wide, and twelve hundred feet thick."

Let us turn our attention now to the vegetable products of the earth. Why did not God make trees to grow lengthwise or horizontally on the ground instead of growing up perpendicularly or straight? Can any tell? Had trees grown horizontally, nearly or quite every inch of the earth's surface would have been occupied with closely interlaced timber, and the earth itself would have looked like a spherical raft, floating and plunging through space, asking some other planet or world to buy the stock of cord wood on hand. Why were not the sections of the boles of trees in some other form than that of circles? Simply because, had they grown up in wide slabs, in square or angular masses, the same quantity of material would have taken up a vast deal more of space, and the trees themselves would have been less able to resist storms of wind, and would seriously have interrupted the passage of animals through forests.

As in the case of metals, vegetables are presented to man in manageable masses. "Had they generally approached in dimensions the great California cedar—three hundred and twenty-five feet high and ninety-two feet in circumference at the ground; eighty-eight feet at four feet, and sixty-six feet at ten feet above the ground—what could have been done with them—with logs, one of which, laid along the pavement of some streets, would fill them to the roofs of three-story houses?" Like human kind trees have their infancy and their age. The one grows up, attains its complement of years, and dies; so with the other. Any experienced wood-chopper or lumberman can tell when a tree is ripe or ready to be cut down, or, rather, when they acquire no more sound wood! After this period they may swell, like a man with the dropsy, but it will only be a swelling and a puffing up. "Gigantic trees are almost always hollow. Emigrants' wagons are often backed into the interior of ancient buttonwoods. The great dragon-tree of the Canaries, sixteen feet in diameter, was as thick and hollow in A. D. 1403 as it is now. The largest European oak—in France—is twenty-three feet diameter, but within the trunk is a natural chamber, over ten feet one way and twelve another. Besides the mammoth tree of California, already mentioned, there are others in Oregon and California of the same kind; some even larger, but not sound. One offers a more commodious room than many miners' lodges. Of some blown down, a gentleman rode his horse through one, from end to end; another is mentioned one hundred and ten feet in circumference and four hundred and ten feet in length. This, too, is hollow; and if the hollow was a little enlarged it would make a very good rope-walk."

"The widest planks," continues our author, "to be met with in the Atlantic cities are in boxes in which sugar comes in from the interior; namely, from two and a half to three feet. The tree that furnishes them is the jequitaba, one of the largest of Brazilian trees. The wood is white, soft, and light, something like our white-wood. I heard of the most extraordinary one on the upper waters of the Macacu river, which runs into the bay of Rio Janeiro. It was said to surpass in magnitude all others in the province. It was a straight, slightly tapering shaft, clear of branches and foliage for one hundred feet up. Near the ground it was thirty-two feet in circumference, and three feet above the ground twenty-seven feet. Its roots at one part presented the appearance of a range of vertical wall or rock, and fifty paces from the trunk they appeared half out of the ground, in long masses, two and a half and even three feet in diameter. A few feet above the ground there was a handsomely formed round hole in the trunk, naturally formed, and through it I pushed a stick in a horizontal position seven feet, so that the stately trunk was hollow—a mere tube, whose walls were so thin as to cause surprise at their stability. A few years more, and it will be prostrated by age and decay."

The hickory-tree never grows to the size of the poplar in its bole or circumference, or the black walnut; neither is the oak half as heavy as the fir-tree. Hence, the largest trees are light in their texture, and are easily worked by man. The baobab, or monkey-bread-tree, of Senegambia, grows frequently to a size of twenty and even thirty feet in diameter. One is still standing which is thirty-two feet in diameter, and is supposed to be between five and six thousand years old; but these trees, like the chestnuts of Mount Atlas, are very limited in their height, and their trunks could not be worked up by man into any very useful purpose. Their work is to furnish food for animals, not lumber for man.

"A new world of thought and of art is opened in wood simply: so different from minerals, in its being developed before our eyes, in the system of perpetuating its varieties, in the diverse magnitudes of trees and their variegated crowns of foliage; in the mechanical properties of the ligneous fiber; in its diverse degrees of hardness, softness, flexibility, elasticity, and texture; every feature offering a class of advantages in the arts; in its ornamental attributes, too, as exhibited in colors—jet in ebony, black and dark brown in walnuts and oaks, purple and light greens in the munjaddy and mylo-ellah of India, red in mahogany and cedar, yellow in box, satin-wood, and the maples; then there is the red ebony of Australia, the cream-tinted and snow-white tulip-tree, and every shade and tint in others. Moreover, how still more attractive are these colors made by straight, curved, waving, and involved graining! In addition to which, there is always more or less shading; and in cocoa and other rich woods are cloud-like dashes of India ink—some after the manner of tortoise-shell, and others resembling jaguars' and leopards' skins—invariably producing such pleasing effects that decorative artists incessantly labor to imitate them.

"Then woods, besides furnishing examples of painting in colors, provide us with material for giving to other substances colors which they do not always themselves possess. Each pigment, too, besides imparting its every tint, contributes to develop other and very different colors. Logwood yields blacks and purples; fustic, olive-browns and yellows; barwood, camwood, Brazil, and sappan woods impart reds, blacks, and browns; woad and indigo, blues and greens; madder, the brilliant scarlet or turkey red; turmeric, bright yellows; orchil, purples, reds, and blues; annatto, orange; safflower, crimson, scarlet, rose-color, and pink. There is the green ebony, and a thousand more dyewoods, known and unknown."

Clearly wood was specially designed for man; for no other occupant of this globe is so well able to appreciate its worth; at any rate none but man can use it, or the lacs and dyes which it furnishes, as does he. Look at the vegetable materials for ropes, for wicker and basket-ware, cotton, hemp, flax, and other fibrous plants, and specially at the profusion of vegetable aliments. The amount of thread produced each year is all but inconceivable. During the year 1852 one billion, four hundred and eighty-one millions of pounds of cotton were worked up into it. "At the London Exhibition one manufacturer furnished samples of one pound of cotton spun into nine hundred hanks of eight hundred and forty yards each, making nearly four hundred and thirty miles. Another firm exhibited four thousand, two hundred hanks of the same number of yards each, making two thousand miles from a single pound of cotton! If we, therefore, multiply the above amount only by four hundred and thirty, the length of thread that a single crop of cotton could make, would be over six hundred billions of miles, or sufficient for a web of stout calico, a yard wide, and containing eighty-five threads to the inch, that would be more than enough to reach from us to the sun.

"We inclose our bodies in artificial cocoons: in winter a lady is incased in a hundred miles of thread; she throws over her shoulders from thirty to fifty in a shawl. A gentleman winds between three and four miles round his neck and uses four more in a pocket-handkerchief. At night he throws off his clothing and buries himself, like a larva, in four or five hundred miles of convolved filaments."

No proof exists that either the flax or the cotton plant existed on the earth before the creation of man; but, on the other hand, the strong presumption is, that they were created after man and for man. To know to what extent food may be raised for our sustenance and well-being, take the following: "There were raised in 1850 in the United States upward of five hundred and ninety-two million bushels of maize or Indian corn. Counting the bushel at one and a quarter cubic feet, the grain would have filled a store-room twenty feet wide, ten feet deep, and seven hundred miles in length. The yield of wheat in 1851—125,607,000 bushels—would require an additional twenty miles to the structure; rye thirteen, buckwheat nine, barley four, between eight and nine for peas and beans, three or four for rice, and not less than five hundred for potatoes, beets, and other tubers. Partitions, miles apart, would also be required for apples, peaches, grapes, plums, cherries, and orchard produce; for sugar—over 200,000,000 pounds—nuts, strawberries, gooseberries, currants; for peppers, mustard, spices, and condiments, and all the produce of market gardens, over a thousand miles more would be taken up.

"Of tea, England imported in 1853, 66,360,555 pounds. Of coffee, the world's product is between three and four hundred thousand tons. The world's crop of sugar from cane, beet-root, and maples, can not be less than 900,000 tons, since the amount recognized in commerce is 840,365 tons. The demand is rapidly swelling, but however much it may increase, there are no limits to the means of supply."

Let us turn our attention, now, to the third storehouse of matter, animal products. Man is supplied by animals, to an unlimited extent, with materials for his fabrics, and such as he could not obtain elsewhere, as wool, hair, feathers, down, silk, leather, glue, horn, ivory, wax, oils, bone, pearl, tortoise, sperm, whalebone, isinglass, coloring-matters, etc. It is not pretended at all that man can create birds or animals, or any thing with life; but while this is true, he can essentially control, or, rather, modify the products which they yield.

It is quite impossible to furnish any thing but a few specimens of the products furnished by domestic animals. Glance at the article of leather. In England, in 1851, 2,330,901 hides were tanned, and yearly she uses up 80,000,000 pounds of leather, and the value of the manufactured article can not be less than $70,000,000. A single state in this country—Massachusetts—manufactures not less than twelve millions of dollars worth of shoes annually. There is the article of wool, the clip of which, in the United States, for 1850, was 59,516,959 pounds. In 1854 there were estimated to be 32,006,000 sheep in Great Britain, the clip of which amounted, last season, to 120,000,000 pounds. Beside this 70,000,000 pounds were received the same year into England from Australia. In the article of tallow, in the year 1848, Russia, after supplying all her own wants, sent to other parts of the world 137,000,000 pounds.

Man can work in the waters of the ocean and enrich himself to an extent which the pen can not describe; for the fecundity of the ocean surpasses even that of the land, and the streams which man can turn into his garners never cease to flow. Birds and insects do not elaborate as much matter for manufactures as quadrupeds; but the value of their labors is nevertheless incalculable. Our limits, however, forbid a further discussion of this part of our author's treatise, and we pass to another.

In section second we have man discussed, his nature, his instincts, and his achievements, all of which indicate the nature and purposes of his being. "Observe the perfect freedom of his upper limbs to operate on matter, in consequence of their being released from the labor of sustaining the body and aiding in its locomotion; a feature peculiar to his species, and the one which specially proclaims him an artisan. Mark the termination of those limbs in the hands; the adaptation of these to work in all substances, their duality, the double jointed-levers they are attached to, their lithe and diverse movements, their power to grasp objects of every shape, their durability under incessant wear and tear; the articulations of the wrist and fingers to avoid the necessity of always moving the arm with them, and of a consequent waste of power: the sense of touch in the fingers, so exquisite and so active in a thousand acts. In the large development of the thumb man's superiority as a manipulator largely consists; it has been named a second hand. Still, it was in the unoccupied levers at whose extremities the fingers are that his instincts as an artisan resided, and through which they have been manifested. Had those levers been employed as in their nearest analogues, man had been at best but an improved orang-outang, but in disengaging them from other service, and placing them as it were like laborers in the market-place waiting to be employed, the Creator gave us in them the prime instruments of our elevation."

Mr. Ewbank contends with great strenuousness that man, at his creation, was made a worker—an artisan—that on the first opening of his eyes he beheld "nothing but a vast factory crowded with work." The raw materials, not finished goods, were at hand, and he had to go to work. He had wheat, but no bread; wood, but no furnace; clay, but no brick; sand, but no glass; iron, but none in bars, and so he had to use his hands or die. Speaking of the climates of all colored men as rich in materials for the arts, our author digresses somewhat from the main topic on hand to deliver himself of the opinion that "colored people are inferior" to white men. Who or what could have prompted such a thing we shall not pretend to determine.

In discussing the question of several centers of population, Mr. Ewbank takes occasion to state that in spinning, the art of pottery, the use of the hand-mill, and a knowledge of the lamp, the early inhabitants of the American continent were quite as fully civilized as any other portion of the earth. Hence the inference that civilization is "an independent development."

As to natural mechanisms, these are constantly giving hints to man. "Whenever a stone ax is plowed up we do not want an ancient Indian to rise out of a mound to tell us what use it was put to. A knife, a pen, or any other manufactured article is a tangible thought, or a congeries of thoughts, in which the mind and workings of the mind of the designer is perceived; and so it is, that the ideas and reasonings, if the terms be allowable, of the Creator stand out in all his works. To those who study his mechanisms, his intentions are as perceptible in forms, motions, and proportions; in levers, joints, valves, tubes, mechanical equivalents, and results; as those of a human engineer in any one of his works."

In the beauty every-where perceptible in the natural world, man is taught a lesson of most pertinent and valuable instruction. But beauty must not be confounded with elegant outlines simply or wholly; for a thing to be beautiful must have its outlines accord with the uses for which it was made. No tea-cup formed like a pipe-stem, ever so beautifully worked, and no railroad track running in a circle could be called beautiful, as the ends for which each was designed are frustrated. "Such," contends our author, "is the sense of beauty pervading the mind of the divine Proprietor, that he has introduced an adjunct to it in colors. With these he has embellished every thing on earth, in air, and in water. We tread on a carpet of tapestry the richness of which we do not appreciate, while the canopy over us is an ever-changing series of paintings. What pleasures, physical, moral, and intellectual, we had never known if the earth and sky, and all objects between them, had been of a uniform hue! But colors serve more purposes than to please the eye. There shines not a tint on the breast of a thrush, nor a gleam of iridescence on a humming-bird's throat, nor a golden spot on a common trout's body, nor a feather of flame in the flamingo's wing, but has its uses, although naturalists have not yet divined what they are. The summer dresses of arctic animals and birds are regularly thrown off, and winter ones put on; but as yet little progress has been made in the investigation of such matters, and of the laws by which colors are developed and defined, notwithstanding the pleasures and profit the knowledge must bring."

Like all enthusiasts, Mr. Ewbank runs his theme of labor to the very extreme. He deems it man's highest and only mission on earth to labor; and while he acknowledges the existence of an immortal principle in man, he goes to work to show that the spiritual needs not a tithe of the attention that the physical does. But we forbear any remarks here. With a quotation on mind, as the main operator on matter, we must conclude our already too long dissertation. We have to regret that Mr. Ewbank could not have been more explicit in his allusions to the soul as the immaterial and immortal part in man.

"It is marvelous that any created being should be able to study its own organization, and reason on the causes and modes of its existence; that man, a piece of animated matter, should pry into his own structure, and, by dissecting the bodies of his fellows, find out the reasons that determined the forms and proportions of his own organs; and that he should then turn from himself and inquire into the nature and attributes of the Author of his being! The wonder is not greater than if balls of clay in the hands of a potter should ask, "What doest thou?" or if spinning-jennies and power-looms were to pause in their movements to inquire why they were made. Man is a tissue of marvels; his little seething brain, as if a part of the Godhead were located in it, spurns at boundaries to his thoughts. He neither confines them to the world he occupies nor to the visible heavens, but urges them through the invisible depths of space to learn, if possible, what is doing there. Nor is this all: not content with employing them on things of the present, he sends them into the future, and exercises them on the past. He is told, that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth; but he longs to know how they were produced—by what principles and processes they were developed and are sustained.

"That this amazing faculty is given for the great purposes of his education, it were a truism to assert; more than any thing else it shows how illimitable are the soul's aspirations. As for imaginings of what was before the sidereal heavens appeared, they can hardly be carried farther than a supposed condition of things, which may be illustrated by a discovery made some years ago of a subterranean structure, of unknown origin and antiquity. The proprietor entered with a light; his voice reverberated along the arches, and the dark and silent chambers were instantly charged with clouds of dancing atoms awakened into motion by his presence. So, perhaps, was the cold and boundless abyss first charged by the voice of God with the dust of which stars are made."

Items, Literary, Scientific, and Religious.

METHODIST MONEY MATTERS IN 1854.—In the several annual conferences connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, the total deficiency in reference to the quarterage of preachers for the year 1854 was $132,189; and in reference to the table and fuel expenses there was about the same deficiencies, making, as the grand total owing to the Methodist ministry for services rendered last year, at least $260,000. The average number of cents contributed per member, for missions, in the New England conference, was fifty-eight cents; in the Cincinnati conference, forty-three; in the New York East, forty-two; in the Providence, forty-two; in the Baltimore, New York, Ohio, and North Ohio, thirty-nine, each; in the South-Eastern Indiana, thirty-one; North-Western Indiana, twenty-seven; Indiana, eighteen; North Indiana, seventeen; Iowa, seven, and Missouri, four cents.

THE VERDICT OF HISTORY.—Lord John Russell, in a recent speech at Bedford, England, alluding to the causes that had occasioned the decline of nations, said, "There have been despotic institutions, where men have been forbidden to investigate subjects of science, or discuss any improvement in art; where they have been forbidden, under penalty of fire, from holding any religious opinion different from that of the state. Where that despotism has existed, where that persecution has prevailed, the nation has withered under the influence."

WASHINGTON'S SEALS.—Washington was accustomed to wear a gold and a silver seal with his watch, on which the letters G. W. were cut. On the day of Braddock's defeat, in 1754, he lost the silver seal, and about seventeen years ago, his nephew, to whom the gold seal had been given after his death, dropped it while riding over his farm. Both of these seals were recently plowed up, about the same time, and they will again be united.

ENGLISH UNIVERSITY DEGREES.—Heretofore Americans attending Oxford and Cambridge, England, had, before taking their degrees, to subscribe to the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England, and to take the oath of allegiance to her Majesty the Queen.

Henceforward a student from the United States may matriculate in the University of Oxford without taking any oath whatever, or signing any religious articles. He may also take the degree of Bachelor of Arts, without oaths, subscription, or declaration of any kind, but not the degree of Master of Arts, nor any higher degree.

Degrees conferred by American colleges are not recognized at Oxford, the only universities which are recognized at present being Cambridge, England, and Dublin. A Bachelor of Arts from the United States can not, therefore, be admitted in Oxford, ad eundem.

DEPILATORY POWDERS.—These powders, which are used in removing the hair from one's face or neck, are usually composed of quicklime, soda, and a combination of sulphur and arsenic. On their application they are very apt to excite inflammation; and they never kill the roots of the hairs, but have to be used from time to time where one desires to keep the surface clean.

ANCIENT ANTIQUITIES.—Nineveh was 15 miles long, and 40 round, with walls 100 feet high, and thick enough for three chariots. Babylon was 60 miles within the walls, which were 75 feet thick and 300 high, with 100 brazen gates. The temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was 425 feet high. It was 900 hundred years in building. The largest of the pyramids is 481 feet high, and 763 feet on the sides; its base covers thirteen acres. The stones are about 30 feet in length, and the layers are 206: 100,000 men were employed in its erection. About the fifteen hundred and ninetieth part of the great pyramid of Egypt is occupied by chambers and passages; all the rest is solid masonry. The labyrinth of Egypt contains 3,000 chambers and twelve halls. Thebes, in Egypt, presents ruins 27 miles round. If has 100 gates. Carthage was 25 miles round. Athens was 25 miles round, and contained 25,000 citizens, and 400,000 slaves. The temple of Delphos was so rich in donations, that it was once plundered of £10,000 sterling; and Nero carried from it 500 statues. The walls of Rome were 13 miles in extent.

CURIOS COPYING ART.—Homography is the name of an art just discovered in France, by which, it is said, any typographical work, lithograph, or engraving may be reproduced instantaneously, cheaply, without damaging the original, so exactly that the most practiced eye can not tell the difference, and the copies may be multiplied indefinitely.

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.—On the 8th of December, at Rome, Pope Pius IX announced as an article of faith in the "holy Apostolic Church" the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. The meeting consisted of over two hundred full-robed ecclesiastical dignitaries, including sixty cardinals and one hundred and forty archbishops, representing every part of the world, besides some four hundred lesser luminaries of the Church. The discussion on the question lasted twenty-four hours; and when the decree was promulged, it is said that Rome was intoxicated with joy. Hereafter he who does not set down the Virgin in his creed as free from all stain of sin from her birth till her death, is to be deemed a heretic, and treated accordingly. She must be worshiped as superior to even Jesus Christ; and the world in the middle of the nineteenth century is to gulp down and digest, if possible, this terrible monstrosity.

DEATH OF KITTO.—Rev. Dr. Kitto, well known to the Christian public for his contributions to Biblical literature, died at Canstadt, near Stuttgart, Germany, November 25, 1854. His works on the Holy Land and those illustrative of the antiquities and history of Scripture are of special value. The following is a list of his works: Bible History of the Holy Land; Court and People of Persia; Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature; also an "Abridged" and a "People's edition" of this Cyclopaedia; Daily Bible Illustrations, eight volumes; Essays and Letters, with a Memoir; Geography of the Holy Land, with an Atlas; History of Palestine; Pictorial History of Palestine, two volumes; Lost Senses, Deafness and Blindness, two volumes; Physical Geography of the Holy Land, two volumes; Pictorial Life of our Savior; Scripture Lands and Bible Atlas; The Tabernacle and its Furniture. He also established and conducted, till within two years, "The Journal of Sacred Literature." The family of Dr. Kitto, consisting of the widow and seven or eight children, have been in very cramped and narrow circumstances since his death; but the pension granted in December last of two hundred and fifty dollars per year by Queen Victoria, will greatly relieve them in their poverty.

CONVENTIONS OF TEACHERS.—The late holidays between Christmas and New-Year's were occupied, as our readers may know, by sessions of the State Teachers' Conventions of Ohio and Indiana—the former meeting in Cincinnati and the latter in Indianapolis. The necessity of having the Bible introduced into all our common schools was ably argued before both conventions by leading members. The sessions of the Ohio Convention were held in the Ninth-Street Baptist Church, and the last day was spent partly in hearing an address from President Andrews, on the importance of at once introducing the Bible into our schools.

PRESBYTERIANISM IN IRELAND.—Presbyterians are diminishing in Ireland. The number of chapels has increased somewhat; but on comparing the numbers benefited by the Rayism Donum in 1847 and 1853, it appears that the families had decreased to the number of 7,615—nearly 1,300 families a year.

"SPIRITUAL FATHERS."—Of the Roman Catholic priests of Panama, "J. R.," the Protestant missionary, says: "There is hardly any limit to their vice." He is told, by natives of the place, "that there is not one among them who is not a gambler, a drunkard, or a licentious man;" nor is there any reason to doubt this; "most of them bear the marks of vice upon their faces;" it injures not their standing to live in concubinage, nor to train up a family of children just like other people; but if they marry according to the ordinance of God, they are instantly hurled from their office, without even the formality of a trial. Such is Romanism, in a land where no other religion has been known since the day when Pagan rites gave way to the ritual of the Catholic Church; and such it is in every land where it meets not the antagonism of a more Scriptural faith.

ROMAN CATHOLIC STATISTICS.—From the Catholic Almanac, for 1855, we gather that there are 31 theological seminaries in the United States, with 393 students. Besides these, there are about 118 in institutions abroad and in establishments of the regular clergy at home. According to this account, there are 511 theological students altogether.

In the summary we find the following:

Churches.....	1,524
Other stations.....	678
Clergymen in the ministry.....	1,556
Clergymen otherwise employed.....	172
Ecclesiastical institutions.....	37
Clerical students.....	690
Male religious institutions.....	54
Literary institutions for young men.....	48
Female religious institutions.....	88
Female academies.....	117
Charitable institutions.....	144
Catholic population, (as we have calculated it).....	2,303,000
Increase last year, about.....	100,000

In England and Scotland there are 812 Churches; 1,056 priests; 17 religious houses for men; 84 religious houses for women. The grand total of clergy, 1,126. In England there are 11 colleges; in Scotland 1.

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.—From the report of the Trustees of the Public Library of the city of Boston we learn, that the income of the invested funds of the Library furnished the means of buying 3,500 new volumes for last year, and that such is the prospect for the future that about 6,000 volumes can be added yearly to the Library—a rate of increase which in fourteen years will give a list of 100,000 volumes, a larger collection than any at present existing in the United States. The present number of volumes in the Library, besides 2,989 tracts, amount to 16,221.

BOOKS IN THIS COUNTRY.—The following facts are taken from the United States census: "There are 15,615 public libraries in the United States, and 4,686,411 volumes, of which 1,760,820 are in the state of New York. Comparing the free with the slave states, the former have by far the most libraries. For instance, Virginia has 54, and New York 11,018; Alabama 56, and Massachusetts 1,462; South Carolina 26, and Connecticut 164; Georgia 7, and Rhode Island 96. Of the slave states, in proportion to population, Mississippi has the most public libraries, and Virginia the fewest, although those of the latter contain a greater number of volumes than those of any slave state, excepting Louisiana and South Carolina."

PUBLIC LIBRARIES IN THE UNITED STATES.—According to Professor Jewett, of the Smithsonian Institution, the following is a table of the public libraries in the United States:

	No.	Volumes.
State Libraries.....	39.....	288,937
Social Libraries.....	126.....	611,384
College Libraries.....	126.....	586,912

ALICE CARY'S POEMS. Boston: Ticknor & Field. 1855. 12mo. 399 pp.—Alice Cary has already obtained an honorable position among the female writers of America. That position has not been obtained by a sudden and fortuitous leap, but by a gradual, steady, and strong ascent. We therefore augur for her not only the permanent maintenance of her present position, but a still higher ascent. The readers of the Repository are well acquainted with the productions of her pen; and we have cause to believe that she is highly valued by them. This volume contains the best poems from her pen—one or two of them of considerable length. We assure our readers they will find it an agreeable and useful companion. We give the following beautiful specimen, selected almost at random from among the shorter poems:

"Talk to my heart, O winds—
Talk to my heart to-night;
My spirit always finds
With you a new delight,
Finds always new delight,
In your silver talk at night.
Give me your soft embrace
As you used to long ago,
In your shadowy trysting-places,
When you seemed to love me so—
When you sweetly kissed me so,
On the green hills long ago.
Come up from your cool bed,
In the still twilight sea,
For the dearest hope lies dead,
That was ever dear to me;
Come up from your cool bed,
And we'll talk about the dead.
Tell me, for oft you go,
Winds, lovely winds of night,
About the chambers low,
With sheets so dainty white,
If they sleep through all the night,
In the beds so chill and white?
Talk to me, winds, and say,
If in the grave be rest;
For, O, life's little day
Is a weary one at best;
Talk to my heart and say
If death will give me rest."

Our acknowledgments are due to Carlton & Phillips for a copy of the following series of Sunday School books, issued at 200 Mulberry-street, New York. They form a fine addition to their splendid list of Sunday school publications. The series of "Short Stories from History," originally published by the English "Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge," are admirably adapted to the Sunday School Catalogue. They ought to be in the library of every Sunday school. Dr. Kidder, with rare industry and skill, continues to increase the resources of the Sunday school department. But to our list:

1. STORIES OF ENGLAND—two volumes.
2. STORIES OF ANCIENT ROME—two volumes.
3. STORIES FROM THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.
4. STORIES FROM THE HISTORY OF ITALY.
5. STORIES FROM THE HISTORY OF SPAIN.

6. STORIES FROM THE HISTORY OF SWEDEN.

7. STORIES FROM THE HISTORY OF MEXICO.

8. STORIES OF THE NORSEMEN.

To the above list we must also append the following miscellaneous publications:

1. SKETCHES OF MISSIONARY LIFE.—The author was a lay missionary among the Indians in Oregon nearly nine years, and here he gives us glimpses of the incidents, trials, and perils of missionary life.

2. THE PRODIGAL is from the pen of Rev. J. T. Barr, and contains the Highland Prodigal, the Reclaimed Prodigal, the Woe-Stricken Prodigal, and the Spendthrift. The narrations are striking, and will be useful.

3. FAIR, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

4. RAMBLES AT THE SOUTH.

5. THE TEMPEST.—This work discourses upon the nature, properties, and uses of wind in various parts of the world.

6. THE TWO FORTUNES; or, Profession and Practice.

7. THREE DAYS ON THE OHIO RIVER.

8. HERE AND THERE; or, Heaven and Earth Contrasted.

HUMANITY IN THE CITY. By Rev. E. H. Chapin. New York: De Witt & Davenport. For sale by Moore, Wilstach & Co. 1855. 12mo. Pp. 252.—The above is the somewhat quaint title of a series of eight discourses from the pen of one of the most eloquent lecturers of the day. The following topics are discussed; namely, The Lessons of the Streets; Man and Machinery; The Strife for Precedence; The Symbols of the Republic; The Springs of Social Life; The Allies of the Tempter; The Children of the Poor; The Help of Religion. The author has evidently aimed to make these discourses acceptable to men of all creeds in religion. That they are eloquently written, we need hardly say to those at all acquainted with the fervid style of Mr. Chapin. Take the following specimen from the discourse upon the "Allies of the Tempter:"

"As I look upon this mass of social evil, these steaming wells of passion, these solid fortifications of habit where the tempter is intrenched, I ask how is all this to pass away? And the answer is—only by the spirit of Christian love, sweeping these impediments of selfishness from the heart, and animating us to effort. With Christ the work certainly can be done. In this Gospel-beating amidst the guilt and sorrow of the world like the pulsations of a Divine heart—in the few leaves of this Testament—there is an illimitable power, before whose inspiration in the purposes and deeds of men no evil thing shall stand. And the spirit and exercise of this love is religion. It is the upshot of all that is preached—it is the open and tangible test of every mystic experience that drifts through the soul—it is so deep, so broad, and runs so far, that it comprehends all requirements; and they who cherish it, and practice it in the low, and dark, and desolate places of the world, are the true saints. Nothing else will do in its place. Not Churches, nor creeds, nor rituals, nor respectabilities. Without it we are not friends of Christ, nor co-workers with God. Without it we deepen the channels of human woe, and prop the strongholds of wickedness. Without it, whatever we may not be, we are allies of the tempter. The Savior says to each of us to-day, placed amidst these antagonistic forces of life, 'He that is not with me is against me.'"

PETER PARLEY'S POPULAR BIOGRAPHY. New York: Leavitt & Allen.—This manual of biography embraces the most eminent characters of every age, nation, and profession; including painters, poets, philosophers, politicians, heroes, warriors, etc. It constitutes a closely printed octavo volume with five hundred and twenty-seven double pages. It is one of the best hand-books of biography we have. For sale by Moore, Wiltstach & Co., Cincinnati.

THE PICTORIAL CATECHISM, recently published by Carlton & Phillips, is a decidedly rich and beautiful work. The catechetical questions and answers have been prepared with great care, and embody a great amount of Biblical and religious knowledge, adapted to children and youth, whether in the family or in the Sabbath school. It ought to be a text-book in all our Sabbath schools; it ought to come into family use. Sabbath school teachers could do nothing better for their scholars, nor could parents for their children, than to instruct them thoroughly in the Catechism. The illustrations are numerous, and executed in the finest style of the art. The work is a square 16mo. of one hundred and fifty-six pages.

CORNELL'S PRIMARY GEOGRAPHY. Forming Part First of a Systematic Series of School Geographies. By S. N. Cornell. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Small Quarto. 96 pp.—For the most part geography has been taught in our schools simply as a collection of facts—and that, too, almost without any scientific arrangement. Here is an attempt by an experienced teacher to mend that matter. The work has a kindly look, and we must own ourselves greatly pleased with its general outline and appearance. It claims the following distinctive features:

First. Only those branches of geographical science that admit of being brought fully within the comprehension of the youthful beginner have been introduced into the present number of the series.

Second. At the same time that the memory is called into exercise, the understanding is enlightened by copious and appropriate illustrations.

Third. The youthful student is put in possession of a simple and easy method of memorizing the contents of a map by means of a carefully systematised set of questions.

Fourth. The work is so arranged, and the science so imparted, that teachers, parents, trustees, and others may satisfactorily ascertain, at any stage of the pupil's advancement, what he knows of the science.

Fifth. The mechanical execution of the work is equal or superior to that of any other school-book extant, and will commend itself.

Sixth. The system pursued throughout the entire series is calculated to save at least one-half the time heretofore required for the purpose, and at the same time secure to the student greater and permanent results.

These are high claims. The book is well worthy of examination on the part of teachers. For sale by H. W. Derby.

FIRST THOUGHTS; or, Beginning to Think, is from the press of the same publishers. It is a capital work with which to exercise the thought, to stir the reason, and to store the intelligence of young children—especially those of inquiring minds. For sale by Derby.

THE HISTORY AND POETRY OF FINGER RINGS is a wonderful book—parvum in multo—a 12mo. of two hundred and thirty-nine pages. Verily, what a waste of brains—if brains had any thing to do with it—was there! It is published by Redfield, New York. For sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

PERIODICALS AND PAMPHLETS.

THE METHODIST NEWSPAPER PRESS.—We have just glanced over the files of the "Advocate Family," and rejoice to note the evidences of a healthy and strong development.

The Christian Advocate and Journal, which stands at the head of the list, appears in new type, and holds on the even tenor of its way. The old veteran holds firm the helm.

The Western Christian Advocate appears finely in its new dress. The popular estimation in which it is held as a family religious newspaper needs no further evidence than the fact, that while two popular and thriving Advocates come in to share its territory, its subscription list is constantly augmenting. Last year it had an increase of over four thousand; and this year it is now over one thousand in advance of last.

The Northern Christian Advocate, published at Auburn, N. Y., also looks finely in its new type. Its patrons have also given substantial evidence of the appreciation of it by a large addition to its circulation. Brother Homer wields a strong pen.

The North-Western Christian Advocate has been greatly enlarged and beautified. It is a marvel how suddenly this paper has passed into a hale and vigorous manhood. Its editor—Rev. J. V. Watson—seems to have intellectual vitality diffused through his whole system, and he radiates it with rare energy.

The Zion's Herald has for years been a choice family journal. It has lost nothing of its old energy and excellence. The Rev. D. Wise wields both the pen and the scissors with great skill and taste.

The Buffalo Christian Advocate is also enlarged, and is in every respect a fine paper.

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate is also moving onward in its regular course, supplying the wants of an important section of the Church.

The Central Christian Advocate, at St. Louis, has encountered some heavy gales, but bids fair to weather them nobly. Now that it is determined it shall live, we trust all its friends will rally to its support. By doing so, we are certain they will subserve the interests of Methodism in that section.

The California Christian Advocate has ceased to be a General conference paper; nevertheless, it still lives and flourishes. It is edited with decided ability, and is an excellent paper.

We should be glad to say more of these papers, but our space will not allow us.

A LECTURE ON ROMAN CATHOLICISM, by Rev. W. R. Litzinger, of the Ohio Conference.—Pamphlet, twenty-seven pages, 8vo.

THE GOSPEL MINISTRY—its Difficulties, Responsibilities, and Rewards, by Sinez.—Pamphlet, sixteen pages, 8vo.

ONEIDA CONFERENCE SEMINARY—Twenty-Ninth Annual Catalogue—located at Cananota, N. Y.—Principal, Rev. H. Bannister, D. D., assisted by 7 professors. Students—gentlemen, 283; ladies, 218; total, 501.

Notes and Queries.

ISE VERSUS IZE—LETTER FROM PROFESSOR GIVEN.—
 "Dear Doctor,—I have just observed among the 'Notes and Queries' of the Repository for January a 'Query' as follows: 'Why do certain words terminate with ise, as Christianize, civilize, brutalize, while others terminate with ize, as compromise, advertise, enterprise? and by what rule shall we determine whether the termination shall be ise or ize in any given word?'

"Now, I do not profess any great skill in etymology, but to me both the rule and the reason called for above are sufficiently obvious. The rule may be as follows: The termination ise is used whenever the word is formed from a Latin past participle, as demise, advise, surmise, etc. There seem to be two classes of words—generally verbs—which end in ise. 1. Those which are but the English form of Greek verbs ending in -ίζω—as dogmatize, syllogize, etc. 2. Those which have adopted this form, though not of Greek origin. The root of these words is commonly a Latin adjective, as civil-ize, real-ize, brutal-ize, etc. The English language, when giving activity to the idea of these Latin adjectives, makes verbs out of them by the suffix ise after the Greek style. This explains the reason why, according to your Rule I, when a complete word would be left, the termination should be ize, and also explains your exception to the rule. The application of the above rule presupposes a knowledge of the Latin and Greek; there seems to be no rule for the mere English scholar."

OPENING UP—This expression is becoming more and more current in American literature. It is a Scotticism, and a correspondent of a Philadelphia religious paper wants information about the thing. We give a few of his remarks:

"Will not some one, who favors its adoption, inform the ignorant what is the force of the suffix up? Are we restricted to the one specification? May we not open down a subject, or open through it, or over it, or about it, or into it? I wish to be in the fashion, having long ago learned to talk about the 'stand-point,' the 'objective and subjective,' and made some progress in pronouncing 'aesthetics.'"

TITLE OF LL. D.—The question is often asked, "Why are two L's used to designate the title of Doctor of Laws?" In answer to this question, a critic writes:

"Some have accounted for it by supposing that the mystic letters mean 'Doctor of Law and Logic!' Others think they mean 'Literarius Legum Doctor!' Now, the simple explanation is that the letters mean Legum Doctor, 'Doctor of Laws,' and the first letter is doubled according to the well-known practice of the Romans in abbreviating words of expressing a plural noun by a double letter. Some persons, not aware of this, write L. L. D. as if each letter stood for a word, instead of LL. D. As to the meaning and value of the title itself, I leave it to the 'Doctors' themselves to decide."

CURIOUS NOTES FROM AN OLD PARISH REGISTER IN NEW ENGLAND—The following notes have been recently taken from the records of the old Church in Andover, Mass.:

"January 17, 1712. Voted—under protest—yt those persons who have pews sit with their wives."

"November 10, 1713. Granted to Richard Barker foure shillings, for his extraordinary trouble in swiping our Meeting-House ye past year."

"March 17, 1786. Voted, that all the English women in the parish, who marry or associate with negro, or mulatto men, be seated in the Meeting-House with the negro women."

"In 1799 it was voted, amid much opposition, to procure a bass viol."

ORIGIN OF THE CUSTOM FOR MEN TO SIT NEAREST THE PEW-DOOR IN CHURCHES—The English Querist says: "It is the custom in America for the head and male members of a family to have the sittings in a pew nearest the door, and it is supposed to have originated in the following manner: In former times it was customary for the Indians to attack a village on a Sunday, when they thought the men would be in church, and unprepared to receive them. The savages having been successful on several occasions, it became a necessary precaution for all the males to go armed, and having sittings near the door of a pew, to be enabled, on the first alarm, to leave the place where they were congregated, and repel the attack of their enemies."

CAMPBELL'S "ANGELS' VISITS"—Nothing can be more absurd or ungenerous than that hypercriticism which is constantly hunting up some antecedent to a felicitous expression, in order to rob its author of the credit he receives for it. Take, for example, Campbell's celebrated verse:

"Like angels' visits, few and far between."

A surly English critic labors hard to show that it was "all but copied from Blair," and quotes the following from "The Grave" as evidence:

"Like an ill-used ghost
 Not to return; or if it did, its visits,
 Like those of angels, short and far between."

He also shows that a similar phrase occurs in a poem of Norris, of Bemerton, who died in 1711:

"But those who soonest take their flight
 Are the most exquisite and strong,
 Like angels' visits, short and bright,
 Mortality's too weak to bear them long."

Very likely the same idea may be found elsewhere; but where is the evidence that either of these authors obtained it in any other way than that in which we obtain most of our ideas? We see not why it does not as much belong to Campbell as to Blair, and certainly he has expressed it with far more beauty and force.

ORIGIN OF THE PHRASE "BY HOOK OR BY CROOK"—The notable expression "by hook or by crook," is said to have its origin in the following circumstance in England: Persons entitled to fuel wood in the king's forests were only authorized to take it of the dead wood or branches of trees in the forest. They were not permitted to use an ax in obtaining it, but only "a cart, a hook, and a crook."

SEMLER'S REPLY TO THE PUBLISHER OF A BAD BOOK—A publisher of erroneous and dangerous books assured Semler that he only gave them to the world in order to excite inquiry. "That," replied Semler, "is to set a town on fire in order to make a trial of the engines."

Mirror of Apothegm, Wit, Repartee, and Anecdote.

SHORT SERMONS.—The late Dr. Bogue is reported to have one day said to some of his students, "Do you suppose that people have nothing to do but to listen to your emptiness by the hour?"—a rebuke too pettishly given, and too severe. But there is propriety in Lamont's remark, "There is no excuse for a long sermon: if it be good, it need not be long; and if it be bad, it ought not to be long." Queen Anne, after hearing Dr. South, said, "You have given us an excellent sermon, Dr. South: I wish you had had time to make it longer." "Nay, please your Majesty," said he, "I wish I had had time to make it shorter." Whitefield and Wesley, and most of the early Methodists, were short. Why do not many of their successors follow their example?

TURNING FROM NOTHING TO NOTHING.—A female, who had more of the form of godliness than of the power, one day said to Mr. Cecil, "Sir, have you heard that I am going to turn from the Dissenters to the Church?" "Madam," he replied, "you are turning from nothing to nothing."

THE HORSE-FAIR SERMON.—One evening, in a rather crowded place, a minister was preaching very finely and flourishingly to little purpose, from the "white horse," and the "red horse," and the "black horse," and the "pale horse," in the Revelations. Robert Hall, who was present, sat very impatiently, and when the sermon closed he pushed out toward the door, saying, "Let me out of this horse-fair."

THE THREE HARDEST WORDS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—A very learned man has said, "The three hardest words to pronounce in the English language are, 'I was mistaken;' " and when Frederick the Great wrote his letter to the Senate—"I have just lost a great battle, and it was entirely my own fault."—Goldsmith says, "This confession displayed more greatness than all his victories."

ANECDOTE OF ROWLAND HILL, OR FAMILY PRAYER AT A TAVERN.—Rowland Hill was once driven by a storm of rain into a village inn, and compelled to spend the night. When it grew late, the landlord sent a request by the waiter that the guest would go to bed. Mr. Hill replied, "I have been waiting a long time, expecting to be called to family prayer." "Family prayer! I don't know what you mean, sir: we never have such things here." "Indeed! then tell your master, I can not go to bed till we have had family prayer." The waiter informed his master, who, in great consternation, bounced into the room occupied by the faithful minister, and said, "Sir, I wish you would go to bed. I can not go till I have seen all the lights out. I am so afraid of fire." "So am I," was the reply: "but I have been expecting to be summoned to family prayer." "All very good, sir; but it can not be done at an inn." "Indeed! then pray get me my horse. I can not sleep in a house where there is no family prayer." The host preferred to dismiss his prejudice, rather than his guest, and said, "I have no objection to have prayer; but I don't know how." "Well, then, summon your people, and let us see what can be done." The landlord obeyed, and in a few minutes the astonished domestics were upon their knees, and the landlord called upon to pray. "Sir, I never prayed in my life. I don't know how." "Ask God to teach you," was the gentle reply. The landlord said, folding his hands, "God, teach us how to pray." "That is prayer, my friend," cried Mr. Hill, joyfully; "go on." "I am sure I don't know what to say now, sir." "Yes, you do: God has taught you how to pray. Now thank him for it." "Thank you, God almighty, for letting us pray to you!" "Amen! Amen!" exclaimed Mr. Hill, and prayed himself. Two years afterward, Mr. Hill found in that same village a chapel and a school, as the result of the first effort of family prayer at the "Black Lion."

THE PROUD LADY AND THE POOR GIRL.—The following lines are from one of James Russell Lowell's poems:

"Hark! that rustle of a dress,
Stiff with lavish costliness;
Here comes one whose cheek would blush,
But to have her garments brush
'Gainst the girl whose fingers thin
Wove the weary brocade in,
And in midnights, chill and murky,
Stitch'd her life into her work;
Bending backward from her toil,
Lest her tears the silk might soil;
Shaping from her bitter thought,
Heart's-Ease and Forget-me-not;
Satirizing her despair
With the emblems woven there!"

ELEVEN HAPPY DAYS IN A LIFETIME.—"Were I offered the choice," said Byron, "either to live my life over again, or to live as many years more onward, I should certainly prefer the first; yet my young days have been vastly more unhappy than I believe those of other men commonly are. I once attempted to enumerate the days I had lived which might, according to the common use of language, be called happy; I could never make them amount to more than eleven; and I believe I have a very distinct remembrance of every one. I often ask myself whether, between the present time and the day of my death, I shall be able to make up the round dozen."

ON ATTEMPTING TOO MUCH.—Don't attempt too much. Knives that contain ninety blades, four cork-screws, and a boot-jack, are very seldom brought into action; and for this reason, in attempting too much, they become so clumsy and ponderous that men of small patience can't "get the hang" of them.

SLANDER.—The expansive nature of scandal is told by the poet thus:

"The flying rumors gathered as they rolled;
Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told;
And all who told it added something new,
And all who heard it made enlargements, too:
On every ear it spread, on every tongue it grew."

THE TRIBUNE ON OUR MILITIA SYSTEM.—The Tribune has a good remark on the subject of our militia system. "Think," says that paper, "how disastrous it would prove, if all the conceit and lust of command that are blown off harmlessly through that channel, should be pent up to swell and fester till they found relief when met to organize combinations for carrying on the serious business of life!"

THE PAST.—To the good and wise

"The freshness of the past shall still Sacred to Memory's holiest musings be."

Editor's Table.

ARTICLE ON MRS. SIGOURNEY.—Not having watched the progress of filling up this number as carefully as we might have done, we found, when it was too late to remedy the thing, that we had not reserved all the space we desired for our review of Mrs. Sigourney's writings. We are, therefore, tempted to throw in one or two items here touching upon other traits than those considered in our article. Critics agree in opinion that of all her longer poems "Pocahontas" is the best sustained.

"Oriaka" is a fine specimen of descriptive and narrative poetry. The closing scene, where the wretched Indian woman, with her little son, steers her canoe over the Falls of Niagara, is described with singular graphic power:

"And as the rapids raised their whitening heads,
Casting her light ear to the infuriate tide,
She raised him in her arms, and clasp'd him close.
Then as the boat with arrowy swiftness drove Down toward the unfathom'd gulf, while chilling spray
Rose up in blinding showers, he hid his head
Deep in the bosom that had nurtured him,
With a low, stifled sob.

And thus they took
Their awful pathway to eternity.
One ripple on the mighty river's brink,
Just where it, shuddering, makes its own dread plunge,
And at the foot of that most dire abyss
One gleam of flitting robe, and raven tress,
And feathery coronet—and all was o'er,
Save the deep thunder of the eternal surge Sounding their epitaph."

Our article, in its fragmentary state, may also create the impression that genial wit and humor never sparkle in her writings. To correct such an impression, we will append "An Old Story," done up into verse. It is alike amusing and instructive. Some of our readers may have seen it before, but they will bid it welcome again:

"Says Tom to Jem, as forth they went

To walk one evening fine,
'I wish the sky a great green field,
And all that pasture mine.'

'And I,' says Jem, 'wish yonder stars,
That there so idly shine,
Were every one a good fat ox,
And all those oxen mine!'

'Where would your herd of cattle graze?'
'Why, in your pasture fair.'
'They should not, that's a fact,' said Tom;
'They shall not, I declare!'

With that they frowned, and strunk, and fought,
And fiercely stood at bay,
And for a foolish fancy cast
Their old regard away.

And many a war, on broader scale,
Hath stained the earth with gore,
For castles in the air, that fell
Before the strife was o'er."

Mrs. Sigourney has recently been called to experience anew the sorrows of bereavement, in the sudden death of her husband. We believe that a daughter is now all of her family that remains to her on earth. She has our sympathy in her sorrows; but she has a higher solace than human sympathy. Her muse may be chastened by these sorrows, but not silenced. Rather may it be tuned to higher and holier melodies!

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—The Western Clearing.—In the very places where many of our readers now live were once witnessed scenes like that exhibited in this plate. The wild scene in the wilderness, the rude log-cabin home, the fire kindled beneath the branches of the forest-trees, are not mere fancy dreams, but real memories. The hunter in the picture has been successful in the chase, and his faithful dog shares in his pride of success. His "helpmeet" has kindled the fire and hung on the pot. We have no doubt the family will enjoy a royal feast; not all the luxuries that could be crowded upon the tables of wealth could make them more happy. We catch a glimpse of the children of this pioneer couple. The oldest son, a sturdy lad, is bringing a huge fagot for the fire; the second—we have our suspicions about him—seems to be holding up that old tree, or it may be that he is cutting it down, or, what is equally possible, frightening away some "varmint" of the Indian or wild-cat race; the third—a brave "eight year old"—is not afraid of the dead stag—not he! but the loveliest of all—the pet of all—dares not come quite so near. We hope our gentle readers, accustomed to the comforts and conveniences—nay, the superfluities—of old and established homes, will not look upon this as a scene of sorrow, privation, and suffering, rendered tolerable only by a faint glimpse of hope dimly seen. There is often more real happiness in a backwoods hovel than in a city palace.

Early Piety, we think, can not but commend itself to the hearts of our pious readers. The custom of reading the Bible daily upon the knees—secluded from the world and alone with God—is beautiful beyond expression. It can not fail to leave impressions divine and lasting on the soul of childhood and youth. The picture reminds us of the following beautiful stanza from a poem found in the Englishwoman's Magazine:

"And low within a quiet room
There knelt a fair young child;
The bright tears glisten'd in her eye,
But while she pray'd, she smil'd.
For beautiful and holy thoughts,
Gleams from the light above,
Had tuned her infant lips to praise,
And fill'd her heart with love."

We can scarcely wonder that her eye as well as her heart should be drawn heavenward.

ARTICLES DECLINED.—The author of "Liberty's Lament" says, in a note to the editor, "I suspect you will think there is more truth than poetry in these lines." The result justifies the suspicion of the author; for though the lines contain much truth—and expressed, too, with considerable force—they lack the smoothness of poetry.

A poem on "Spring," commencing,

"Sweet Spring has returned with her soft balmy air,
And banished bleak winter away,"

has been read several times; but we could never quite make up our mind to insert it. In several instances there is rather too much constraint or effort in order to get the right measure and rhyme.

The editor can not agree with the author of "The Weeping Parent's Life-Dream" in his opinion that it is "worthy" of a place in the Repository.

"The Dying Blind Man to his Wife" has been "viewed and reviewed," and once or twice been almost on the point of receiving an insertion. Now we lay it aside; but not till we have culled the four following stanzas, which contain a beautiful conception:

"I oft have wished these darkened eyes
Might here behold thy face,
That when I meet thee in the skies
I could the semblance trace.
For, O, methinks that even there
I shall thy presence miss;
And only wish with thee to share
That world of untold bliss.
But, Mary, surely thou wilt know
Thy William's face in heaven?
Thou who didst love him here below,
Till earth's frail ties were riven?
And, Mary, surely thine will seek
My spirit in that sphere:
O rapturous thought! we there shall meet,
Nor death nor parting fear."

We would encourage the author of "The Spirit of the Passing Year" to use her pen; but the present production has hardly enough merit to warrant its insertion.

SOMETHING FOR THE CHILDREN.—Living when Berry Body is Dead.—A little girl was discovered lying on the bed in her own room, passionately weeping. To the inquiry what caused her grief, she answered:

"O dear! I am so afraid I shall live till every body is dead that I love, and not a creature will be left to cry at my funeral."

Good Lamps that have Gone to Heaven.—Two little children were admiring the stars, as they came forth on the summer sky.

"What do you suppose they are?" said one.

"I think," said the other, "they are nice lamps, that have been good and gone to heaven."

You Great Ugly Rooster.—A little girl, who had great kindness of heart for all the animal creation, saw a hen preparing to gather her chickens under her sheltering wings, and shouted earnestly:

"O! don't sit down on those beautiful little birds, you great, ugly, old rooster."

Saying Good-Night to God.—The hour had come for retiring, and a sweet little girl was bidding good-night to the family, while her kind nurse stood waiting for her at the parlor-door. She climbed her father's knee to tell him how much she loved him, and gave many kisses to the baby. Her mother, as she embraced her, whispered: "You will not forget your prayers."

"O no, mamma dear, I love to say good-night to God, too."

EXCERPTS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.—The commendatory notes of kind friends, if they do not appear here, are duly appreciated. The following speaks of our artist, and will speak to the hearts of many of our readers:

"I doubt not your numerous letters try your patience; but permit me to write a few lines to you from my wild retreat in the 'Egypt of Illinois.' Three days since I received the December number of the Ladies' Repository, and I wish to thank you again and again for that beautiful engraving—'The Mother's Dream.' O, how my heart was wrung with sorrow, when I first opened the Repository, and saw that exquisite creation of artistic genius! and at the same moment I could but thank the kind Disposer of all events for a reassurance that I have an angel in heaven. Others may appreciate the beauty of the engraving, but none but a bereaved mother can feel it. Two short months have not passed since I was the happy mother of a darling babe; but death came, and snatched from my bosom my pride, my pet, my Willie. He was seven months old. I fancy I see him now as he lay, an angel of sweetness, in his little coffin. Black hair waved over the most beautiful of foreheads, and his eyes, once so black and brilliant, were closed as in a quiet slumber. I dressed him in a slip he had been accustomed to wear, and placed some natural flowers around his little dimpled hands. Thus his body rests beneath the sod, while the cold December blast chants his requiem. Pardon me, a stranger, for thus addressing you, but I felt as though it would do me good. I have not forgotten your buried ones, and I know you can sympathize."

To the above, out of all our collection, we have room to add only the following lines from Mrs. R. S. Nichols, received too late for insertion in the body of the work, and too good to be delayed:

SONNET.

The ice-matted winter beards the tender Spring,
And nips her children with unimely frost;
Discrowned and shoreless, doth the warrior-king
Return to battle for his empire lost!
He blurs the edges of her robes of green,
And with his frozen armies, snow and hail,
Encamps upon the hills and gorge between,
And bids the north wind ride the whistling gale!
The waves dash howling on the flinty coast,
Or climb with giant strides the level sands;
While o'er the billows, like a tortured ghost,
The noble ship drifts wildly, ere it strands.
The Earth is dumb, and Spring imploring waits
The Sun's advancement through the vernal gates!

A NOTE TO THE PATRONS AND FRIENDS OF THE REPOSITORY.—Our plea in the February number for twenty thousand subscribers reminds us of an incident that came under our observation some years since. A Sunday school enterprise was on hand, and a considerable amount of money was to be raised. The boys and girls were all at work. We met one of the keenest of our little allies one day, just after he had made his application to one of our liberal members. The little fellow seemed so chagrined and downcast, that for the moment we supposed he had, for some cause, been repulsed. "What's the matter?" we inquired, calling him by name. Absorbed in his own thoughts and hardly half conscious of our presence, he exclaimed, in a tone of self-vexation, "My! he gave the one dollar so easy, I wish I had asked him for two!" We must confess to something of the same feeling, when we found our list running up to twenty-two thousand before our plea for twenty thousand had time to get out. We felt rather vexed that we had not said twenty-five thousand. It will hardly be generous for us now to ask for more; but our friends will all understand that they are not bound to stop sending in subscriptions.

We have received many letters, both from the east and west, complaining of the late reception of the January number. This delay is easily explained. 1. Many of the subscriptions came in late. 2. The agents had not anticipated so large an increase of subscribers in these hard times, and it was necessary to print several thousand more to meet the increased demand. This required time. We trust, now that we are fairly afloat, there will be no further cause for complaint.

LITERARY WOMEN OF AMERICA.

MRS. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE.

BY THE EDITOR.

WE propose, in the series contemplated under the above general head, to take some initial steps toward introducing the readers of the Repository to a better acquaintance with the most eminent literary women of our country. Few, except those who have paid particular attention to the subject, are aware of the number of women devoted to literary pursuits in our country, and the substantial contributions they have made and are now making to our literature. If the habits and tastes of the women are the best criterion by which to form a judgment of the social and intellectual character of a people, as it has been asserted, then the American people may be proud to be judged by that standard; for they not only stand pre-eminent in their devoted attention to the substantial interests of female education, but also for the large number of women who have entered the walks of literature, crowning themselves and their country with honor.

Among those women who have labored assiduously and long to promote the moral and intellectual improvement of her sex, few are deserving of more honorable record than Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale.

The maiden name of Mrs. Hale was Buell; and the late lamented Judge Buell, of the state of New York, was her brother. Her parents at first resided in Saybrook, Conn., but removed from that place soon after the Revolutionary war, and settled in Newport, a pleasant village nestled among the hills of New Hampshire. Here she was born, in 1795. Her mother was a woman of more than ordinary powers of mind, and, in the absence of suitable schools, took the principal charge of the education of her daughter. To this work she devoted herself assiduously and successfully; and now in the height of her fame, the daughter delights in making acknowledgment of that gentle influence which first inspired within her the desire of knowledge and the love of literature. In 1809 a brother, older than herself by some years, graduated at Dartmouth College; and by him she was still further guided and assisted in her studies. Under his tuition she studied Latin, mental philosophy, and the higher branches of mathematics. Of her early education and reading she says, "I was mainly educated by my mother, and strictly taught to make the Bible the guide of my life. The books to which I had access were few, very few, in comparison with the number given to children nowadays; but they were such as required to be studied—and I did study them. Next to the Bible and the Pilgrim's Progress, my earliest reading was Milton, Addison, Pope, Johnson, Cowper, Burns, and a portion of Shakspeare. I did not obtain all his works till I was nearly fifteen." This will sufficiently indicate the mental training to which she was subject, and also her predominant literary taste even in childhood.

At the early age of nineteen she was married to David Hale, a young lawyer of distinguished abilities and great excellence of character. He had formed a high estimate of the abilities of his young wife, and was anxious for their full development. "We commenced," says she, "soon after our marriage, a system of study and reading which we pursued while he lived. The hours allowed were from eight o'clock in the evening till ten; two hours in the twenty-four. How I enjoyed these hours! In all our mental pursuits it seemed the aim of my husband to enlighten my reason, strengthen my judgment, and give me confidence in my own powers of mind, which he estimated much higher than I. But this approbation which he bestowed on my talents has been of great encouragement to me in attempting the duties that have since become my portion. And if there is any just praise due to the works I have prepared, the sweetest thought is—that his name bears the celebrity." In this way they studied French, botany, mineralogy, geology, etc., besides pursuing a long and instructive course of miscellaneous reading. The delicate allusion to the name—"his name"—of her departed husband above, so strongly reminds us of that beautiful poem—"I Sing to Him"—that we can not forbear quoting it at this point. It is conceived with great delicacy, and manifests true and deep sensibility:

"I sing to him! I dream he hears
The song he used to love,
And oft that blessed fancy cheers
And bears my thoughts above.
Ye say 'tis idle thus to dream—
But why believe it so?
It is the spirit's meteor gleam
To soothe the pang of woe.

Love gives to nature's voice a tone
That true hearts understand—
The sky, the earth, the forest lone,
Are peopled by his wand;
Sweet fancies all our pulses thrill
While gazing on a flower,
And from the gently whisp'ring rill
Is heard the words of power.

I breathe the dear and cherished name,
And long-lost scenes arise;
Life's glowing landscape spreads the same,
The same Hope's kindling skies;
The violet bank, the moss-fringed seat
Beneath the drooping tree,
The clock that chimed the hour to meet,
My buried love, with thee—

O, these are all before me, when
In fancy's realms I rove;
Why urge me to the world again?
Why say the ties of love,
That death's cold, cruel grasp has riven,
Unite no more below?
I'll sing to him—for though in heaven,
He surely heeds my woe."

Mr. Hale died suddenly in 1822, about eight years after their marriage. His entrance upon professional life had been of a most honorable and successful character; but his time had been too brief to accumulate much beyond what was necessary to meet the present wants of a young family. By his death, five children, the eldest of whom was only seven years old, became dependent upon her, not merely for their education and training, but for their support. Nobly did she nerve herself to a task that would have overwhelmed a woman of only ordinary firmness of purpose with despair. The pursuits of literature had heretofore been prosecuted as a means of improvement, and for the love of it; she now engaged in it as a means of supporting and educating her children. It was a chilling prospect, but a mother's love and a woman's faith nerved her for the work.

In 1823 a small volume—"The Genius of Oblivion, and other Original Poems"—was published for her benefit by the Freemasons, of which order her husband had been a distinguished member during his life. "Northwood; a Tale of New England," followed in 1827. This was in two volumes, and was published in Boston. It was republished in London under the title of "A New England Tale," and was highly commended by the English journals. In this country it at once established the reputation of the author, and has continued to hold an enviable place among the choice literary productions of this country for nearly thirty years. The object of the work is to illustrate common life among the descendants of the Puritans. This she has done with singular fidelity and great effect. The prominent characters of a New England village—such as the squire, the doctor, the deacon, etc.—are delineated with striking naturalness and force.

The literary career of Mrs. Hale had now fairly commenced. She was soon invited to the editorial charge of "The Ladies' Magazine," the first periodical exclusively devoted to ladies which appeared in America. Accordingly she removed to Boston in 1828, and continued the principal editor of the Ladies' Magazine till 1837, when it was merged in the Ladies' Book, published in Philadelphia, and of which Mrs. Hale then became and has continued to the present time to be the principal editor. She continued, however, to reside in Boston till 1841, in order that she might superintend the education of her sons, then students in Harvard University.

Her untiring industry in the use of the pen is fully evidenced in the amount of literary matter she has given to the public. During the past twenty-six years she has been the principal editor of a monthly magazine, requiring a vast amount of labor to secure, cull, and prune suitable material for its columns. Those columns have also been constantly enriched with the productions of her own pen. In addition to this, however, she has published the following works; namely, "Traits of American Life;" "Sketches of American Character;" "Flora's Interpreter"—a charming work, which was speedily republished in England; "The Ladies' Wreath, a Selection from the Female Poets of England and America;" "The Way to Live Well, and to be Well while we Live;" "Grosvenor, a Tragedy;" "Alice Ray, a Romance in Rhyme;" "Harry Guy, the Widow's Son, a Story of the Sea;" "Three Hours, or the Vigil of Love, and other Poems;" "A Complete Dictionary of Poetical Quotations, containing Selections from the writings of the Poets of England and America," and making a volume of nearly six hundred double-column, large octavo pages; "Liberia, or Mr. Peyton's Experiments;" "Woman's Record;" and "The Bible Reading-Book." She has also edited "The Opal," a popular annual, "The Crocus," and several other works. Besides these works, there are a large number of tales, essays, and poems—the productions of her pen—which lie scattered among the periodicals of the day. These are sufficient to fill several volumes, and she intends, after completing her editorial career, to collect and publish them in book form.

"While living in Boston," says Professor Hart, "Mrs. Hale originated the noble idea of the 'Seaman's Aid Society,' over which she was called to preside, and of which she continued to be the president till her removal to Philadelphia. This institution, or, rather, Mrs. Hale as its animating spirit, first suggested a plan of a 'Home for Sailors,' and showed its practicability by establishing one in Boston, which became completely successful. The many establishments of this kind now existing in various ports all took their origin in that of the Boston 'Seaman's Aid Society,' and in the ideas and reasonings of their first seven annual reports, all of which were from the pen of Mrs. Hale. Nothing that she has ever written probably has been more productive of good than this series of annual reports; and though they may be, from their official character, such as to add nothing to her literary laurels, they certainly form an important addition to her general claims to honor as one of the wise and good of the land."

The principal collection of Mrs. Hale's poems is that published in 1848; namely, "Three Hours, or the Vigil of Love, and other Poems." This collection embraces some of her best poems previously published. The Vigil of Love, which gives name to the volume, is a romantic story of a heroine and her lover, a state prisoner, who escaped from England to this country. As the lady is waiting the return of her husband on a stormy night, her imagination conjures up strange fancies of ghosts and witches. These fancies are managed with admirable tact by the author, who must have been somewhat familiar with stories of ghosts, witches, and hobgoblins in her childhood; and the interest is not permitted to flag till the husband is restored, when the strange fancies, of course, evaporate as a thing of naught.

A fragment may give an idea of the poem as well as the skill of the author:

"Once a holy man was set
Watching where the witches met.
Open Bible, naked sword—
And three candles on the board—
There the godly man was set
Watching where the witches met;
Knowing well his dreadful doom,
Should they drive him from the room.

The candles three were burning bright,
The sword was flashing back the light,
As it struck the deep midnight;
While the holy book he read,
And all was still as are the dead.

Suddenly there came a roar
Like breakers on a rocky shore,
When the ocean's thundering boom
Knells the mariner to his tomb.
The good man felt the struggling strife,
As the ship went down with its load of life!
His seat was shaken by the roar,
And upward seemed to rise the floor!
While round and round, as eddies hurl,
The room and table seemed to whirl!
Yet still the holy book read he,
And prayed for those who sail the sea.

Then came a shrieking, wild and high,
As when flames are bursting nigh,
And their blood has stained the sky!
'Fly! fly! fly!' in a strangling cry,
Was hoarsely rattled on his ear—
While the crackling flames came near!
And still the holy book read he,
And prayed for those where fires might be.

And then appeared a sight of dread;
The roof was opened above his head;
He saw, in the far-off, dusky view,
A bloody hand and an arm came through!"

In the lady's wild imaginings, these tales of childhood seem to become present realities, and all their horrible descriptions become, for the moment, horrible experiences. The poem throughout is finely sustained, and yet we hesitate to give it that prominence among the author's poems which she herself seems to have given it.

"Alice Ray," which is included in this collection, is not only beautiful in its versification, but especially wins upon us by the simplicity and delicacy of its imagery, and also for the felicity of language employed in its expression. Take the following stanza from the description of Alice Ray; it is a life-picture:

"The birds their love-notes warble
Among the blossom'd trees;
The flowers are sighing forth their sweets
To wooing honey-bees;
The glad brook o'er a pebbly floor
Goes dancing on its way;
But not a thing is so like spring
As happy Alice Ray."

There is one single poem of only four stanzas from the pen of Mrs. Hale which is enough to demonstrate her claim to companionship with the muses. Few poems in our language exhibit a deeper gush of sympathy or more striking power of expression than "The Watcher." It has traversed the country through a thousand channels of communication, and been set to music again and again; but still there will be no apology needed for its introduction here entire:

"The night was dark and fearful,
The blast went wailing by;
A watcher, pale and tearful,
Looked forth with anxious eye;
How wistfully she gazes—
No gleam of morn is there!
And then her heart upraises
Its agony of prayer!

Within that dwelling lonely,
Where want and darkness reign,
Her precious child, her only,
Lay moaning in his pain:
And death alone can free him—
She feels that this must be:
'But O! for morn to see him
Smile once again on me!"

A hundred lights are glancing
In yonder mansion fair,
And merry feet are dancing—
They heed not morn's there:
O! young and joyous creatures,
One lamp from out your stope,
Would give that poor boy's features
To her fond gaze once more.

The morning sun is shining—
She heedeth not its ray;
Beside her dead, reclining,
That pale, dead mother lay!
A smile her lip was wreathing,
A smile of hope and love,
As though she still were breathing—
'There's light for us above!"

Another fine poem from the pen of Mrs. Hale is "Iron"—as remarkable for the easy flow of its versification as for the force and energy of its expression. We take three of its stanzas—not the most energetic of them, however:

"Then the clouds of ancient fable
Cleared away before mine eyes;
Truth could tread a footing stable
O'er the gulf of mysteries!
Words, the prophet bards had uttered,
Signs, the oracle foretold,
Spells, the weird-like sibyl muttered,
Through the twilight days of old,
Rightly read, beneath the splendor
Shining now on history's page,
All their faithful witness render—
All portend a better age.

Sisyphus, forever toiling,
Was the type of tolling men,

While the stone of power, recolling,
Crushed them back to earth again!
Stern Prometheus, bound and bleeding,
Imaged man in mental chain,
While the vultures on him feeding,
Were the passions' vengeful reign;
Still a ray of mercy tarried
On the cloud, a white-winged dove,
For this mystic faith had married
Vulcan to the Queen of Love!
Rugged Strength and radiant Beauty—
These were one in nature's plan;
Humble toil and heavenward duty—
These will form the perfect man!
Darkly was this doctrine taught us,
By the gods of heathendom;
But the living light was brought us,
When the Gospel morn had come!
How the glorious change, expected,
Could be wrought, was then made free;
Of the earthly, when perfected,
Rugged iron forms the key!"

We had marked several additional illustrative examples of poetry, especially "The Power of Music" and the "Sabbath Rest;" but want of space compels us to omit them.

As a prose writer, we are not certain but what Mrs. Hale has won still higher honor than as a poet. Of her "Northwood" we have already spoken. Her great prose work is "Woman's Record." It is a work of over nine hundred large double-column, octavo pages, and is the result of many years of patient toil. It embraces a biographical sketch and a brief portraiture of the character of the distinguished women of the world from mother Eve down to the time of its publication, and also brief illustrative selections from those who were authors. Professor Hart justly says, "It needs no prophetic vision to predict that this great work will be an endearing 'Record,' not only of woman in general, but of the high aims, the indefatigable industry, the varied reading, and just discrimination of its ever-to-be-honored author."

It is evident that Mrs. Hale is a hard student, and that her productions are the result of laborious, persevering effort. She did not flash out upon the world as with a meteor glare and as rapidly pass away. But her literary reputation has been of gradual growth, and consequently rests upon a firmer basis; for every stone in the foundation has been laid with great care, and has been thoroughly tested. Indeed, we mistake if her own powers have not been of gradual and continuous development. Certain it is that in both her prose and poetical productions of later years there is an evident improvement in all the elements that characterize a strong and genial writer. Alice Ray, if we recollect right, was produced as lately as 1848, and several of her best productions are of a still later date. When we consider the trying circumstances under which she entered upon her literary career, and mark her energy, devotion, and perseverance, we can not but accord to her the honor of having richly deserved the success with which her efforts have been crowned. Her aim at the outset—the honorable support and education of her children—was not only noble, but worthy of her woman's heart. Nor do we wonder that, commencing with such aims, her whole course of literary labors should have been directed to noble and philanthropic ends. "Her constant aim is to show the true sources of strength and cheerfulness amid the trials of life, and to inspire the hope that looks beyond it." In all these respects she is not only an honor, but a noble example to her sex.

We regard her as a practical illustration of the "Last Words," with which she closes her "Woman's Record," and we quote not only in honor of herself, but as a specimen of her prose composition:

"'Be good' was the dying injunction of the great novelist to his son-in-law, Mr. Lockhart. 'It is the divinest thing to be good,' wrote the pious John Foster to his unknown lady correspondent. 'Goodness is beauty in its best estate,' sings the old poet Marlowe; and the high-souled Tennyson strikes the key-note of human greatness in the sentiment, 'Tis only noble to be good.' This personal goodness, the complement of all the virtues and accomplishments of humanity, should be the grand aim of life. The true object of all philosophy is to discover the ways and means by which this aim may be wrought out in the best manner.

"If you had a precious plant to rear and develop, would you trust it to the care of an ignorant person, who knew little or nothing of its nature, structure, properties, and uses? Would you not rather seek sedulously for one well skilled in the knowledge, theoretically at least, of plants, and their capacities for being improved by judicious culture, or injured by neglect and hurtful modes of training? Moreover, if this plant had been, by its Maker, consigned to the keeping of one guardian, in an especial manner, which could not be changed or superseded, would you not consider it true wisdom to qualify that person for the office of developing the tender shoots of the plant, pruning its luxuriance, and training its tendrils and its inclination in the right way to insure its greatest perfection?

"God gave to woman's keeping this forming power over humanity. Never will the best capacities, spiritual and physical, be developed in a healthy state, and directed heavenward, as the immortal should tend, till the female sex are fitted for their duties, and honored when discharging them faithfully—duties, the first, the highest, the holiest, which the Creator has intrusted to human beings.

"Greatness is most perfect when it acts with the least display of self; power is more efficient when moving the will through the heart. Let us, as American ladies, cultivate the virtues, the knowledge, the accomplishments, which will influence, imbue, and inspire the other sex to do the work of the world to the glory of God; then the woman will truly shine forth as the glory of the man!"

A CHAPTER ON TATTTLING.

PROFESSING Christians sometimes seem practically to follow the fashion of the Romanists, by dividing sins into mortal and venial. Those which openly violate the common principles of morality seem to be regarded in the former light; while such as do not injure one's good name and standing in society are placed in the latter category. We apprehend that talebearing is looked upon as a venial sin. Not a few whose profession should restrain them from its practice have the reputation of being addicted to it. Nevertheless, it is in direct contravention of the revealed will of God, who says, "Thou shalt not go up as a talebearer among thy people."

The disposition to tattle may arise either from malignant motives or from a natural propensity for gossip. The latter, while it may be less criminal in intention, is often not the less injurious to society in its results. A fondness for news-bearing leads to spreading abroad details of personal character which had better be locked up in one's own bosom. Rumors circulated, with however innocent an intention, usually grow in their progress. What was true at first becomes a vile untruth before it has run its race; and the person who started the snow-ball, or, rather, the soot-ball, the rolling is responsible, in no small measure, for what it accumulates before it has reached the bottom of the hill. The propensity to hear news, in common with all other passions, gains by indulgence. A fondness for telling it begets a desire for hearing it, till at last the tattler becomes little else than a locomotive news-office. Follow such a one through a series of morning calls, and you will find that at each successive house the intelligence gathered at the preceding one is reported, while in return fresh stores are laid in for the next visit. The characters of friends and acquaintances are freely discussed; personal looks, dress, manners, expenditure, the private affairs of domestic life, all come in for a share in the strictures.

The occupation of a newsmonger is, at best, a most unworthy and unamiable one. How unworthy the dignity and propriety of one who aspires to a respectable standing! How unbecoming the claims of good neighborhood! How mean and contemptible the employment of a peddler of gossip! How narrow and low the ideas of one who can never rest satisfied without extorting from all associates whatever they may happen to know about their neighbors! "In the company of some persons," says the venerated Jay, "we are in a perfect inquisition: we are tortured with questions concerning every body and every thing. It would be well for many professors of religion if they would remember that they are accountable not only for their time, but their tongues." What right has any member of society thus to subject all with whom he comes in contact to the rack, extorting from them, often by indirection and artifice, that which they would fain have kept from the public ear, and then publishing it from the house-tops?

In the smaller communities, where all are known to each other, and where even domestic and personal matters must be, to a great extent, accessible to the espionage of Argus-eyed busy-bodies, there are ample materials for the spoiler to use in his despicable work. He can readily find out enough of truth to serve as a basis for a plausible falsehood. It is not necessary either that he shall be known, as having laid and fired the train which is designed to blow to atoms the fair name of his neighbor. He can suggest falsehoods through cunningly shaped interrogatories; he can make his statements impersonal, introducing them with "It is said," or hide himself behind some such forms of speech as are familiar to practiced traducers. His darts are hurled from behind an ambush.

It is not only the tattler himself, however, that sins. Those who give a ready audience to his tales become partakers of his guilt. Without auditors, he would have but little encouragement to prosecute his work. Not a few are there who become thus accessory to this great evil, occupying toward the talebearer the same relative position of the receiver of stolen goods to the thief who purloined them. "Calumny," says Leighton, "would starve and die of itself, if nobody took it in and gave it lodging. When malice pours it out, if our ears be shut against it, and there be no vessel to receive it, it would fall like water upon the ground, and could no more be gathered up; but there is that same busy humor that men have, a kind of delight or contentment to hear evil of others, unless it be of such as they affect—to hear others slighted and disesteemed—that they readily drink in, not without some pleasure, whatsoever is spoken of this kind."

Every right-minded person owes it to himself to close his ears against the tattler. Instead of a countenance indicative of interest in the details of gossip and slander, let it be seen that such narratives meet your disapprobation. New topics of conversation can easily be introduced to turn away the thoughts from the unwelcome theme; or, as a true friend to the absent, who little suspects the mischievous work which has been going on against him, you can come to his defense, and, doing toward him as you would have him do toward you in similar circumstances, endeavor to palliate alleged faults and indiscretions, and strive to set out his virtues against the slanderer's tales. That was an admirable resolution of the excellent Simeon, "Always to hear as little as possible that was to the prejudice of others."

LEAD ME THERE.

BY MARY J. HAMMER.

"When my heart is overwhelmed, lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

When gloomy, dark imaginings
Flit o'er the heart with shadowy wings;
When hope derides, and faith grows dim,
And sorrow's draught overflows the brim;
When faint and weak the heart's low prayer,
Then, then, in pity, lead me there.

When Friendship's fetters weak have grown—
When all her bright hopes overthrown,
Seem sinking back to native dust,
As every earthly tenant must;
When fond hopes die that dawned so fair,
Then lead my weary spirit there.

When holy lovelight dawns awhile,
With sweet caress and happy smile,
Lifting the heart to pleasures high,
Then leaving it alone to die;
When this my fate, again in prayer,
Direct my fainting spirit there.

'Tis even there—'tis there alone,
Where He who reigns on highest throne
Forever dwells, that we can find
Unfading joys, true peace of mind—
Whate'er my joys, whate'er my care,
O ever, ever lead me there!

THE MISSIONARY OFFERING.

BY RACHEL L. BODLEY.

UPON the snow-mantled streets of a western city reposed the solemn hush of a Sabbath twilight. The icy breath of the relentless Frost-King had driven within doors the last belated wanderer, and now, quite alone, the white-robed "Queen" communed with the fading sunset clouds, and in the deepening solitude foreshadowed to the evening star, who peered quietly forth upon the silent scene, that heavenly rest which, in the coming future, remains for the people of God.

Suddenly, as if by a miraculous power the mute worshiper had found a voice of praise, pealed forth the Sabbath evening bells—not in the cathedral measure of a vesper chime, but in the free, cordial ringing of Protestant bells—awaking the sleeping echoes of the distant hill-sides in their successful endeavor to win from the fireside group of a thousand happy homes, the living tide which should fill the evening sanctuary with the incense of prayer and the song of thanksgiving.

The keen air of the January night moaned a mournful refrain to the cheery music, sweeping in fitful gusts through the opening doors, and prolonging its saddest notes beneath the frost-wreathed windows; but to no purpose, as the early thronged streets abundantly testified.

The avenues leading to a church in — street were unusually crowded. Evidently within the sacred precincts were to be enacted scenes of an unwonted character. Carriage after carriage rolled up to the door, and Wealth, clothed in fur and expensive apparel, entered the house of prayer. Poverty in like manner entered, unpalled by splendor or show; and both, joining hands at the threshold, seated themselves within the spacious temple, alike to worship and adore their common Father. Unsatisfied Wealth and discontented Poverty likewise passed the portals, each bent upon the accomplishment of its own selfish ends in thus coming into the presence-chamber of the Most High.

Still the bells cried "Come;" still from the distant hill-sides was echoed the familiar "Come;" and still from homes far and near hasted a willing multitude.

At length the call was heard no longer. The hour of prayer had arrived; and as the busy pattering of feet upon the pavements died away into an occasional footfall, the sound of many voices arose from within in a triumphant strain of holy song. No announcement of page or number of hymn had been needed, for, when the organ pealed forth the familiar air of Bishop Heber's Missionary Hymn, the great congregation arose as one man, and, amid teeming memories of cradle teachings and a Christian home, old age, manhood, and sunny childhood, united in the blended chorus, nor ceased till, in a triumph more fitting for a heavenly than an earthly temple, the closing strain inspired many a Christian breast, and granted prophetic vision to many a moistened eye—

"The Lamb for sinners slain,
Redeemer, King, Creator,
In bliss returned to reign."

The assemblage was for a missionary purpose. A young missionary was that night to be set apart for his holy work, and during that solemn hour to sunder the ties which bound him closely and tenderly to Christians at home, henceforth to be a "cross-bearer" amid heathen darkness—a "crown-wearer" in spirit and in deed. The service of the evening proceeded; the prayers were offered, and the sermon preached in impressive earnestness, by fathers in Israel, like unto those whose passage over Jordan we even now tremblingly await, fearful that there will none remain worthy to receive the mantle of their childlike faith and prevailing prayer.

Then before the spell-bound multitude the young missionary kneeled. Holy hands were laid upon his head, and he, the talented, the much-esteemed scholar and divine, was consecrated to his holy mission—talents, influence, earthly love, himself, his all; and when after the hearty amen, responded to by hundreds of Christian hearts, he arose, his eye radiant with joy, though dimmed with weeping, many a heartless votary of fashion and of wealth was made to realize that in the religion of the cross, so long despised by them, there was a reality and a power such as they never dreamed of before.

Ere the audience dispersed a collection was to be made in behalf of the missionary society, under whose fostering care the ordained of the evening was to prosecute his labors in eastern Asia. The heart is rarely affected that the purse is not correspondingly opened. Accordingly, the rich of their abundance and the poor of their scarcity cheerfully responded to the call, and the clinking of silver and gold and the peculiar rustle of bank notes were on all sides heard.

And it came to pass that a poor widow was numbered in the throng; her only companion, a little daughter, sat beside her. The garments of both bespoke poverty; while the scrupulous neatness with which they were arranged told of seminence and religion. They were seated near the pulpit, the widow having sought the place of worship early that she might secure a location calculated to inspire devotional feeling, and at the same time remove from her child the temptation for gazing incident to the filling of a church in a large city. It was not motives of curiosity which had brought them thither. To both mother and child the hero of the evening was a familiar friend. Not a friendship of cold formality was theirs, but the warm, throbbing affection founded on the Gospel basis—"the giving of a cup of cold water in Christ's name."

Hospitality dwells not alone beneath the wealthy home-roof, but oftentimes treasures her richest bounties at the hearthside of the poor. This fact had this missionary elect learned, as during the last two years of his student-life he had, in connection with his studies, performed the labors of a city missionary. His winning address and acknowledged talent procured him a welcome to the hearts and homes of scores of wealthy Christians; but it was not to their abodes that, when weary and soul-sick, he best loved to hie.

In his visits among the lowly he traced for a long time the footprints of a faithful tract-distributor before he could ascertain her name or residence. The sorrowing mother would speak of her as "the good lady who gave the advice that saved her erring boy;" the invalid child would smile when she heard his footsteps, thinking that the kind teacher was coming who told her about Jesus making "the little dead girl alive again;" but none knew her address, and it was only an accidental meeting at the death-scene of a converted skeptic, to whose spiritual edification, during his weary pilgrimage down to the portals of death's silent valley, it had been the privilege of both to minister, that revealed to him his unknown collaborer, in an unassuming daughter of Christ, who, like her divine Master, had evidently been acquainted with grief, and whose circumstances constrained her to labor with her own hands to procure a home and home comforts for herself and only child.

Perhaps there was something in the subdued countenance or in the silver-toned voice that reminded the young apostle of his own mother, from whom he was far removed, but whatever the invisible agency that forged the golden chain, from that hour, when each thought on the other, it was the love of a mother and the filial gratitude of a son that met, whose union rendered yet more beautiful the mission of faith and hope to which both were consecrated.

Ever after, when in his daily walks he found destitution and want such as needed woman's gentle hand, or if from weariness he fainted beneath the noonday sun, or faltered before the winter's storm, it was the humble dwelling of his newly found friend that he would seek. There his story of suffering was always heard with attention, and its objects cared for with alacrity; there, at any hour when needed, the cloth was spread, and wholesome, if not dainty, fare cordially proffered. There, too, was the "prophet's chamber," small but very sacred, to which he might ever retire, and, by communion with the Father "who seeth in secret," divest his surcharged heart of the sorrows and anguish, which the depravity of sin ever heaps upon the faithful laborer in a work such as was his.

But now this pleasant "working time" was ended; the youthful minister was about to exchange his home field for a foreign field of labor; and it was to invoke a farewell blessing upon her departing brother that the widow came this night—her heart thrilling with pleasant memories, and her spirit triumphing in the many cheering promises of her God, respecting his own missionary work.

Her errand was one of love, and her power in prayer, aided by faith's cheerful vision, which was so pre-eminently hers, rendered its accomplishment, it would seem, delightful and tranquilizing. Why was it, then, that, as her neighbors around her drew forth their gold and silver, the slight figure was noticed to tremble with emotion, and then the head to sink upon the "pew-back" before her, while ill-restrained sighs told of storm and tempest within?

For the faithful disciple "whom Jesus loves" there is not always needed an "isle of Patmos" or an exile's solitude to secure revelations from on high. They come in the early morning; they come at noonday—as we walk—as we labor—just when we need them—just when the spirit's wing would droop without them.

In the crowded assembly and in the hour of holy joy this believing daughter was not forgotten. Her prayers and self-denial had gone up as a memorial unto Him who sitteth upon the throne, and now his loving-kindness was to be made yet more manifest in requiring her to sacrifice her dearest joy upon his altar. Hers was a revelation of duty. Many were the appeals in behalf of missions to which she had before listened, and near to her heart had they come—so near that in the spirit of the cheerful giver she had generously responded by casting into the treasury of the Lord not alone her mite, but her prayers and her tears, whose influence in aiding this great work is more potent than thought can conceive or lip express.

But to-night scene and sermon had spoken to her heart in a new language. As her whole being was inspired with love for the souls of the perishing, and the accustomed inquiry was pressed home by her tender conscience, "What can I do to speed the dawning of the long-promised morning?" money and even prayers seemed unacceptable gifts. They presented themselves, it was true, but did not satisfy the hand that would fain have proffered them to the loving King. "What more have I to give? Is not this my all?"

"The mother numbereth jewels more precious than gold or silver in her 'home-casket.' Canst thou not of these enrich my treasury, saith the Lord?"

It was then that the slender frame swayed to and fro with emotion; it was then that the aching head sought support, as the Christian mother realized fully the greatness of the sacred demand.

"My only! my daughter! the sunlight of my home, the strong arm upon which I hope to lean in my declining years! Is it this gift that thou requir'st at my hands? Were my child a son, how gladly would I render him back to the Giver, that in distant lands his voice might be heard proclaiming glad tidings of salvation! But a daughter, whose woman's lot it will ever be more acutely to suffer in rending the ties of home and kindred, and in weariness and pain to tread unfriendly shores, unqualified to preach, and constrained only to practice the love of Jesus to her benighted neighbors! 'O Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!'"

The contest between duty and maternal affection was quickly ended. Too well had the fierce fires of affliction done their work of sublimating and refining, to allow the creature long to elevate its will in opposition to that of its Creator.

"Take her—she is thine; do with her as it seemeth thee best—only direct thy servant aright in her education and preparation for thy service, and at length reunite us, no more to part, before thy throne in heaven!"

It was this prayer that plumed its upward pinion as the contribution boxes were returned to their places upon the table. When the treasurer, with satisfaction, counted his munificent collection, and acknowledged it in the public print, he unwittingly omitted the richest benediction of the night. But an all-seeing Eye smiled upon it, and heavenly dews shed their fragrance about it, from that hour till the moment when it was accepted before the world, and departed on its distant "love-work."

It would weary without benefitting to dwell upon the history of the giver and her offering during the long years which succeeded the scene with which our story opens. Those—if any there were—who noticed the widow's faded bonnet, as she that night hesitatingly descended the steps, and alone, with her little one, pursued her dark homeward way, might have noted the same bonnet worn season after season, the old ribbon only changed for a new one when cleanliness, not fashion, required it. It was economy and sacrifice of personal appearance such as this that was constantly practiced in the happy home, in order that the goal of hope and prayer might at length be attained unto.

Abraham's paternal heart, according to the sacred record, suffered untold anguish in revealing to his son Isaac the fact that he was the victim to be offered upon Moriah's holy altar. Not so the task of our friend in acquainting her child with the nature of the work to which she had been consecrated. Trust a mother's careful hand and loving heart to make whatever impress she desires upon the little being whose every life-pulse beats in sympathy with her own.

When the golden head of seven summers reverentially bowed at her knee, and lisped its solemn "Our Father," and then at the close subjoined its petition for "mother and relatives," a gentle voice taught it, "and bless the heathen, too." When at the sunset hour twilight brought a cessation from the toil of the needle, and weary little feet sought the parent's side, and begged a story told, there was heard the touching story of the cross and kindred themes. And when the child-eye glistened with interest as a Savior's love was made plain to it, in that he came a missionary from heaven down to the wicked earth, there adroitly followed a story of the thousands of little children to whom as yet the Savior was unknown; and while the little breast still heaved with the emotion that it was unable to repress for their sad condition, then came the question, "Would not my daughter love to go and teach these poor heathen children?" Thus intermingled in the golden threads of which this child-life was woven, glittered constantly sympathy and love for the remote and degraded of her race.

Nor were these wayside teachings of the mother left destitute of present indications of the Master's approval. Ere childhood had fully bloomed into girlhood, the young heart consecrated itself to God, and upon a long-remembered Sabbath morning, in the early spring-time of the year, publicly professed its faith before angels and men.

The succeeding work of education proved an earnest and an arduous work. The task of selecting a good female school at a period when such institutions were rare beyond present belief; the patient toil of weeks and months, taxing eye, and hand, and strength almost beyond endurance, to meet personal wants, tuition bills, and the varied et ceteras which life in its most economical garb requires; all these left little time for rest or recreation. But who may know the surpassing richness of those communings of kindred spirits—the elder and the younger—beside the dying embers of the winter's grate, or in the fading twilight of summer's fiery glow, when, the lessons learned, the household duties ended, the past was recounted with thanksgiving, and the future, with its partings, its dim, uncertain windings, its self-denying toils, and, perhaps, lonely and unmarked grave, far from home-tree and kindred, was spoken of calmly, hopefully; Faith's eye noting not the clouds which gathered upon the distant horizon, but kindling and rejoicing in the brilliant bow of Promise which spanned the whole scene, even from the bridge of the Present afar to the confines of Eternity!

The year of separation had not yet come, when a black seal and a superscription in an unfamiliar hand announced that the youthful soldier of the "offering time" had fallen at his post, at an hour when the battle grew the hottest, and Pagan voices had nearly learned to shout the victory of the cross. There came a heavy shadow with the tidings, dimming for a season trust and purpose. But it was the voice which Peter, and James, and John heard out of the cloud which overshadowed them upon the Mount of Transfiguration which, in comforting accents, was heard at this hour, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

The fire which burned upon the altar of sacrifice glowed into a yet purer flame. Talents, peculiar fitness for the work, unflinching zeal, had proven themselves no barrier against the inroads of the destroyer death. Stilled by the Master's voice, they slept, while above the earth-cold pillow an unreaped harvest perished through lack of laborers. To the mother's finite eye clouds and darkness seemed in very deed to be the habitation of the eternal throne. But firmly fixed upon the Rock of Ages, the night of fiery trial passed away, and with its passage there ceased to mingle with the morning and evening oblation the unhallowed ambition for fame and Christian renown, which hitherto, all unconsciously, had perfumed the daily sacrifice, and ascended an unpleasant savor in the nostrils of the Most High. Before the mercy-seat the chastened spirit hasted to offer the first fruits of her newly found treasures of obedience and trust; while from willing lips there was heard, in dedicatory prayer, "Let this my child be in thy hands only as the clay in the hands of the potter; use her as thou wilt—only grant that in life and in death she may show forth thy praise."

When a few months later, from school-hood there entered society a talented young female, wearing the richest laurels that can crown the brow of the school-girl—the noble self-consciousness of time well improved, sealed by the hearty and loving benedictions of her teachers, few would have recognized in her the retiring child of earlier days. The homes of wealthy relatives were now freely proffered to both mother and daughter; they being proud to claim kindred with her whose talents had won no little admiration from the dwellers in the land of Reality, which borders close upon the realms of School-Life.

The world wondered when the thoughtful maiden turned from these most tempting offers, and devoted the earliest days of her freedom from study to the holy work of educating other minds. The guiding hand of Providence had not yet designated the future pathway, wisely affording time and opportunity for the development of mind and character, so essential to insure success in her prospective work; and this, too, by an instrumentality whose adaptation to the end desired none may know save those who, like herself, have ministered at the intellectual fountain, and felt within the transforming power which the anxieties, duties, and joys of a teacher's life wield over the entire being.

If there was wonder excited by the first step, it may justly be surmised that the emotion deepened into unfeigned astonishment when it was noised abroad that the choice of the maiden's heart was a candidate for missionary labor in a new and as yet unexplored field of darkest heathenism. The more surprise was expressed because the seeming time of her decision was one when spiritual death reigned throughout all the Churches; and, though wealth was freely poured into the coffers of the mission enterprise, so closely fettered were the children of the holy covenant by an all-absorbing passion for gain and temporal pleasure, that scarce one amid a youthful host of thousands could be found who would heed the agonizing Macedonian cry.

The "long farewell," the parting embrace, was bitter as if now for the first time anticipated. In the mother's heart came back, with renewed might, the old conflict of maternal love against the toiling, and sorrowing, and wearisome solitude, which her anguish at parting depicted as shrouding the pathway of duty. But He who had demanded the gift graciously granted to the giver deliverance from all this fear, and strength to invoke a hopeful and even smiling benediction upon her children ere from before her natural vision they forever faded.

It was over—the parting—and to the triumphing ranks of female missionaries, who on heathen shores seek to rescue souls from perishing, was welcomed another Christian heroine. In a strange land and beneath unfamiliar skies the home-altar was reared, and upon it, at morning and evening, burned the incense of contentment, gratitude, and love—the free-will offering of two pious hearts. Around the mission dwelling gathered the sons and daughters of the untaught race, and in an unknown tongue gave expression to the yearnings of their idol-weary souls after the Christian's God. But before the preacher, in the public ministrations of his sacred office, could break to the hungry multitude the bread of life long hours, weeks, even months, of study must intervene. While from out the wounded side the living waters were freely flowing, famishing spirits must eternally perish—because of the ignorance of nouns and verbs!

But while the herald was toiling through the language of the lip, the wife was teaching, conquering, winning, all hearts to herself in the unwritten language of eye, and tear-drop, and example—that language which alone is common to all nations and is understood in every clime. The practice which the mother had feared would be powerless without the ability “to preach,” in the sequel proved the more eloquent to the darkened understanding. The hand that could compose a healing draught to ease the sufferer's torturing pain; the eye that could mingle its tears with those of the Pagan mother beside the death-couch of her babe; the look of entreaty before which the bitterest vows of savage vengeance lost their ferocity—surely, these could belong to no other than a “good teacher.”

Thus reasoned the heathen, and within the breast was intensified the longing to know the Christian's God. Thus to the instrumentality of a womanly hand did this region of gloom owe its first glimpses of that Gospel light which, according to prophecy, must eventually deluge mountain-top and valley with the refulgence of its divine glory. And when at a later period the pulpit and press, endued with power from on high, rolled back the darkness, and scattered the seeds of eternal truth broadcast over the land, the prayer of faith and the earnest endeavor were not withdrawn; and who may tell whether, amid all her privation and solitude, this missionary's crown of daily joy did not exceed in luster the rarest pleasures which her earlier friends at home ever experienced in their ceaseless routine of fashion and of empty show?

And the mother—if from her long-silent lips there could come an answering voice to professing parents, who at the present hour shrink from parting with the children of their love, whom the wants of the heathen world demand, as never before, she might speak of her life as of a day whose sunset scene far surpassed in tranquillity and peace its most joyous dawning hours; she might significantly dwell upon the descent of death's dark valley, when alone, without husband or child to guide her faltering steps, there ever and anon was heard the dull, cold plashing of waters far below, and the timorous cries of wrecking voyagers, there was around her placed an everlasting arm, and to her failing senses there was made manifest a compassionate presence, whispering in tones sweeter than music, “My rod and my staff—they shall comfort thee.”

The voice of example is a persuasive voice. Does it speak in the above simple narrative in vain? Speaks it not to some parent, who, the love of Christ constraining her, will now dedicate her “cradle-treasure” to the work of the Master? Christian mothers esteem far too lightly the untold power of infant consecration upon the future characters of their children. They leave till the season of harvest the work of the early seed-time, and then, in unfeigned astonishment, weep that their children—the noble son, the accomplished daughter—should have turned aside from the paths of peace, and have devoted their choicest powers to the service of the enemy of souls. How slow are these to learn that the holy trust of maternity is not fulfilled when to their children is administered shelter, food, and raiment! How long ere they realize that the buds of immortality which so lovingly cluster in the “mother's wreath” bloom not there as things of beauty alone, but as gifts from the paradise of the skies, transplanted to earth, that from the sunlight of her life they may garner in their mysterious cells the fragrance which shall render them a blessing to their race, or find in her uncongenial life the mildew and the storm which, withering the good, shall send them forth a blighting curse to society and the world!

When in the cradle the prophetic eye of the Christian mother shall be able to discern the heroes of the cross, the Wesleys, the martyrs, of a coming time, and, with a zeal which no worship at Fashion's shrine can interrupt nor scoffing of worldlying dim, seek to guide the consecrated child to his appointed pathway, surely, then Zion will not, as now, mourn because of her desolation, but, with a shout of triumph, will arise to lead on her bannered host to the conquests of the closing struggle, which shall usher in the "Sabbath rest" of a redeemed race—the perfect kingdom of Him who "shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

To daughters likewise this voice speaks with a solemn emphasis—an emphasis which could not have been appreciated a generation earlier than the present. With increasing knowledge, woman flutters under a burden of increasing responsibility. Improved talents, cultivated intellects, self-conscious mental power, from within a labyrinth of time-sanctioned prejudices, seek a safe egress to the healthful realms of action, where exercise may plume the wing and impart vigor to the aspiring powers.

Unsanctified womanhood seeks to satisfy the yearning of her intellectual nature by boldly clamoring for stations of public trust, which, if granted her, would rob "home" of its sanctity, and the word "mother" of its music. But these are not all who from our female institutions come forth fully equipped for the "life warfare." A numerous throng there is who joyously hasten with their mental treasure to Calvary's lonely mount, and at the foot of the cross gladly lay the burden down—a willing offering to the Author of woman's elevation, the glorified son of Mary of Nazareth. And as they linger there, the scene of suffering, of anguish, and of death changes to one of triumphal glory; and while the heavens above are parting, and angel voices are making vocal the morning with a hymn of celestial welcome, the Savior whom they love, with outstretched arm, accepts the sacrifice of "all for Jesus' sake," and directs to a work worthy of their noblest powers in the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

"The field is the world"—the scene of toil may be at home, or it may be abroad, amid the fleeing shadows of unfriendly lands. In either event educated woman, with her patient love and adaptive nature, is found to be especially fitted as the bearer of "glad tidings." Shall not, then, the daughters, sisters, women, all of the "Church militant" below, forgetting the things that are behind, nobly address themselves to the holy vocation whereunto they are called?

"Looking unto Jesus," let them press earnestly forward to enter the world-wide gate of usefulness which is opened to them by the three-fold nature of their sacred mission as "preserver, teacher, and inspirer." When from the overflowing abundance of our schools the wants of home are supplied, let them, without a murmur, remembering for whom they make the sacrifice, gladly hasten to lands where sister hearts are veiled in the despair of heathenism, and in the awakened thirst for the waters of life, in the falling tear of penitence for acknowledged sin, gratefully discover a joy which shall satisfy every longing, and triumphantly lead them onward and upward to a home and a crown, from whose tasted joys no exile can roam, and upon the noontide of whose glory the shadow of no sad parting can ever fall!

PYRAMIDS.

BY H. N. POWERS.

Each mighty despot, through long years,
May build his structures broad and high;
But they who drudge cement with tears
The blocks on which they wish to die.
And ponderous fabrics, strong and stern,
May frown above imperial bones:
What are they but Ambition's urn—
Grand satires sneering out of stones?
But they who labor with great thought,
With purpose noble, calm, sublime,
Shall build a pyramid which, wrought,
Shall ask no sheltring care from time.
Its corner-stones repose secure
In holy hearts and earnest minds;
Each deed and triumph, wise and pure,
With golden bands the fabric binds.
The mighty epochs of our race
Are chronicled in each broad aisle;
They wear the soul's eternal grace,
And ever change and ruin smile.
They stand where Freedom's cause had birth,
Where beams the path Religion tread,
Where Science drove the gloom from earth,
And martyrs kept the truth of God.
Strong arms are toiling not in vain;
High Heaven shall grant one conquest more,
When Love shall lose the slave's red chain,
And wash the blood-stains from our shore.
Then prouder yet shall rise the spire
That points the glorious action done,
And like a pyramid of fire
Shall blaze the glory sought and won.

THE ILL-BRED GIRL.

BY MRS. H. C. GARDNER.

I SHALL not introduce her to you, lady reader of the Repository, for you know her already, and have been as often annoyed by her as I have. You meet her in society, at Church, at the lyceum, in the concert hall, and feel condemned for hinting to yourself that if she must exist, how pleasant it would be to have her move out of town.

She comes for a call, some fine cheery morning, to your rooms, examines your toilet-table and your wardrobe, criticises the view from your favorite window, and, unmindful of your vexed countenance, peeps into your escritoir, overhauls your private correspondence and finds the pressed violet, the hidden memento of ———.

Well, I suppose that you are tolerably sure that you know her. At Church, last Sabbath, you noticed the impropriety of her late, rustling entrance, and could not wholly excuse it, although aware that it was arranged for effect. After she was fairly seated, and the worshippers were permitted to resume the thread of their devotions, you could not placidly tolerate the winks, and whisperings, and giggles that she exchanged with a raw miss of the same sort. You thought that ordinary politeness—allowing that the Gospel message was not of particular moment to her—should have induced her to give an appearance of attention to the ambassador of Christ.

Why, bless you, my dear, she was there for another purpose, and the organ might peal its most inspiring strains, and the clear voices of the choir might swell out in sweetest hymns of praise, but she was not to be diverted from her purpose, or, rather, purposes, for she has two.

The first and most prominent is to display herself—to be gazed at like an illuminated fashion-plate. She rejoices in the cognomen of Miss Polly Wiggle—appropriately, too, for she is ever on the alert, ruffling her feathers and laces, newly adjusting the gold halter and other heavy metals with which fashion and a barbarous taste have loaded her, and rearranging her plumage generally. Her restless vanity is wounded when the handsome young men turn away, and, for mere contrast to the sickening show, listen attentively to the pure truth of God's holy word.

Her second object is to study the costume of others. A very fine study, one would think, to be pursued on the Sabbath in God's hallowed temple. Nevertheless, thousands and thousands of ill-bred girls go to Church fifty-two Sabbaths in the year, who have no higher aim and no better perception of their accountability to the Lord of the Sabbath. They are as transparent as air to any sensible observer. Miss Wiggle carries home from Church, in her weak little brain, an exact pattern of every sleeve and collar, of every bonnet and mantle worn, even to the quaint little hood of aunt Prudence, who sits under the gallery. If you hadn't known it before, this gaping at the attire of others would have proclaimed her an ill-bred girl.

You often wonder, and so do I, why, or, rather, how she managed to arrive at young womanhood without acquiring a taste for the really beautiful. It is not her position in life that is in fault, for she is admitted—on sufferance, out of respect to her family connections—into intelligent society.

Her home influences—which, however, she deprecates—are of a refined order. It is, indeed, whispered that the education of the heart, and the discipline of its selfish passions, were wholly omitted in the early training of Miss Polly; but in society it is understood that her later educational advantages have not been limited. Her step-mother, poor lady, has done her best to polish her. Lavish sums have been uselessly expended in the vain endeavor to stimulate her intellect and to cultivate her taste, and the result is, that she is able to jabber a little in French and Spanish, and to speak, in all its charming simplicity, the broken English of her babyhood. She can draw a little, and the landscapes that she sketches have this agreeable peculiarity, that they will do for any locality that chances to become fashionable, representing one place as strikingly as another. She knows nothing of history, has an idea that "good Queen Bess" reigned over Mexico, and smiles loudly at the bare idea of understanding the political aspects of the day, or of being interested in the solution of the great national questions that occupy every intelligent mind. She botanizes, but confines her researches to artificial flowers. The only thing of which she obtained a complete idea—even at school—was the importance of the varying fashions, and she brought away a list, learned by heart, of all the young ladies' dresses.

Like all ill-bred girls, Miss Wiggle is wholly above exercising the cardinal virtues of thrift and prudence. How she laughs at the economy and skill of rosy May Landon, who fits and makes up her own dresses so becomingly! How she exults in the triumph of having rich dresses spoiled in the fashionable shop that she patronizes! It shows that she is no niggard. It tells the world that she don't quibble for a penny. Won't her open-handed prodigality charm the nice young men who, if worth catching, know that prudence and economy go hand in hand with virtue and happiness? What if she did say "No!" surlily and loudly to the pitiful and wan-faced beggar? What if she does shut the door against the shivering, half-starved child, of whose sorrows it is vulgar to know, except as portrayed by the novelist? Doesn't she, every month, burst out a pair of costly coquette gaiters, not nearly so large as her thick, spreading foot? Think of this one item of expense, and then judge for yourself the slanderous world that dares to call her stingy and selfish.

Our fashionable, ill-bred acquaintance is at the party this evening. Do you see her? Neck, and arms, and bosom just like Eve's in Paradise, as nude if not as beautiful. In the hearing of an attentive young gentleman she descants upon the shocking vulgarity of Powers's statue of the Greek Slave. The least bit of a blush, the listener thinks, would be in admirable keeping with her little set speech, but the blushes do not come till sundry hidden lacings and hooks and eyes, getting impatient of the strain put upon them, go off simultaneously like crackers in a barrel on the Fourth of July.

The attentive young gentleman has money and is suspected of having brains. All the girls and their mammas keep an inventory of his worldly goods. In case of robbery they could identify the minutest article. It is whispered that she will be in luck who catches him. It is evident that our half-clad acquaintance is of this opinion. But you see in his looks a strong misgiving as to the propriety of wedding such a neck and—its suburbs. So, after a little chatting, a little commonplace joking, you find that he has brought up for the evening—very likely for life—by the side of sweet, modest May Landon, who, in her unadorned loveliness and delicate refinement, is unconsciously very beautiful. Poor, poor Polly Wiggle!

When we called with the Rev. Mr. Candor on her step-mother, did we not blush till our hats almost took fire at Miss Polly's unconscious importance? When poor Mrs. Wiggle undertook to reply to our inquiries, didn't she twitch the words out of the old lady's mouth and shoot them at us as if we had been a mile off? Didn't she, in fact, perform the same friendly office for each of us, not excepting young Harry Lane, who stammers so painfully when embarrassed? Did the clergyman find a chance to speak without the running accompaniment of her tongue? Only think of her entertaining a minister with the fashions, and with the fine moral tendency of the theater, and with the absolute need of Christians frequenting the ball-room and opera-house for amusement. "Not," said Miss Polly in her wisest manner, "not that a whole life should be spent in such recreation, but, using these indulgences as not abusing them, they should serve as resting-places on the journey toward heaven."

He looked at her for a moment attentively, as if in doubt how to classify the unusual gems she represented, and then absently, as if thinking aloud, replied:

"Ah! Miss Wiggle," he said, "if God should be pleased, on your death-bed, to endow you with common sense, it is as much as can be hoped for."

Unfortunate Mrs. Wiggle! sitting by so meekly, and with her whole soul rueing the day that she became a Wiggle.

We are inclined to think that all of dame Nature's clerks are not honest; that there is cheating somewhere. The brains dealt out are, in many cases, short weight, and sometimes wholly omitted. It often appears that the usual quantity in the female character is so sadly perverted by the owner, as to give her the appearance of being wholly destitute of the article in question. This, in former times, gave rise to the supposition that women were created without souls. If the ill-bred girls of that day were as numerous as at the present time, we can hardly be surprised that Mohammed should have excluded the ladies from the heaven of his invention. In so grave a matter politeness, of course, was out of the question. I can not assert that all women do really possess souls, because that frequently, when there is no apparent evidence of such possession, I should be at a loss to prove my assertion; but I do most conscientiously believe that Mohammed was mistaken.

—♦— THUS IS LIFE.

If we die to-day, the sun will shine as brightly, and the birds sing as sweetly to-morrow. Business will not be suspended for a moment, and the great mass will not bestow a thought to our memories. "Is he dead?" will be the solemn inquiry of a few, as they pass to their work. But no one will miss us except our immediate connections; and in a short time they will forget us, and laugh as merrily as when we sat beside them. Thus shall we all, now active in life, pass away. In a few years not a living being can say, "I remember him!" We live in another age, and did business with those who slumber in the tomb. Thus is life. How rapidly it passes! O, blessed are they who are held in everlasting remembrance!

AN EASTERN APOLOGUE.

ABDALLAH sat at his morning meal, when there alighted on the rim of his goblet a little fly. It sipped an atom of syrup and was gone. But it came next morning, and the next, and the next again, till at last the scholar noticed it. Not quite a common fly, it seemed to know that it was beautiful, and it soon grew very bold. And lo! a great wonder: it became daily larger, and yet larger, till there could be discerned in the size as of a locust the appearance as of a man. From a handbreath it reached the stature of a cubit; and still, so winning were its ways, that it found more and more favor with this son of infatuation. It frisked like a satyr, and it sang like a peri, and like a moth of the evening it danced on the ceiling, and, like the king's gift, whithersoever it turned it prospered. The eyes of the simple one were blinded, so that he could not in all of this perceive the subtlety of an evil gin. Therefore, the lying spirit waxed bolder and yet bolder, and whatsoever his soul desired of dainty meats he freely took; and when the scholar waxed wroth, and said, "This is my daily portion from the table of the mufti: there is not enough for thee and me," the dog-faced deceiver played some pleasant trick, and caused the silly one to smile. Till, in process of time, the scholar perceived, that as his guest grew stronger and stronger, he himself waxed weaker and weaker.

Now, also, there arose frequent strife betwixt the demon and his dupe, and at last the youth smote the fiend so sore that he departed for a season. And when he was gone, Abdallah rejoiced and said, "I have triumphed over mine enemy; and whatsoever time it pleaseth me, I shall smite him so that he die. Is he not altogether in mine own power?" But after not many days the gin came back again, and this time he was arrayed in goodly garments, and he brought a present in his hand; and he spoke of the days of their first friendship, and he looked so mild and feeble, that his smooth words wrought upon this dove without a heart, and saying, "Is he not a little one?" he received him again into his chamber.

On the morrow, when Abdallah came not into the assembly of studious youth, the mufti said, "Wherefore tarrieth the son of Abdul? Perchance he sleepeth." Therefore, they repaired even to his chamber, but to their knocking he made no answer. Wherefore the mufti opened the door, and lo! there lay on the divan the dead body of his disciple. His visage was black and swollen, and on his throat was the pressure of a finger broader than the palm of a mighty man. All the stuff, the gold, and the changes of raiment belonging to the hapless one were gone, and in the soft earth of the garden were seen the footsteps of a giant. The mufti measured one of the prints, and, behold! it was six cubits long.

Reader, canst thou expound the riddle? Is it the bottle or the betting-book? Is it the billiard-table or the theater? Is it smoking? Is it laziness? Is it novel reading? But know that an evil habit is an elf constantly expanding. It may come in at the key-hole, but it will soon grow too big for the house. Know, also, that no evil habit can take the life of your soul, unless you yourself nourish it and cherish it, and by feeding it with your own vitality give it a strength greater than your own!

LITTLE COURTESIES OF LIFE.

"Ill seems, said he, if he so valiant be,
That he should be so stern to stranger wight;
For seldom yet did living creature see
That courtesies and manhood ever disagree!"

THE little things of life have far more effect upon character, reputation, friendship, and fortune than the heartless and superficial are apt to imagine. There are few, indeed, however rough by nature, who are not touched and softened by kindness and courtesy. A civil word, a friendly remark, a generous compliment, an affable bow of recognition—all have an influence; while surliness, incivility, harshness, and ill-temper, naturally enough, produce an effect exactly the reverse. The American people, as a whole, are perhaps not remarkable for courtesy. They are so actively engaged in the bustle of life, in the outward movements of commerce and trade, that they have little leisure to cultivate and practice those polished refinements which are the results of education, of travel, and of enlarged intercourse with society. Nevertheless, we are not a discourteous people, and in the great cities the proprieties of manners and the civilities of form are attended to with a commendable degree of exactness. Lady Emmeline Stuart Wortley, who some time since traveled in this country, describes the citizens of the United States as "particularly courteous and obliging." But a lady of refinement and accomplishments, and traveling as well for information as for pleasure, could scarcely gather another opinion, for the commanders of our steam-boats and the conductors of our railroad cars are proverbially polite; while in intelligent circles, every-where throughout the Union, a reputable stranger would, of course, receive marked and kindly attention. Still we are bound to confess that we are deficient in many of the little courtesies of life—courtesies that are admirably calculated to sweeten the intercourse of society, the interchange of friendly feeling, and the general communion that takes place from day to day between neighbors and companions. The excuse with many is, that they have not time to practice the civilities to which we refer—that they are too much engaged in more important matters. Thus a friendly visit will not be repaid, a polite note will be left unanswered, a neighborly call will be disregarded, a pleasant smile will be met with a cold look of indifference, and a cordial grasp of the hand will be responded to with reluctance, if not surprise. All this may mean nothing, and yet the effect upon the mind and the heart is chilling and painful. The mistake that too many of us make is, in supposing that the courtesy is to be all on one side—that we are to receive every kind of attention, and return nothing. And this is an error which prevails in various phases of life, and to a greater extent than people are apt to imagine. The affairs of this world should be reciprocal. A person may be willing to confer an obligation again and again. But unless there be some manifestation of gratitude and appreciation—unless, indeed, the disposition be apparent to do something in return—the party that confers favor after favor will in the end grow weary of well-doing, and seek out some more grateful or more sympathizing object. We are all more or less selfish, and that description of selfishness which exacts an acknowledgment by word or by deed, either for friendship extended or affections lavished, is, perhaps, as little censurable as any of the infirmities of poor human nature—if, indeed, it may be called an infirmity. We have somewhere met with the remark, that there is no such thing as unrequited love—that love which is not requited will soon cease to exist, inasmuch as the very nature of the passion renders mutual regard essential to its continued existence. In the general sense this theory may be correct, but there are, of course, exceptions. If, therefore, in grave matters of the heart—matters in which our all of earthly happiness may be said to be involved—reciprocity of a kindred feeling is absolutely essential, how much more will the doctrine apply to the little courtesies of life! A friendship of many years' standing has often, as we have reason to know, been chilled into indifference, coldness, and restraint by some petty neglect or hasty remark. Distrust has been excited—a doubt, a suspicion, has been engendered, and the unwavering confidence that existed for years has thus been broken at once and forever.

TWILIGHT REVERIES.

BY MRS. HARRIET B. FRANCK.

Gently, gently o'er me stealeth
Many a half-forgotten strain,
That this quiet hour revealeth—
Scenes I joy to greet again.
Scenes that memory long hath hidden
Rise with wild, exulting power,
Filling every thought unbidden—
Happy, sweet, entrancing hour!
Childhood dreams again I'm dreaming,
Reveling in their pure delight;
Fairy magic lights are gleaming,
Long life's pathway beaming bright.
O, how sweet this fond illusion—
Sweet to seem again a child;
Sweet to paint, though all delusion,
Coming hours in beauty wild;
Sweet to bury all the sorrow
That has passed since childhood's day,
And again to hope each morrow
Brighter be than yesterday;
Sweet to feel the fond caressing
Of a gentle mother's hand,
And to hear a father's blessing
Said in tone so solemn, bland;
Sweet to hear my sisters' voices
Joined with brother's, merry, clear—
O, how full, my soul rejoices
At this visioned scene so dear!
Yet these are but glimpses stealing
O'er the heart of by-gone hours;
But their wealth is past revealing,
And no words can tell their powers.
For the hardest heart they soften,
Free the thoughts from busy care;
And I fondly hope that often
I these soothing hours may share!

LIFE.

BY MRS. M. A. BIGELOW.

Like a rivulet flowing by,
Like a summer zephyr's sigh,
Like a flower all frail and fair,
Like a snowflake in the air,
Such is life.
Like the flashing meteor's light,
Like the eagle's rapid flight,
Like the cataract's fearful sweep,
Like the wave upon the deep,
Even such is life.

"COME OUT OF THAT!"

VERY imposing and very important is the position of a woman when she is hailed as "grandmother," or, we should say, "grand-mamma"—we beg pardon for the mistake—mothers are out of the fashion now. There is something seriously responsible and equally flattering in having the charge of my son's little girls or my daughter's little boys, and a very pleasant privilege withal in permitting them to ride rampant over every thing in the establishment—from good manners at the table to balustrades on the stairs. They are such "dear little creatures, bless their hearts!" and my grandchildren, moreover, which is quite enough to warrant them in any atrocity under the domestic firmament. Now we do not happen to be "a grand-mamma," but we have the next right of consanguinity to smack and spoil a few of the rising generation under the name and authority of "aunt," and in this capacity are often induced in our prejudiced benevolence to undertake the care of a brother's eldest son "just turned of six." The lady who owns him, frequently appeals to our tenderness and charity, and writes a heart-rending note, stating that symptoms of scarlet fever, whooping-cough, measles, or some such nursery plague, are appearing in the family, and that as the eldest born is free from contagion as yet, she will be eternally grateful if we will have him for a week or two. We are mentally convinced that these symptoms are "got up," for the number of times they have appeared without further development is fabulous in medical history. We are perfectly aware of the plain fact that Master Harry is one of the most tiresome and mischievous children ever possessed by dotting parents, and that his mamma flies in desperation to any subterfuge that will possibly form an excuse to "get rid of him" for a bit. A short time since a most fearful anxiety was expressed by the said mamma that the "baby" was threatened with a complaint which might become epidemic in the family—we believe it was nothing less than the Asiatic cholera—and as Harry had not yet evinced any symptoms of the same, it would be a merciful kindness on our part to let her send him to us for a few days. Of course Harry came, and our usual peace and order were broken at the wonderful shrine of the darling little Harry's precocious "cleverness." We could relate much of the young gentleman's work that might be sport to our readers, though it was death to us, but we do not intend making this a facetious article, merely an illustrative one, so we shall proceed to state at once that the darling little fellow, after leading a life of unceasing activity that emulated the trials of Job, contrived to extract a promise from us that we would take him to the Crystal Palace. "Any thing for a quiet life," said we; and as he had broken our letter-balance, picked all our choice yellow roses, and upset a pail of water in the passage during the morning, we thought it would be a wise course to get him out of the house at any inconvenience. We dressed him with all possible elaboration and taste, in his best velvet tunic, silk socks, and the various et ceteras of small dandyism, finishing our labor with pushing, pulling, and screwing on a pair of tight kid gloves—a deed of toil which afforded us the silent conviction that we were a fool for our pains; however, we did our scrupulous duty by our nephew, and trimmed him off to perfection, strictly bidding him stay in the parlor and amuse himself with a volume of Punch, while we put on our bonnet and walking accessories. We were busy at our toilet under a most nervous pressure of haste, when we accidentally glanced out of the bedroom window, and beheld Master Harry at the bottom of the garden, velvet tunic, silk socks, and all, with a dirty rake in his hand, up to his eyes in a cucumber-frame, wherein a quantity of moist preparation had been placed for vegetable productions. We threw up the sash in alarm. "Harry, you naughty boy, come out of that!" shrieked we at the top of our voice. "I'm only mixing it up, aunty; I like it—it's such fun," was the audacious reply. "Pray come out of that," we shouted again with extra vigor, but there he remained in independent indifference. We clutched at our parasol, thrust a handkerchief into our pocket, and nearly broke our neck over the carpet in our undue haste to get downstairs. The cook detained us for a minute or two on the landing; we gave some incoherent orders and hastened to the cucumber-frame, which we reached at the very moment when Harry contrived to tumble into the worst corner of the bed that he possibly could, and he arose before us in a plight which, as newspapers say, may be more easily conceived than described. We are afraid that we indulged in a sudden exacerbation of shaking, slapping, and scolding; but the Genoa robe, the royal blue sash, and the elegant kids were destroyed forever. The Crystal Palace excursion was impracticable, and, altogether, there was some excuse for dereliction from my womanly fortitude. Master Harry incurred such a serious expostulation, and such an extra box on the ear from his dotting papa, who chanced to call at that unfortunate moment, that some effect was created. The willful young gentleman seemed to think that "fun" might be purchased at too high a price, and within a few hours he came to us, exclaiming, in a tone of forlorn repentance, "O, do forgive me, dear aunty; I know I was a naughty boy, and I do wish I had 'come out of that' when you told me, for I had only dirtied my shoes a little then." We looked on the weeping culprit with philosophical reflection, and thought that his wish that he "had come out of that" in good time, might be chided by older disciples of folly and rebellion. We went on thinking discursively, and regretted that the homely warning of "coming out of that" is not more generally heeded by grown-up children of mischief before it is too late. Our tiresome nephew had given us a text for a few remarks, and here they are.

Often have we passed the corner of a street, where the brilliant glare of gas, broad swinging mahogany doors, and rich plate-glass windows, gemmed with rainbow-colored cordial bottles, point out the "dram-shop"—where the artisan first enters with a tidy jacket and healthy face; where the poor man takes his initiate "drains" with steady hand and natural voice; where the foolish mother ministers the first glass to herself and the first drop to her babe, with a decent dress on her back and a degree of comeliness in her smile. What would we say to them as they enter the infernal region of misery and ruin? What would we whisper in their ears, before their fingers begin to tremble round the fiery glass, and their eyes to exchange the lucid glance of reason for the bleared and bloodshot leer of idiocy?

We would only say "Come out of that" in time, or the jaws of death will yawn above the merrily slamming portal doors, and the miasma of prisons will breathe from those prismatic cordials. "Come out of that," well-doing workman, before your fustian jacket is in rags, and your brains incompetent to guide your hands in its daily craft. "Come out of that," offspring of Poverty, before Desperation and Disease bring you to the lazar-house of Infamy and Insanity. "Come out of that," young wife and mother, before the flame of "drink" has burnt up the god-like springs of womanhood in your bosom, before your child becomes a living curse to you, and your days and nights are spent in unholy wretchedness. Beware of the dram-shop, and turn in time to any voice that says, "Come out of that."

We have known the well-bred youth—the gently nurtured and the fondly loved—go forth into life with Plenty and Ambition to lead him on his way. Two temples are before him. Here is a plain but nobly solid Pantheon, filled with the illustrious "toilers" in the cause of humanity and commerce. Those who enter it must work, and earn an honorable niche, made glorious by the respect of man and the approbation of God. There is an arabesque saloon of gaudy aspect and alluring attraction. The gambler's cards are within it, wreathed with flowers, and steeped in perfume. The ruby wine and the fair-faced houris are enticing the young spirit to their seductive influence. The music of flattery is sounding sweetly over the choice viands, and the cheers of boon companions are breaking on the midnight hours. Jollity and recklessness are there, and Temptation flaunts in her gayest garments. The youth is taken, like the moth by the wax-flame. Beware, young man, retrace thy steps, before the evils of dissipation have fixed their serpent hold. Listen to the friend who stands beckoning at a distance, and says, "Come out of that."

How frequently do we observe the mercenary son of Prosperity growing cold as the metal he worships! Look at his calculating eye and close-set mouth. Mark the rigid character of his brow, where one can fancy they see the figures of a heavy sum in "addition," with the sharp furrow-lines beneath embracing the "sum total." He is absorbed in "heaping up riches," not knowing who shall gather them. He is turning away from the sunshine of Affection and the green fields of Happiness. He would cut the silvery clouds into bank-notes, and coin the yellow buttercups into sovereigns, if he could, and think the world improved thereby. He tells the stricken spirit beside him that sympathy and feeling are of no use to any body. "Don't care for any thing, only put money in thy purse," says he; and here ends his noble teaching. Son of Prosperity! whither are you going? Have a care. You are on the threshold of the stone sarcophagus of Avarice. Pass not into it too far, or your parchments and ducats may close up the entrance, and bury you before you are dead. Be a little foolish in your wisdom, lest man rejoice when you have departed from among them, and your name be but remembered as an item in Fortune's ledger. The marble sepulcher which holds the living covetous is dreary and unblest. Listen in time while the cherub sprites of Generosity and Impulse can approach nigh enough to breathe at your elbow, "Come out of that!"

Let us walk through the choking purlieus and fetid courts of this fine city. Turn from the palace gate, the mansion portico, the fashionable park, and gay promenade, and let us inhale the foul atmosphere, where dark cellars and darker kennels reek with disgusting impurity, where Fever, Pestilence, and Death hold their unceasing festival, and the faces of the dwellers therein serve but as waymarks to a charnel-house. What shall we exclaim as we close our nostrils and avert our eyes from the surrounding horrors? This is what we will utter, "Rulers of the land, look at your poor neighbors. Belgravia has been drained, why not Bell Alley? The blood of the weaver's child needs the fresh light and air as much as that which flows in the veins of the heir to England's crown. Turn to your poor neighbors," we repeat, "teach them practically that 'cleanliness is next to godliness.' Help them in their struggle with filth, suffering, ignorance, and degradation, and say to them with kindly accent and lifting hand, 'Come out of that!'"

We could carry on our theme to probably an unwelcome length; therefore, we will terminate our speculations, hoping our readers are not scanning our trifling paper, and wishing we would "Come out of that!"

Let a few "parting words" be given, and then we have done. We would seriously advise all who are getting into the cucumber frame of questionable contents—let that frame be in what mental, moral, or physical shape it may—to take warning by the result attending the obstinacy of our clever nephew. Do not persevere in a foolish course, till velvet tunic, silken sash, and the chance for rational pleasure are ruined and lost; but if a kindly or experienced voice says, "Come out of that;" if a sister's tears, a mother's entreaty, a father's injunction, a husband's wish, a wife's prayer, or a friend's advice become the medium of the homely but much-meaning request, obey at once with sense and readiness, so that you can say, "I did well in 'coming out of that,' while 'only my shoes were a little dirty.'"—Eliza Cook.

CHEERFUL VIEWS.

MELANCHOLY greatly hinders the usefulness of many. It falls upon a contented life like a drop of ink on white paper, which is not the less a stain because it carries no meaning with it. Let your happy soul rove through the truths of Scripture, as the happy herds through the green pastures.

ROBERT, DUKE OF NORMANDY.

BY E. L. MURKELL.

Henry I seized his brother Robert, conveyed him to England, and suffered him to languish in the castle of Cardiff twenty-eight years, where he died.—OLD HISTORY.

THE sun shone bright on the ivied wall
Of the castle strong and old—
A kingly mansion it seemed, so tall
And safe from intruder bold.

There a lonely man came in and out,
Nor beyond its bounds might pass,
And languidly paced those walks about
With a brow by gloom o'ercast.

Proud and noble blood burned in his veins,
And a father's heart he bore;
A pris'ner who might to a crown have claims,
Might a freeman be no more.

On the midnight stars, in arch of blue,
He had gazed till it was pain;
And the bird's sweet song so well he knew,
It charmed not his heart again.

Nor the bright-hued flower, nor lowly one,
Could relieve from bitter thought;
While the lettered page of past deeds done
But a shadowed lesson taught.

The old halls echoed his tread for years,
While for love and home he sighed;
By a brother doomed to hopeless tears,
A captive he pined and died.

THE OPENING OF SPRING.

BY E. C. HOWE, M. D.

MARCH hath burst the bars of winter,
And unloosed the icy chain,
That so long has linked together
Brook and river, hill and plain.

Hark! a sound like distant thunder
Rolls along the vale and wood;
See above the sky is darkling—
Now the earth is all aflood.

'Mid the mountain's rugged thicket,
Echoes deep the storm-wind's roar;
And the swollen streamlets dashing,
Through each narrow channel pour.
On they ramble, now they tumble
Over rock and foaming sand,
With a headlong flight, engulfing
Level field and meadow land.

Bright above the heavens are glowing;
Beauty sparkles all around;
Shining river, mountain streamlet,
Lisp a low and mellow sound.
On the hill-side flocks are grazing,
Lambkins frisking on the lea;
Merry peasant-boy and maiden
Gayly join in sportive glee.

MY POCKET BIBLE.

BY BISHOP MORRIS.

IT is a long time since Solomon said, "Of making many books there is no end." Did his vision extend to the middle of the nineteenth century? to this age of book-making mania? Did his prophetic eye light upon the massive heaps of books now displayed in stores and stalls, and still accumulating in the depots of publishing houses, where they are thrown off by steam power at the rate of a volume per minute? I wot not. It, however, requires no inspiration to discover a vast improvement since his day in the facilities for producing books, and in the style of getting them up. A printed work bound up in book form is more convenient and elegant than a huge roll of written parchment, such as were used anciently, many of which were stationary because too unwieldy to be portable. But whether there be the same amount of improvement as to the subject-matter of books since the days of the prophets is another question—one which each reader will decide for himself or herself. It is readily conceded that modern libraries present a fine appearance, arranged in extended rows of attractive volumes, tastefully done up in black and blue muslin, brown and red morocco, and calf gilt extra; and all this tinsel ornament, though it makes the contents no better, procures a more extensive sale and circulation. Some customers buy to read for mental improvement, or at least amusement, and others perhaps merely to embellish their center-tables. Whatever may be the motive, to possess them indicates some taste, if nothing more, for certainly a handsome book is a beautiful ornament. Here my prolegomena must end.

From all these attractive forms of modern lore, I now turn away to pay a tribute of respect to an old familiar acquaintance, my pocket Bible. In appearance, like that of its owner, it is unpretending and rather out of fashion. It has been in the regular service over forty years, has endured some hard campaigns and rough fare in its day, and, as might be expected, its external beauty is somewhat faded. And yet I would not exchange it for one of Messrs. Harpers' finest pictorials, or for any book the world contains, having long since determined that

"My book and heart Shall never part"

till death severs the silvery cord of life. My partiality is not founded upon its "outward adorning," but partly upon protracted companionship, and chiefly upon valuable service rendered, in the form of salutary instruction imparted to me, and consolation afforded me, by it on my perilous journey through this vale of tears. As nearly as I can measure with the eye, it is about five inches long, three and a half wide, and two thick, and is printed in double columns. On the imprint are these words: "THE HOLY BIBLE. . . . First American Diamond Edition. Baltimore: Published and sold by John Hagerty, No. 12 Light-street. . . . 1812." On a blank leaf I wrote my name, and the cost price, $3, over the date "July, 1814;" and certainly I never made a better investment. A brief family register was subsequently entered on a blank page between the old and new covenants, containing a record of our marriage, names, and ages; some of which names have since been transferred to the records of the Church above—only my own and that of my son remain on the list of probationers. May we have grace afforded us to get as well through and as safely out of this world of trial, as the loved ones who have passed on before us, and are waiting to hail us on the shore of life!

This Bible came to my relief most opportunely. I had been licensed to preach a few months previous, and though I had another copy of the holy Scriptures, it was not so convenient and portable as this one. Its full marginal references afforded me much aid in tracing out corresponding texts, and explaining Scripture by Scripture, thus supplying in a good degree the place of a concordance. This little Bible became my constant companion and counselor, furnishing my daily task of reading, both stated and occasional, and, as a general rule, so continued for a long series of years, till my feeble vision could no longer conveniently trace the delicate impression of the "diamond" type, since which time it has been carefully laid up at home. When on my circuits, stations, and districts, it went with me to every appointment, into every congregation, and bore testimony to the truth of my Gospel message. If other authorities were referred to, they were used only as explanatory of this. Nothing was relied on as canonical but the Bible. To it alone I have appealed for over forty years as the standard of truth, and as the only decisive authority on all questions of doctrine, morality, experience, and practice, and still so regard it and appeal to it in the pulpit. O that I had more faithfully adhered to its precepts, and more constantly relied on its promises! then had my peace been as a river, and my righteousness as the waves of the sea. The Bible is the book which teaches us how to live and how to die, and the only one on the teaching of which we can safely trust our future destiny. While on the voyage of time,

"It is my chart and compass, too,
Whose needle points forever true."

May it lead us eventually to the blessed port of life!

When I was young and my Bible was new, we had circuits that were circuits, requiring daily travel and daily preaching. Our auditors assembled in log-cabins, log school-houses, or under the forest-trees. We needed no reading-desk on which to lay our notes; for, while delivering our message, all the notes we used were in our heads and hearts, and if any new thought suggested itself as we progressed in the discourse we let it have free course from the heart to the heart. Sometimes the effect was thrilling; for while the mind is inspired with its theme, it occasionally takes both speaker and hearer by surprise with thoughts of life and words of fire. It is true that in most men, and certainly in me, it would be presumption to undertake the responsible duty of preaching without preparation; yet the best mode of preparation is not in a manuscript of measured paragraphs, but in prayerful meditation. Such at least is my experience. With a split-bottomed chair or small table before me for a desk, and this same diamond Bible open in my left hand, standing in the midst of the people, I used to feel quite as much at home as I do now in a spacious church, with a ponderous folio Bible resting on a velvet cushion; and frequently witnessed more signal proofs of awakening power and saving mercy, for in those days the word preached was wont to be in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, and great grace came down among the people.

When mounted on horseback—the usual mode of travel in days of yore—this little Bible was uniformly a part of my Gospel armor; if not open before me, yet in the pocket or portmanteau, whence it could be reached as readily as a warrior could draw his sword; and David had scarcely more confidence in his shepherd sling and brook stones going out to meet Goliath, than I had in this well-tempered Jerusalem blade, "the sword of the Spirit"—a confidence not in myself, but in the truth and in Him that sent me to "preach the word." My Bible, always in the service, winter and summer, spring and autumn, was necessarily exposed to many storms of snow, sleet, and rain. The stains upon it indicate that it was saturated with water driven through the leathern cover inclosing it. Once in the winter of 1815-16, when I was on a circuit in Western Virginia, it bore me company to the bottom of a creek under the ice, the weather being so cold that my coat was frozen stiff in a few minutes after my escape from the water. By this mishap the bags containing my clothes and Bible were thoroughly drenched. Having rescued them, and recovered my horse, from which I got separated in the water, and traveled in this condition over two miles to the nearest cabin, and carefully drying it leaf by leaf, I saved the whole, except the cover, which finally came off. The second binding in black leather, done in Zanesville in 1819 or 1820, is only slightly broken at the corners, and that not with ordinary use, but by violence inflicted by strong-armed "sons of thunder" at camp meeting, using it as a mallet, and pounding the ends on the naked wooden stand. Many times I rescued it from such abuse by withdrawing it from before the zealous preacher while he faced in another direction; for, although he was welcome to pound the board with his fist, I was not willing to see my unoffending Bible battered to pieces. That is a mode of handling the word of life not congenial to my taste. Expounding the Bible enlightens many; but beating it on a hard board enlightens no one, though it may possibly serve to frighten some hearers of weak nerves. Yet, after all, it is in a tolerable state of preservation—not a leaf is lost, only one or two slightly marred, and every word of the book is readable.

Since my relation to the work has required me to visit all the conferences, this same Bible has accompanied me through all the states and territories of the Union, except very few of the most recently organized. Day and night, whether in the city or frontier settlement, by land or by water, on horseback or in buggy, in stages or canal-boats, in steam-boats or railcars, it was with me as long as I could see to read it. Sometimes it has been my pillow on a hard bench, or on the ground under the forest-trees. Frequently its words of truth and peace have gladdened my eyes and heart in the lonely desert, as well as in the populous city. And considering the great variety of scenes through which I have passed, and the numerous perils to which I have been exposed for forty years, it is marvelous that I never lost it; but here it is close by me.

On a review of the past history of my pocket Bible, I am forcibly reminded of many things which to me at least are interesting. The date of the memorandum on the blank leaf—"July, 1814"—reminds me that Time has shaken me by the hand, and sprinkled my head with his hoar frost; that my youthful cotemporaries in the Lord's vineyard have mostly disappeared from among the living, and that far the longer end of my journey through this world is behind. Of the large class that entered the Ohio conference with me in 1816, only one beside myself—Rev. William Holman—remains in the effective itinerant work. Many of them are dead, a few located, and the rest superannuated. Still, when I think of the venerable Joshua Wells, Joshua Taylor, William Burke, Joshua Hall, Thomas Wilkinson, and others, who were admitted as traveling preachers before I was born, and who still linger on the shores of time, I feel that I am comparatively young—not old enough to be classed with the fathers of American Methodism, and only claim to be one of the older sons.

Another item of history suggested by this review respects the great change which has taken place in the Methodist family since I owned this Bible. In 1814 the whole number of Methodists in the United States was about 211,000, and the present aggregate is over 1,300,000, showing a net increase in forty years of more than one million, while their advance in church extension, missions, education, and general influence is fully equal to their numerical increase. Surely this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes.

Many truths learned from this Bible have been beneficial to me, and deserve to be acknowledged with gratitude, a few of which I here briefly allude to. It taught me in early life that "wine is a mocker," and that "strong drink is raging." I have abstained from both. It also taught me to "let my moderation be known to all men." This, too, I have endeavored to observe. And by the blessing of God on my regular way of living and laboring, my health, though poor in the first years of my ministry, has been wonderfully preserved. I have not been confined to bed by any kind of affliction three days in thirty years, and am now as free from sickness and pain as I was forty years ago, though not able to endure the same amount of effort I was then.

Another and still more important lesson derived from the same source, is to "rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh," and that "he that trusteth in his own heart is a fool;" but that "blessed is he that maketh the Lord his trust." Now, in view of these wholesome instructions, I have for a long time endeavored to renounce all reliance on an arm of flesh, and, in the use of the appointed means, look to God through Christ for all needed blessings, temporal and spiritual, for life and godliness here, and for endless life hereafter; and then to rest satisfied, that all my interests for both worlds were safe in the hands of Him who deigns to be our heavenly Father. Thus I am calmly passing the afternoon of life in hope of an everlasting home in heaven, through the infinite merits of the great Redeemer, who loved us and gave himself for us, and all this as instructed by my pocket Bible.

LIFE.

BY MARY E. FRY.

"I pledge you in this cup of grief,
Where floats the fennel's bitter leaf!
The battle of our life is brief,
The alarm—the struggle—the relief—
Then sleep we side by side."

LIFE—thou mysterious mystery! too often looming in darkness over our devoted heads, again beaming like an angel of light; now rushing by in tumultuous waves, then beckoning us on in a voice soft as the dying zephyr of a summer day. With the faint light of our feeble dawn began thy existence; in the chamber of death ends thy fitful reign; farther thou art powerless, and to the sleeping millions can never again give what thou hast once bestowed. A moment ushers us on thy awful stage; no sooner are we there than thou hurriest us on to Death, who, more gentle, leadest us to a banquet prepared for the soul—to a house not built by mortal hands—to a city whose maker is God! Verily, thou art a solemn enigma never yet solved by mortal. The light and shade, cloud and sunshine, joy and sorrow, that constitute thy being, envelop thee in a mystic cloud of darkness; our eyes are too dim to pierce within, and to approach the penalty is death.

But the Christian heedeth not thy mystery, for he looketh to a life that is beyond; he scorneth thy pleasures, seeking pleasures that never die; he courts not thy favor, living a life hid with Christ in God; and longing to depart, he grieves not at thy shortness. Thou exuldest in triumph over the multitude, but the Christian triumphs over thee; thou pointest to the grave—he sings of a never-fading crown; thou whisperest of the dark shades of oblivion—he shouts of a book of life wherein his name is written forever. He, assured of thy uncertainty, knoweth enough, knowing he must be up and doing while it is day; and when the night cometh, his lamp is trimmed, his wedding garments are on, and he waiteth in patience to hear the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

THE PASTOR'S FAREWELL.

BY MRS. F. M. TAYLOR.

THE bright May sun cast its noon rays through the half-shut blinds, and the soft breeze fanned each cheek with its mild breath, while the perfume of the budding trees told that the long-wished-for spring had come, bringing with it its sorrows and joys for every heart.

This beautiful day was the last Sabbath our pastor was to be with us; the afternoon sermon his last for many years, perhaps forever; and he who for two years had labored among us, and won the hearts of all his people, was in a few hours to leave these loving hearts for a new home and a new people.

At an early hour the church was filled to overflowing, and a deep silence reigned among the crowd. As the last peal of the deep-toned bell died away, our pastor passed up the aisle, and ascended the pulpit steps; every eye followed him with a tearful glance, for full well did all know this was the last time that loved one would fill his accustomed place; and as he knelt in prayer there was scarcely a head that was not bowed, or an ear that caught not every word as it fell from those trembling lips.

Long will that prayer be remembered, and long after the words are erased from memory's pure tablets will its impression remain stamped on the heart. With his hands clasped on his Bible, and his glowing face upturned, he pleaded for sins that were never his; he spoke of his people, and bore them before his God; he pleaded that once again he might meet them in that bright land where partings never come.

His prayer ended, he commenced his theme. He spoke of his first Sabbath with us—of his hopes and fears; he spoke of times when discouraged, and when he almost walked in the dark; he told of hours when it seemed as if God had forsaken him, and he felt that his labors were all in vain; he mentioned the joyful day when that little band of young people came forward, and, standing before the altar, openly confessed their love to God, and made their renunciation of the world with all its follies.

He told his people that he had not aimed at preaching great and learned sermons, that they might please the ear and not reach the heart, but he had endeavored to preach Christ, and him crucified; and as the words fell from his lips, it almost seemed as if a Deity spoke through a human form.

He addressed the impenitent; he invited them to come and drink from the wells of salvation.

He spoke to his own little flock, the members of his Church; he urged them to press onward undaunted over the hills of trial and difficulty, and finally kneel with him at the foot of the great white throne.

To the members of his own weekly class, those who had joined the little flock since it had been under his care, he spoke words of sweet consolation and kind encouragement, telling them that he wished to have them as bright stars in his crown of rejoicing.

He closed by telling his people of his deep love for them, and his never-dying interest in their welfare. He told them that were he ever permitted to have another charge, none would be so dear to him as these his first people. With quivering lip and moistened eye, he raised his hands over his people to pronounce his last benediction; and as the sound of his voice died away and his hands were dropped, the multitude moved not, but wept, for they knew that their earthly shepherd was about to leave them—he who so long had guided the sheep of his flock, and cherished the lambs in his bosom.

He descended from the pulpit, and all met him to say their last farewell. For each one he had a kind and loving word; and there was not one who wept not his loss as that of a dear friend; the orphans wept the loss of a father; the widows a consoler; the young their guide and example.

He left us. The old parsonage was closed; the vines clambered untrained over the windows; the sweet-singing birds no longer wove their nests in the old trees; the garden beds were overgrown with tangled weeds, and the downy thistle bloomed where so lately sweet flowers upheld their lovely heads, weeping tears of early morning dew.

Months passed quickly by, and then came the sad yet joyful news, that our beloved pastor was now a bright angel, singing the sweet songs of heaven. O, how we wept when they told us that a strange hand wiped the death-damp from his brow; that no dear friend was with him to receive his last good-by; that the wide ocean was his grave; that the cold, dark wave was his pillow, and all that was earthly was gone forever!

We have had other pastors, and listened to other voices; but no voice was so sweet, and no heart has won our love, like that heart that is cold, and the voice that is silent in a watery grave.

We remembered the last words he spoke to us; and though our eyes would fill with tears, yet our hearts rejoiced; for as the sun shining on the falling rain-drops forms the bright rainbow, so the Sun of righteousness shed its rays on our tears of sorrow, and formed the brighter rainbow of hope.

HEARTS OF OAK.

GENEROSITY OF SAILORS.

IF generosity be the offspring of sympathy and unselfishness, we might well expect to find it strongly developed in the character of a seaman; for he is almost proverbially regardless of his own interests and full of consideration for the calamities of others.

Perhaps his intimacy with danger and want of forethought may render him forgetful of himself; perhaps his isolation from general society may make him ready to commiserate all the distressed. Of the propensity there can be no doubt.

"Why what's that to you if my eyes I'm wiping?

A tear is a pleasure, d'ye see, in its way;

'Tis nonsense for trifles, I own, to be piping,

But they that han't pity, why, I pity them.

Says the captain, says he—I shall never forget it—

If of courage you'd know, lads, the true from the sham,

'Tis a furious lion in battle, so let it,

But, duty appeased, 'tis in merriment a lamb."

There never yet was a true sailor in whose career we might not find some illustration of a virtue so characteristic of the profession, and so honorable to humanity. A few instances may be profitable and interesting to all of us.

On the 29th of December, 1807, the Anson, Captain Lydiard, was wrecked on the coast of Cornwall, about three miles from Helstone, and the Captain's generous self-devotion was seen to be equal to the valor which he had lately displayed in the reduction of Curacoa.

When the ship first struck all was confusion, and the roar of the tempest only mocked the noise of the falling masts and the shrieks of the women. But the voice of the Captain, as, self-possessed and undaunted, he issued his orders to the panic-struck crew, restored hope and created confidence. When the mainmast went overboard it formed, very providentially, a communication with the shore, by which Captain Lydiard encouraged his people to save themselves. Holding on by the wheel, he continued to cheer and direct them as they, one by one, essayed the dangerous passage; and anxiously he watched their happy success or their miserable failure. At last he was about to cross himself, when he was arrested by the cries of some one in the extremity of terror, and, proceeding to ascertain their origin, he found a boy, whom he had lately entered, clinging in despair to part of the wreck, without strength or energy to attempt his own deliverance. Captain Lydiard did not hesitate, for he was resolved that none should perish whom he could preserve. With one arm he held the boy, with the other he endeavored to support himself over the slippery and dangerous bridge by which he hoped to reach the shore. But his bodily strength, worn out as it had been by toil and anxiety, was not equal to the determination of his soul: the mast escaped from his hold, and the gallant and brave-hearted Lydiard shared a watery grave with the poor child he had so nobly attempted to rescue.

Many such examples of heroic self-sacrifice must occur to the minds of our readers; but among them, perhaps, none has surpassed the noble and determined devotion of Captain Charles Baker and the crew of his Majesty's brig Drake.

This ship was wrecked in a fog on the coast of Newfoundland, on the 20th of June, 1822. Scarcely was she aground before her condition was hopeless. The sea was so heavy that her boats were successively swamped or stove; and the best swimmer of the crew, who endeavored to take a line to the shore, was dragged back to the ship, exhausted by the violence of the waves; but Captain Baker and his men remained undaunted, and were, each one, ready to attempt any desperate enterprise for the safety of their companions. At length the boatswain succeeded in reaching the shore in the dingy—the only boat that would swim—which was, however, crushed against the rocks as he landed. While he was doing so, the wreck was driven near to a dry rock, and Captain Baker ordered the crew to take refuge on it, but he was obliged to reiterate his resolution of being the last to leave before he could induce any of these brave fellows to precede him. When they had all gained this temporary refuge they found themselves but a few yards from the mainland; but they also made the terrible discovery that their asylum would be covered at high water, and the waves were so boisterous that no man could hope to cross the narrow channel.

Still none showed a sign of fear or impatience; but the commander and his gallant band waited calmly for what seemed to them inevitable death. The boatswain now threw across to his comrades the rope which he had taken on shore, and there was another struggle among them, every man refusing to be saved till he had been commanded to go by the Captain. Forty-four thus landed; six remained on the rock, but one of these was a woman whose hardships had taken away all her energies. The next man to cross took her in his arms, and committed himself, thus burdened, to the rope; but that proved unequal to the increased strain, and neither of them reached the shore. The breaking of the rope deprived those who were left of all hope. In vain their friends on shore tied every available shred together to make a line; in vain they sought the nearest inhabitants for help; before they could return to the beach the waves rolled over the last refuge of Captain Baker and the remnant of his noble crew. Single individuals have before and since displayed similar generosity and heroism; but, perhaps, no body of men can be pointed out who have done greater honor to the name of seamen, or who have evinced more calmness, intrepidity, and self-devotion than the crew of his Majesty's brig Drake.

In those cases which we have mentioned we have seen men in a common danger disregarding themselves for the sake of their companions; it remains for us to give an instance of one, who was himself in safety, voluntarily risking his life to save those of his fellow-creatures.

We shall select an incident in the life of Sir Edward Pellew—afterward Lord Exmouth—when in command of the Indefatigable, which not only shows generosity and humanity, almost unparalleled, but is also calculated to teach us of how much value is the influence of a single decided and well-ordered mind in circumstances of danger and confusion.

In January, 1796, when the Indefatigable was lying in Hamoaze, the Dutton, a large East Indiaman, with part of the second regiment and many sick on board, was driven into Plymouth by stress of weather; and, in consequence of a buoy having broken adrift, came ashore under the citadel.

Sir Edward, accompanied by Lady Pellew, was on his way to dine with Dr. Hawker, the excellent vicar of Charles, when he noticed the crowds running to the Hoe; and, having learned the cause, he sprang out of the carriage and ran off with the rest. Arrived at the beach, he saw at once that the loss of nearly all on board, amounting to between five and six hundred, was almost inevitable. The captain had left the ship, on account of indisposition, the previous day; but the officers who were on board had succeeded in getting a hawser to the shore, by which some of the people had landed. This, however, was a slow and dangerous operation; for the rolling of the vessel as she lay broadside on in the surf, would sometimes jerk the rope high in the air, and then bury it beneath the waves. Every minute was of consequence, for night was approaching, and the wreck fast breaking up.

Sir Edward was anxious to send a message to the officers, and offered rewards to pilots and others on the beach to board the wreck; but when every one shrank from so dangerous a service, he exclaimed, "Then I will go myself." Availing himself of the hawser which communicated with the ship, he was hauled on board through the surf. The danger was greatly increased by the wreck of the masts, which had fallen toward the shore; and he received an injury on the back, which confined him to his bed for a week, in consequence of being dragged under the mainmast. But disregarding this at the time, he reached the deck, declared himself, and assumed the command. He assured the people that every one would be saved if they attended quietly to his directions; that he would himself be the last to quit the wreck, but that he would run any one through who disobeyed him. His well-known name, with the calmness and energy he displayed, gave confidence to the despairing multitude. He was received with three hearty cheers, which were echoed by the thousands on shore; and his promptitude at resource soon enabled him to find and apply the means by which all might be safely landed. The officers of the Indefatigable were in the mean time exerting themselves to bring assistance, although not aware of the position of their Captain. Lieutenant Pellew left the ship in the barge, and Mr. Thompson, acting master, in the launch; but the boats could not be brought along side the wreck, and were obliged to run for the Barbican. A small boat belonging to a merchant vessel was more fortunate. Mr. Edsell, signal midshipman to the Port Admiral, and Mr. Coghlan, mate of the vessel, succeeded, at the risk of their lives, in bringing her along side. The ends of two additional hawsers were got on shore, and Sir Edward contrived cradles to be slung upon them, with traveling ropes to pass forward and backward between the ship and the beach. Each hawser was held on shore by a number of men, who watched the rolling of the ship and kept the ropes tight and steady. Meanwhile, a cutter had with great difficulty worked out of Plymouth port, and two large boats arrived from the Dockyard under the directions of Mr. Hemmings, the master-attendant, by whose caution and judgment they were enabled to approach the wreck, and receive the more helpless of the passengers, who were carried to the cutter. Sir Edward, with his sword drawn, directed the proceedings, and preserved order—a task the more difficult, as the soldiers before he came on board had got at the spirits and many were drunk. The children, the women, and the sick were first landed. One of them was only three weeks old, and nothing in the whole transaction impressed Sir Edward more strongly than the struggle of the mother's feelings before she would intrust her infant to his care, or afforded him more pleasure than the success of his attempt to save it. Next the soldiers were got on shore, and then the ship's company, Sir Edward himself being one of the last to leave. Every one was saved, and presently after the wreck went to pieces.—Excelsior.

MISSIONARY SEWING SOCIETIES.

BY REV. L. A. EDDY.

IN the glorious revival of interest in the cause of missions within the last quarter of a century, it is not easy to estimate the indebtedness of the Church to female influence. Not only in this country, but every-where in Christendom, it is, and has long been observable, that when a missionary meeting is called woman is the first to respond to that call. When money is needed for such purposes, it is woman that is most ready to lay aside her domestic cares, forego her personal interests, and visit from house to house to collect funds. When needle or other work is called for to meet a special emergency, no obstacle not absolutely insuperable is sufficient to prevent her from promptly supplying the demand.

More thrilling examples of moral heroism in the enterprise of missions are recorded of devoted females than of the other sex. Much has been said in praise of the Spartan mother, who, buckling the war armor on her son, charged him as he started for the battle-field "either to bring back his shield, or be brought back upon it;" but how much more noble and morally sublime was the answer of the widowed mother of the missionary Lyman, when the dreadful intelligence reached her that her son had been most cruelly murdered and eaten by the cannibal Battas: "I bless God who gave me such a son to go to the heathen; and I never felt so strongly as I do at this moment the desire that others of my sons may become missionaries also, and may go and preach salvation to those savage men who have drank the blood of my son!" Search the history of missions since the days of the apostles, and you will doubtless look in vain for a more illustrious example of devotion to this cause than that related by Rev. J. A. James.

He observed that at a missionary meeting in his congregation among the contributors a youth of sixteen years came forward to enroll his name. When requested to state how much he wished to subscribe, he replied, with some diffidence, "Myself." He was the eldest son of an unfortunate widow, to whom seven other children looked for support. The proffer of the young man could not be received without the mother's consent. It was scarcely to be expected that her eldest son would be yielded up for the missionary service, when his exertions might soon prove useful to his widowed parent in her indigent circumstances. "Let him go," was the prompt response of the devoted mother; "God will provide for me and my babes; and who am I that I should be thus honored to have a son a missionary to the heathen!" In the prize essay of Mr. Harris on missions, it is further stated that this son, after laboring a short time in India, died, when the second son felt it his duty to walk in the footsteps of his brother. This was a new trial of the mother's faith and zeal; but her ready reply was, "Let William follow Joseph, though it be to India and an early grave."

It is, indeed, fitting that woman should excel in efforts for the propagation of Christianity. Not only is she naturally endowed with a more sympathizing heart, and susceptible of more tender regard for the wants and woes of others, but, if possible, she owes more to Christianity than the other sex; and, hence, it is not strange that her love for that religion which has done so much for females should be stronger. She is not ignorant of the fact that every-where Pagan habitations are emphatically habitations of cruelty to woman. She knows that in uncivilized countries the depth of female degradation, and the intensity of her sufferings from lordly tyranny, and the prejudices and customs of societies, are in proportion to the density of Pagan darkness; and that in more enlightened lands woman is appreciated, and her God-given rights and position in society are recognized, just in proportion to the abundance and brilliancy of Gospel light diffused through that community.

It is not, however, merely for the elevation and moral improvement of her own sex that woman toils in the work of evangelism. But disdaining all mere selfish or sexual considerations, she manifests her gratitude for what the Gospel has done for her by untiring zeal, and by taxing her ingenuity to aid in the enlightenment and salvation of all sorts and conditions of men. And among the measures devised to ameliorate the condition of the degraded and unfortunate, it is not possible to estimate fully the value of those humble instrumentalities called "sewing societies."

In calling attention briefly to the utility of these industrial associations, I am aware that doubts have repeatedly been expressed of their usefulness. Perhaps these doubts have in part arisen from occasional abuses of similar gatherings. It must, indeed, be admitted that unless the object aimed at in such efforts be in itself praiseworthy and important, unless the religious element deeply pervade the meetings, unless simplicity and economy be exhibited in the arrangements for the entertainment of the company, and vigilance be observed to prevent the intrusion of unprofitable conversation, such meetings, instead of being beneficial, will be productive of positive mischief.

In glancing at a few of the benefits of sewing societies, I mention, first, an advantage common to all benevolent associations; namely, that arising from a concentration of individual influence in a given direction. If the homely maxim, "Two heads are better than one," is true, it is still more obvious that the union of twenty or thirty heads is better than two. As the collision of different sentiments often strike out sparks of truth, so the mutual interchange of thought and outgushing of sympathy in behalf of any noble enterprise enlarges our conception of such labor of love, and inflames our zeal in its prosecution. It is in accordance with this law of the human mind that deliberative assemblies have from time immemorial been instituted; that social worship was divinely established; and those who fear the Lord are taught to speak often one to another. Indeed, the question admits of no dispute whether twenty ladies, however benevolently disposed, acting utterly independently of each other, would be likely to hit upon as sagacious plans, and produce in the course of the year an aggregate of means to bless the needy, equal to the benefactions of the same number accustomed to meet often together for mutual counsel and encouragement.

Secondly. Valuable pecuniary results are often reached by these organizations that could not otherwise be realized. There are many ladies who can spend an afternoon each week or fortnight in needle-work, the net value of which will be at least three dollars per annum, but who could do little or nothing unless their labor is made available. Thus thousands of dollars, or their equivalent, are annually realized as the aggregate fruit of such humble and unostentatious combinations of industry. Thus, also, the luxury of giving is placed within the reach of the poor as well as the rich; and if the reward of beneficence is in proportion not to the intrinsic value of the gift, but the personal sacrifice incurred by the donor, no class of persons experience more glorious proof of the truth of the saying, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," than earnest workers in these sewing societies.

By these associations multitudes of sufferers have been supplied with food, and raiment, and the bread of eternal life, that otherwise would have perished. Whole neighborhoods of misery and crime have been transformed into communities of comfort and abodes of peace; and many an indigent young man, battling unsuccessfully with poverty in preparing for the ministry, has triumphed over every obstacle, and become a burning and shining light in the world, by the timely aid of a humble band of female disciples with their needles. In numerous instances, also, embarrassed Churches have been relieved, and a blessed career of prosperity secured, which church, to the disgrace of religion and the triumph of malignant spirits, would have been utterly abandoned, but for the indomitable zeal of angels of mercy, who, with no other lever than the needle, lifted them from the slough of bankruptcy and ruin.

Thirdly. The reflex benefits of these societies upon their own membership and the community should be especially noted. I do not refer now particularly to their obvious tendency to repress narrow and selfish feelings, and arouse and keep alive a spirit of enlarged philanthropy, but to their manifest tendency to promote Christian union in the neighborhood where they are in operation—to extend Christian sympathy and influence in irreligious families. Nor is this all. As the rich and poor here meet on a common level, and freely converse and labor together, the effect is to subdue any predisposition to aristocratic ambition on the one hand, and cure all morbid inclinations to the indulgence of an envious spirit on the other. Happy, indeed, is that neighborhood where all the professed disciples of Christ, whether learned or illiterate, rich or poor, often associate together on terms of Christian equality to promote a common object; where factitious distinctions are unknown, and not the slightest indication can be detected either of overbearing pride or green-eyed jealousy. I admit that if the disposition exist, it is not impossible to keep up a spirit of caste and favoritism even in such gatherings. By taking some pains, "birds of a feather may flock together" even here, and whisper exclusively with the few instead of striving to be agreeable and useful to the many; but such conduct is so sadly at variance with the common rules of decency, to say nothing of Christian courtesy, that it is hoped there are very few places where a word of caution on this point is necessary.

It should not be forgotten, that to obtain all the benefits from these circles of industry, it is particularly advisable to include the young as well as elderly ladies. Indeed, a sewing society convened without the enlivening presence of youthful females is considered almost as defective in moral beauty as a domestic circle in which prattling infants have no place. The young should participate in these labors of love, not only in view of the importance of forming early habits of systematic beneficence, avoiding improper associations, and giving their attention to less laudable pursuits, but in view also of the influence exerted by this class of laborers upon every other department of society. Who has not observed that in whatever enterprise young ladies are heartily enlisted is seldom viewed with indifference by the aged, and never by young men? Hence, that pastor is to be pitied for his stupidity who has not learned that one valuable secret of ministerial success is the securance, by laudable means, of the hearty co-operation of this class of his parishioners. Woe to the clergyman who once gets the ill-will of the intelligent and enterprising young ladies of his congregation! When he has rendered himself unacceptable to this class, he has, in most cases, closed the avenue to all hearts; and there is no alternative but to ask for a dismissal, take up his staff, and start off on a candidating itinerancy.

In fine, such organizations are of special utility in a community, as they serve to draw the attention of every class to the great truths which many in this mammon-worshipping age are apt to forget, that "no man liveth to himself," and that in proportion as the claims of God's poor are met by liberal efforts for their relief, in the same proportion—nay, in a hundred-fold greater proportion—are blessings returned to the donor from Him who has declared that even a cup of cold water imparted to the needy shall not pass unnoticed or unrewarded. That "God takes care of those who care for his suffering poor," is proven not only by the numerous promises made in behalf of those who honor God with their substance, and the natural tendency of benevolent habits to secure home prosperity in general, but by the obvious practical influence of a well-organized, intelligent, and large-hearted system of public beneficence upon the immediate community in which such plan is carried out.

Allow me, in conclusion, to remark, that the above thoughts owe their origin to a deeply interesting gathering last summer which I had the privilege of attending, about two miles south of the village of Cazenovia, N. Y. It was a general meeting, in a beautiful orchard, of the sewing societies of Cazenovia station for social intercourse and religious improvement. Two large tents had been erected—one of which was fitted up for a temporary chapel, and the other as a dining-hall. As the different sewing circles, though living in separate neighborhoods, had been laboring chiefly for a common object—"The Five Points Mission"—it was thought peculiarly fitting, with their companions and children, to hold a general festival, and thus celebrate the anniversary of our national independence. Appropriate addresses were delivered by four ministers, when the company, consisting of nearly two hundred persons, partook of a bountiful repast provided by the society in the immediate vicinity of this little camp meeting. The company then returned to the chapel tent, and the whole was closed by a very delightful and profitable love-feast and prayer meeting.

APRIL.

BY MRS. M. C. BOWMAN.

HAIL, thrice hail, to joyous April
Nature proudly greets thee Queen;
See the jeweled, silver maple,
And the lawns in robes of green,
Golden sunbeams, genial showers,
Warbling birds on bush and spray;
Verdant meadows, woodland bowers,
Blooming now on April day—
Think thou not that sweet spring flowers
All belong to boasting May.

See the peach's rosy blossom
And the plum with petals white,
Twining wreaths to grace thy bosom,
Showing forth their glad delight:
All performing pleasant duties—
Flowers sweet, in varied tints,
Violets blue and sweet spring beauties,
Daffodils and hyacinths.

But infant buds, now young and tender,
Fed and nurtur'd by thy hand,
Ere their grateful fruits shall render
Thou wilt be in Fairy-land.

Many are the charms thou bringest,
Ere we see thee pass away;
Then thy mantle kindly flingest
O'er thy younger sister May.

GHOST STORIES.

BY ALICE CARY.

NUMBER III.

OF all the delusions that cheat us out of happiness, a good time, placed by many persons in some indefinite period of the future, is the most delusive of all.

Aside from the terrible necessities of pain and death, to which we are every moment alike liable, all times shape themselves to our actions, and that is the best time which is consecrated to good thoughts, or words, or works. The habit of sacrificing daily the pleasant things in our reach, or of pushing them from us into the dark, in the hope that some future daybreak will shine upon them, is a great and fatal mistake. The happiness so put away will never return to us with the freshness and beauty that charmed us at the first; but if by chance it drift across our way again, we shall find it battered and worn, as it were; but likeliest we shall never see it any more; under some black cloud, and beneath some sudden wave it will have found shipwreck in the great waste to which we have trusted it—the gray surges will have run together where it went down, and our searches for what was a reality will be a season of heaviness and mourning, which we might well have spared ourselves.

But even if we should, as is sometimes the case, meet again the joys that we have sailed away from with determinedness to add thereby to some future enjoyment, it would be as though men and women should have their dolls, and kites, and marbles given back into their hands. The corner-stone will not fit in the capital, and the sill will make but a clumsy rafter. Just as truly as there is a time for every thing, so surely is there a thing for every time, and the thing for one time can be but illy jointed to another time. Childhood has its idle hands, its freedom from care, its improvidence, its sleep, and its laughter; youth has its light work, its pretty dalliance with hope, its eager zest of pleasure, its love, and its crown of love—marriage; maturer life has its more earnest quest of knowledge, its more solid achievement, and its more solemn joy; age its resting from labor, its farther-reaching vision, and its more steadfast faith, and in their time all these provisions are beautiful. Let the prattle of little children gladden the heart of the old man as he sits with his eyes fixed on the land he expects ere long to make, and let the young men and young women, for whom he has toiled, work for him in turn, nor seek to displace the baby glee with the temperate enjoyments or the soberer serenity of riper years—all are beautiful in their time.

I do not mean to commend greediness, but a sensible and wise appropriation of the good gifts of God is, I believe, acceptable to him; for has he not made them and given them for our use?

The story I have to tell seems to me to illustrate this procrastination of enjoyment. About a year ago, as I was going through one of the New York markets, my attention was attracted by the pleasant countenance and tidy appearance of an old woman who kept a little stall outside the market-house.

Her clean apron and cheerful face led me to examine her store of vegetables, which I found nicely prepared and of the best quality; and on making some purchases I found that for the same articles she demanded less than her neighbors.

But over and above the pleasant face and the moderate prices demanded, there was an agreeable impression left on my mind for which I could not account.

The next market day I found her again, and the next again. So, by degrees, we formed a kind of market acquaintance, alike advantageous and agreeable. She supplied me with all necessities in her line, and I never found reason to regret any purchase I made of her. Some part of the best of whatever she sold, cabbage or strawberries, potatoes or beans, she invariably reserved for herself and her boy, Frederick, who carried home for her customers whatever they bought of her. An intelligent, black-eyed little fellow was Frederick, performing with cheerful alacrity his various duties, and finding always some bright spot in every thing.

He in no way resembled his mother, as I supposed the pleasant market-woman to be, both from the fact that he was always with her, and from her invariable gentleness toward him. One day when he had an extra large basket to carry home for me I gave him an extra sixpence, and the sunshine that laughed in his face contrasted unusually with the staid serenity of the woman; and on remarking it, she told me he was not her child, nor in any way related to her; that they had chanced to fall in with one another in the journey of life, and should probably continue together as long as they lived.

But I need not detail all the particulars of our ripening acquaintance; suffice that I came to know the name of the market-woman, which was Peggy Butler; that she lived in rooms in ——— street, with the boy Fred as her housemate and helpmate; that she had never been married—had no wealth but her health and industry, and no friends but such casual ones as her exemplary conduct made her among her patrons.

Of the boy I learned nothing; for after having been informed that their ways had chanced to come together, I made no inquiry, and only as his obedience, good-humor, and active industry showed him to be, did I think of him. Indeed, the cradle that rocked him and the future into which he was hastening, had never engaged a moment of my time till one morning at the accustomed stall I found aunt Peggy, as Fred designated her, alone.

There was an anxious look in her face, and a hurried disposal of fruits and vegetables that told me all was not right; and on inquiry I learned that little Freddy had been run over by a fine carriage the evening previous, and was lying at home alone, maimed and bruised, the extent of his injuries not yet known. All that day I kept thinking of the lad, wondering how badly he was hurt, and whether he would recover, or if he died, how he would be buried and where; for in some sort the boy had endeared himself to me, and I went over mentally all my acquaintance with him—how sometimes I had seen him without shoes of frosty mornings, and at other times swaying from side to side of the path under a burden too heavy for him. Much of our talk together came back to me, and I found a precocious wisdom, on his part, in the memory of it, which, till then, had never impressed me. As we always do, I kept hoping the accident was not so serious as aunt Peggy feared, and so the day went by and the night. I went early to the market in the morning, but the stall was empty, and each picture I tried to make of a boy, with a shining face, was displaced by the white and settled look of death. A walk of a mile in the sharp air of a November morning brought me to the lodgings of the stricken Peggy Butler. They were not in a nice, open street, and entered by a broad flight of steps and ample and well-lighted hall, but access was had to them through crooked and narrow streets, where the gutters were choked with thick, stagnant water, and pots, and barrels, and baskets of decayed and decaying refuse, making all the air heavy and unwholesome. Many carts stood along the side-walks, and cellars with open windows, partly above ground, neighbored each other, through the apertures and windows of which the noses of cows and horses were thrust; dirty children, to be counted by hundreds, swarmed along the filthy side-walks—some with red gluey eyes, some with crooked legs, some with mouth askew, and some with heads having the appearance of mange dogs—quarreling, crying, paddling in the gutters, or pushing each other to and fro in sorry attempts at play. Women that seemed to have lost all gentle attributes of womanhood, screeched or growled their displeasure from over their washing-tubs along the alleys or from stitching benches at the windows. Houses miserably old, and crowded from top to bottom—as appeared by the white-faced men and women who crept up from under ground to see or feel the sunshine, and the many night-caps at the garret windows—leaned against each other, or stood wedged together, and seeming to have sunken half their original dimensions in the ground. Among these I noticed one habitation, a little more substantial than the rest, having an area about the basement for the admission of light, and the wooden steps leading to the battered door washed clean. Having rapped on the upper door in vain I descended to the basement, where I noticed, beside the entrance, a sign of “fashionable dress-making,” and in the window two or three glass jars, one containing a few sticks of candy, another some spools of coarse cotton, and the third in part filled with cucumber pickles, in the bottom of which the dead flies had settled to the depth of an inch, and over which was a coating of white mold. The window contained also a pound or two of tallow candles, melted and stuck together, some bars of yellow soap, two boxes of “pearl powder,” and a side of ribby smoked pork. The door was opened by a young woman with a very slender waist, decayed teeth, thin hair, patched out above either ear and kept so by a quantity of white wadding, and having a greasy silk skirt adorned with flounces of a violently contrasting color. I caught a glimpse of a baby—sitting on a rag-carpet that was glazed and trodden into one smooth and shining surface—having a little mouse-colored hair near the back of the neck, and the top of the head coated with what resembled bran and ashes—this little creature was amusing itself with a couple of uncooked pigs' feet, or legs rather; and of an old woman, the tags of whose petticoat dangled about her ankle as she punched the fire with her foot, for she seemed to be tending a kettle in which was a quantity of meat boiling; and I noticed she worked her mouth in anticipation of the feast, as a pair of calf's eyes looked out upon her from the cloud of steam. The young lady closed the door abruptly, and without answering my inquiry, on learning that I required no fashionable dress-making, and I had recourse to the upper door again, almost assured that Peggy Butler was a resident of the house.

This time my summons was immediately answered by a middle-aged mulatto woman. She held in her apron some clean-smelling linen, which she seemed to have just brought from the line. A bright ring glittered on one finger and showy earrings dangled below her turban, showing her altogether to be neither poverty-stricken nor untidy.

She put down the bundle of washed clothes and led the way up the narrow stairs, carpetless, but scoured white almost as the lime-washed wall, and pointing to the near door with a smile, as though she had received a service, descended with a propriety and quietude which showed me that she possessed that inimitable something before education and above education, and without which the highest cultivation is but imitation after all.

I afterward found my first impression quite correct, and Caty Smith proved to be not only an excellent washer and ironer, but also a model of amiability and polite manners.

Aunt Peggy met me at the door, the tears in her blue eyes and the patient smile quite gone from her lips. She had not been at the market that day, she told me, and she didn't feel as if she should ever care to go there again; if she had no body to work for nor to care for, what was the use? I tried to cheer her, but at best I am a poor comforter; and I no sooner looked upon little Freddy than I knew she had not overestimated his perilous condition. It was not the arm tied straight in splinters, nor the bandaged forehead, nor yet the sunken eyes; but an indefinable expression and seeming that told me he was lying very near to death. He was in no pain; that was all past, and with quickened spiritual apprehension foreseeing the end, he lay calm as an infant rocking to sleep. He smiled when he saw me; said he was glad I was come, for that he could not talk much now, and aunt Peggy was lonesome. I told him I hoped he would be well in a few days and make her company again. He said he would like to get well to work for her, for that his true mother could not have been kinder to him than she had been; but that he was not so much afraid of death as he had been of the dark night many a time, and now that his arm was so hurt that he could not carry the basket, it was better he should go where there were no baskets to carry; and seeing how distressed aunt Peggy was, he called her to the bedside and asked her who it was that watched with him before I came. She answered no one had been there but good Caty Smith; but the boy assured her with great earnestness that waking out of sleep at daylight there sat by the bedside a young man, whom he described very minutely—the color of his hair, his garments, and even the ring which he wore on his left hand. Peggy Butler seemed startled at the description, the tears dried up in her eyes, and questioning him further on the supposition, as I supposed, that she knew who the young man must have been, the answers corresponded in every particular with her suggestions. "Strange, strange," she repeated, when the child concluded by saying the young man spoke not at all, but smiled sweetly and often, and as he looked on him seemed to vanish away, and it was only light where he had been. "Strange, strange," and she fell to weeping more bitterly than before. The boy put his arm about her neck, and drawing down her face kissed her, and saying, "Don't cry, O don't cry!" fell asleep, and never woke any more; for while he slept the angel, of which he was not afraid, stole him away very softly.

The noonday sunshine came into the room and lay on his pillow, and good Caty cut from her own flower-pot all the blossoms it had and laid them on his bosom, and having whispered some words to Peggy, tied on a brave orange turban, and went away.

I kept my place at the bedside, though the need was all past, while the bereaved woman walked wildly up and down the room, wringing her hands and moaning piteously. In about an hour Caty returned, and shortly after a stout old gentleman, accompanied by a hearse and a fine coffin—little Freddy was laid in it and carried away. When Peggy had in part subdued the violence of her grief, and while Caty, who seemed to be her friend and confident, went quietly about putting the house in order and out of view the coat, and hat, and other things that had been Freddy's, she uncovered her eyes, and, as some sad solace for her grief, told me the story of her life.

She had lived in the country when a child, and grown to be a woman there, and all the brightest memories of her life were connected with briery hedges and green hay-fields, meadow-runs and orchards, and the fresh-smelling furrows of newly-plowed fields: there her good mother had lived and died—there her brothers and sisters had grown from playmates to workmates, and so to men and women, and had found other mates and made themselves new homes, where, with children about them, some of them were living still, old men and women now.

"But there is one thing," she said, "which more than all the rest endears my past life to me, and at the same time keeps me from returning to it: I had a lover once—he is buried there."

After a few minutes she went on, "When he died it seemed to me I could not live there any longer. I thought to get away from myself, but the experience of twenty years has shown me how foolish any such attempt is. Work and the little good I have had it in my power to do, have been all my solace."

"If your brothers and sisters are still living," I said, "it seems to me it would be for your comfort to return to them."

She shook her head mournfully and answered, "No; I should have been happy but for them. Joseph Williams was the son of a well-to-do neighboring farmer—healthful and full of hope and courage—generous and cheerful, ready always to give up his own plans and prospects for the pleasure of others, and yet to laugh all the same and not to appear to have any thoughts for himself at all; so by degrees every body came to think Joseph had no wishes of his own, and the more he did the more it seemed was expected of him, till he scarcely had any privileges or pleasures at all. We saw each other sometimes, and loved each other a great deal, but my brothers and sisters would not hear of our marriage. 'He has not an acre of land,' they said, 'and what are you to do—live in a hut and come home to father to get petticoats for your children?' Even his good qualities they turned against the young man, saying, 'Why did he not work for himself and accumulate something, and not stay drudging for his father, who already had enough.' And often when we could hear him whistle or sing across the fields they would say, Jo was wasting his time and trying to make Peggy hear how well he could whistle or sing, and that he would be a long time in felling a tree if he minded tunes so much. But for my part I could never see that his whistling and singing hindered his work at all; for there was never a young man in the neighborhood that could plow or chop with him, and as for horses, he could manage a team or ride with the best of them. But at last my folks would not see any good thing in him at all, and would repeat all his enemies said about him in my hearing, adding their own coarse comments, as though he were no more to me than to them. This was all hard to bear, but I said never a word, still loving him all the same in spite of their talk. Years and years went by so, for Joseph's father was a man greedy of gain, and desirous above all things that his son should marry a woman who had money or land; and when Joseph said that he would never marry any body but me, he put the time away and away, and though he did not positively say it should not be, the blessed day seemed never to come the nearer.

Joseph must stay with him till another field was paid for, and when that was done till a new fence was made, then till more cows were bought, then the house must be painted, and when that was done he had not house enough, and so from one thing to another it went, for it appeared that the more the old man got the more he wanted. At last the fall of the year came that Joseph was twenty-eight years old and I twenty-five. Often and often he would have broken away from every thing and married me, but still all the long years I said no, for my brothers sneered and my sisters called me selfish to love another better than them, and I had all the while hoped that a better time would come, and, indeed, it seemed a little nearer, for my sisters, without ever asking my pleasure, or thinking of it once, were married to please themselves; my brothers, too, had chosen mates, and though none of them seemed any more willing than formerly that I should marry Joseph, still I felt less obliged to sacrifice my own wish now than I used to feel. Every body began to call me an old maid, and my own folks would rally me and ask why I did not marry this one and that, just as if Joseph were not in the world. The fall, as I said, was come; old Mr. Williams was called a rich man, and had at last consented to our marriage, for he did not dislike me except that I was poor—Joseph had a new cart painted bright, and a horse of his own—and had promised him half the profits of the next year's crop. His father had a purse full of money in the desk, but said his son must earn for himself, as if he had not earned all that was called his father's, or nearly all.

"One day when I sat scheming about our future happiness, one of my brothers came in and said carelessly, 'That scamp of a fellow, Jo Williams, gets worse and worse. He is too lazy to whistle now;' and as I said nothing he continued, 'he is lying across on the next hill sunning himself like a black snake.'

"I would not listen to more, but tying on my bonnet went right to the field where he was, for I knew at once that he was ill, else he would not have been lying on the ground. I was not mistaken; his face was burning hot and his eyes looked heavy and dull, and though he tried to laugh and say it was nothing, I knew better and feared he would be very sick. We talked a long time to each other of our love and of the time when we should be married; but at length he said he must plow again, for that a part of the crop he was about to sow was to be his, or ours, as he said, with a smile. I tried to dissuade him, for I knew he was not well enough to work; but he would not admit it, and went to work again the same as though he were ever so strong.

"All the rest of the day I was very miserable, often going up to the garret and looking across the hill to see if still he kept at work, and each time I saw him, though I did not hear him whistle, and it seemed to me he walked with feeble steps. My dreams were troubled that night, and I slept little; when, however, the sun came up, it seemed to shine so brightly I thought no one could be sick, and for a while kept about the house thinking of the time I was to have a house of my own. I was afraid to go up stairs to see whether Joseph were in the field, but kept trying to think he was, till I could endure the suspense no longer. He was not to be seen; the plow was in the furrow and only half the field broken up. I shaded my eyes and looked long and earnestly every-where I had ever seen him, but all seemed lonesome and as if something was wrong; his young horse stood near the door-yard leaning his head toward the house, as if looking for his master, and I could see no sign of cheerfulness any where. Twenty times that day I left my work and went to the upper window, but saw nothing to encourage me. Night came, long and miserable enough, and morning, which seemed no better. I dare not go to inquire, for it would have been thought a very immodest thing, and so I suffered, O so much, all that day and night, and the next and the next, and for more than a week, when one of my brothers told me, as though it were a mere matter of news, that Jo Williams had caught cold lying on the grass and was not expected to live.

"I could not have the mournful comfort of crying; but it seemed to me as I went about the house that my heart was bleeding itself all away. No one pitied me, and no one sympathized with me; but the same duties were expected, and the same cheerfulness as ever.

"At length one night came word that Joseph was very bad and had sent for me, and, mindless of the darkness and the rain that was falling, I went as fast as I could. He was so changed I would not have known him but for the smile, which was just the same. He told me not to leave him again; said he should not need me long. 'He didn't blame any body,' he said; 'but if he had taken more rest as he went along, the rest that knew no breaking would not have come to him so soon.'

"I had not been by him long when he complained of being cold, and when I pressed his hands close to my bosom he smiled and said they were warm enough; and so they were, for he never knew any thing after that. The next day we buried him; his coffin was carried in his own little cart; and when I could not hear him speak nor see him smile any more, I wished I, too, might die and be laid by him, but death would not come for all my calling, and by and by the thought came to me that any where would be better than the place that constantly reminded me of him; so, under pretense of visiting a distant relative of our family, I came to this great city, ignorant of every thing that was esteemed most by my relations.

"I need not disguise the truth, they were rich and proud, and," she hesitated, and after a moment added, "not such people as I had been used to at home. There was a young lady in the family who looked down upon me more than the rest, if that were possible, treating me always as though I was made of something else than flesh and blood, never speaking to me unless to order me to wait upon her in some way. This treatment I would not once have borne, but now my spirit was broken, and I cared for nothing save to have a place to stay while I should live, where nothing would remind me of my lost hopes. So I told my relations I would stay in the kitchen with the servants and assist in the house work if they would allow me something to wear and eat.

"I scarce went above the basement from month to month, so I do not know whether it were true or not, but it was told us that Miss Sophia—that was the name of the haughty young lady—was gone from home. I had reasons for believing that she was concealed in the house; I said nothing, and my suspicion was not dreamed of by any one. One day my relation, the person who came to-day and carried away little Freddy, asked me if I would not like to keep house by myself, and go into some little business of my own, talking very kindly with me, and saying it grieved him to employ me as a menial, and that he would assist me to such sum as I should require. Joseph had always delighted in a garden, and for that reason more than for any other, I engaged in my present employment. I had not been a fortnight in my new home, which was at first very comfortable, even pretty, when a loud ring surprised me one night, and on opening the door I found a basket containing a baby. I took it in, of course, and early the following morning, as if quite by accident, my relative called to see me; and though he had never loved children, and was not given to liberality, insisted on my keeping the baby, offering to assist me till the boy grew of years to work for me."

She was prevailed upon, and the old man kept his word for several years, but his visits grew fewer and his assistance less and less, till finally she was left dependent upon herself, and with little Fred, as she called the foundling, not large enough to assist her. She had now a hard struggle, and was forced to go from one place to another, each time finding her home a little less comfortable, till at last she had taken rooms where I found her, and where Frederick, just beginning to help work and make company for her, was taken away.

It was the carriage and horses of the person I saw that ran over the boy, as he was hurriedly crossing the street in the dark: "And so it is," said Peggy, "the sins of the fathers are visited on the children." That it was the ghost of her lost Joseph the dying boy had seen, Peggy had no doubt. It seemed to her, she said, that she had heard from him out of heaven, and from the fancy, if it were a fancy, she derived the greatest satisfaction.

Poor little Freddy! I knew then nor ever nothing more of his history, but troubling fancies helped me to account for the rich man's helping Peggy to a home, and for his giving the dead orphan burial. Heaven grant that he may have found a father, and forgive those, whoever they were, who added the sin of abandonment to the sin that was before.

While Peggy was telling me the story of her life and that of her orphan charge, Caty had been moving softly about, making no obtrusive remarks and offering no officious consolation; and now that the working was done, she lighted the candle, for the night was come, and taking from the shelf a Bible read, "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." And so in that humble room I left the women together, seeking consolation in the shadow of that Rock to which, some time or other, if we will not voluntarily go, we are driven for consolation. Blessed are they by whom that time is not put off.

GO TO GOD.

WHEN perils overhang your estate or your children; when disease and death threaten to dissolve your dearest ties; when false affection blights your hopes; when the burdens of life press you; when trifles vex you—go to God. When you think of your sins; when you feel the motion of your indwelling corruptions; when you fluctuate between hope and fear touching the question of your spiritual adoption—go to God. Go—and tell your troubles. Go—cast your care upon him.

EMPLOYMENT OF LITTLE CHILDREN IN HEAVEN.

AS every ransomed and glorified spirit will have its appropriate employment in heaven, it has often been asked—on what will little children be everlastingly engaged?—what sphere, or rank, will they occupy in the realms of light?

"An infant's soul—the sweetest thing on earth,
To which endowments beautiful are given,
As might befit a more than mortal birth—
What shall it be, when midst its winning mirth,
And love, and trustfulness, 'tis borne to heaven?
Will it grow into might above the skies—
A spirit of high wisdom, glory, power—
A cherub-guard of the eternal Tower,
With knowledge fill'd of its vast mysteries?
Or will perpetual childhood be its dower—
To sport forever, a bright, joyous thing,
Amid the wonders of the shining thrones
Yielding its praise in glad and treble tones,
A tender dove beneath the Almighty's wing?"

Nothing is said directly on this subject in Divine revelation: something, however, may be drawn inferentially from inspired and celestial representation.

The principal employment of the blessed in heaven—which constitutes no small portion of its conceivable beatitude—is that of worship and adoration. "And they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." Rev. iv, 8. In the Apocalypse we are frequently taught that each glorified spirit will have a particular sphere appointed him, and each will be engaged on that particular employment which is congenial to that sphere; consequently, little children will occupy a sphere peculiar to themselves. We can not tell by what process their latent powers will be drawn out, expanded, and elevated, to meet celestial requirement. Those checks and obstructions which impede the development and action of the powers of the mind on earth, will be unknown and unfelt in heaven. And who can tell how readily and completely the mind will then burst forth, like the bud under the bright and warm rays of the sun, into an astonishing beauty and vigor? Where there are no barriers, that immortal principle of our being must unfold its noble powers at once, and exert itself with a freedom and enthusiasm which would throw into the shade the proudest and brightest earthly philosopher. As little children are eminently fitted to take a conspicuous part in the everlasting services of the celestial sanctuary, we reasonably conclude that they will be chiefly engaged, with others, in hymning, with glowing rapture, the wonders of redeeming love. They will sustain in heaven a position similar to the young sons of the Levites in the Hebrew temple, who entered the court of the priests with their fathers, that their small, shrill voices might relieve the deep bass of the senior singers. They throng the inner courts of "the temple of God," and are nearest the throne of the "King of Glory." There will be a full choir of redeemed voices, and there will be a perfectly harmonious diapason in the immortal anthem chanted in the ear of the Most High. If the largest band in heaven will be composed of little children—as we believe it will—then the major part of the celestial choristers will be little infants. They will take the treble part of "the new song before the throne." The sweetest and the loudest notes in the concordant symphony of the skies will issue from infant harps and infant voices. Their melody will be so perfect and transporting that listening seraphs will be struck with rapt wonderment, and charmed by its deep, thrilling cadence! They will derive new joy and rapture from the songs of little children in heaven! And O, how sweet to the ear—how ravishing to the heart of Jesus—will be the sound of infant voices around his throne! In the days of his flesh they gladly joined the enthusiastic multitude who cheered him on his way from Mount Olivet to the city of Jerusalem, and sang, "Hosanna to the Son of David." And when the excited procession reached the Temple, their shrill voices were heard above the rest, magnifying "the King of Glory." Their sweet music, and juvenile enthusiasm, were then pleasing to the heart of the Savior: how much more so will they be in heaven! Though the anthem peal of salvation will be "as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of great thunder," coming from the voices of "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands," yet, clear and distinct above the rest—as the overwhelming song swells and fills the arches of the heavenly temple—will be heard the shrill, sweet voices of redeemed young children!

ODDITIES OF HOMER AND VIRGIL.

HOMER, it is said, had such an aversion to natural music, that he could never be prevailed on to walk along the banks of a murmuring brook; nevertheless, he sang his own ballads, though not in the character of a mendicant, as recorded by Zoilus.

Virgil was so fond of salt, that he seldom went without a box full in his pocket, which he made use of from time to time, as men of the present day use tobacco.

NATURE.

BY MRS. SARAH M. GEARNHART.

I LOVE her in her artless dress,
Untrimmed by man, unsoiled by sin;
She hath a power to charm and bless;
She hath a power to woo and win.

I love her in the quiet vale—
The cool cascade and deep ravine;
I love her when she drives the gale,
And rides along in stately mien.

I love her in the swelling bud—
The evergreen and autumn leaves;
I love her in the foaming flood,
And where the day with darkness weaves.

I love her on the mountain's brow;
Her robe the sky, the sun her shield;
I love her when she deigns to bow
And kiss the blossoms of the field.

I love her in her garb of light,
Presiding o'er the busy earth;
I love her in her mourning night,
The stars her brilliant diamond-girth.

I love her with a fond delight—
Her winning smiles, her sighs and tears;
All, all are beautiful and bright—
The gems that deck succeeding years.

THE DEAD MOCKING-BIRD.

BY MRS. A. L. RUTER DUFOUR.

Poor Harry! life to thee was warm and bright,
A sunny sky where e'er a shadow fell;
A strain of music rich, and pure, and sweet,
As the soft echoes of an ocean-shell.

Thy little heart was full of mirth and song,
No future loomed before thee dark and drear;
No sad forebodings of thy coming fate
E'er dimmed thine eyes' soft luster with a tear.

Love came to thee in every glancing beam
That fell within thy tiny prison-home,
In every leaf and flower that graced its bars;
Ay, thou wert happy never more to roam.

No vain repinings filled thy gentle heart,
No useless longings crossed thy little breast;
No gloomy passions dwelt within thy frame,
To fill thy spirit with their wild unrest.

The summer blossoms and the autumn winds
Alike awoke thy glad and cheering lay;
No ghostly phantoms of a hopeless life
Disturbed the quiet of thy closing day.

Thy pinions heavenward never soared aloft,
But, ever prisoned, trailed in gloom and dust;
And yet thy heart was full of grateful praise,
E'en from the fickle thankful took thy crust.

There's good in all the great Creator made;
For some good purpose every creature lives;
And he, through thee, this lesson taught my soul,
E'er to be grateful for whate'er he gives.

THE FAMILY THAT HAD NOT LEARNED HOW TO KEEP "THANKSGIVING."

BY HARRIET N. BABB.

"IT'S such a pity John's folks haven't learned how to keep thanksgiving," said an aged gentleman as he entered his home and took his accustomed seat in the warmest corner.

"Not learned to keep thanksgiving, grandfather!" was the exclamation of some half dozen young people who had just returned in fine spirits from dining at uncle John's. "I think they keep it in grand style, and I'd like just such a thanksgiving every year."

"And I don't think they know how to keep it at all," repeated the grandfather a little positively, as elderly persons are apt to speak when arguing with—what they consider—foolish young ones.

"Why, grandfather, we had a nice time, I am sure. Didn't you think it was pleasant, mother?"

"Yes, very pleasant. Uncle's have such a fine house, and so handsomely furnished, that they can entertain their friends most delightfully."

"And, then, their fine piano," said Mary, "how much it added to our enjoyment!" glancing, as she spoke, at the old-fashioned instrument which had descended from her mother to herself.

"And their rich paintings, and all their fine engravings," said Charles; "I am never tired of looking at them."

"Such pretty things as they have on their 'what not,' too!" exclaimed little Sarah, "of alabaster, and China, and glass; how I wish I could have it for my play-house! I did play pretend that it was for some of the time."

"And, then, such a dinner as we had!" chimed in James. "They got all the good things that are to be found in market, no matter what they cost."

"Their dining-room is so large, and so nicely arranged for having company!" remarked the mother, to whom a small and inconvenient dining-room had long been a source of discomfort, though she rarely alluded to it, because she knew that her husband's circumstances did not warrant its improvement.

"And their elegant dinner service," pursued Mary, "would make even an ordinary dinner seem attractive; but may be the food was too rich for you, grandfather; was that the reason you did not enjoy your thanksgiving dinner?"

"No, my dear, your aunt was so kind as to have all my favorite dishes placed near me, and I did enjoy my dinner very much."

"Was there too much company there, then, to please you?"

"No, I love to see a crowd of happy faces, especially on thanksgiving day; it does me good and warms the blood in my veins. Old people ought to go into company a good deal to keep their hearts from becoming selfish and contracted; and I shall be better a long time for the pleasant party we attended to-day."

"You think it was a pleasant one, then?"

"Certainly. Your aunt and uncle spared no trouble or expense to make it so."

"Why, grandfather, and yet you said a while ago that they did not know how to keep thanksgiving."

"And I say again they have not yet learned how to keep thanksgiving."

"Not when they had such a grand feast, and entertained all their relations so handsomely?"

"They certainly were kind enough to contribute very largely to our enjoyment of the day, but I am afraid that not one of their own family was able to enter into the true spirit of the enjoyment."

"You mean they had so much care and anxiety. O it isn't as if mother had had all that company to entertain. They have such experienced servants at uncle's that they have only to give orders, and every thing is done just so, and no further trouble about the matter; so they did not have household cares to prevent their enjoying themselves."

"No, I supposed not. They had not even the excuse of cares to plead in extenuation of failing to keep this as a day of thanksgiving."

"You talk such riddles, grandfather; I don't see what makes you think they didn't keep it."

"Do tell us why you talk so, grandfather!" exclaimed James, who really began to feel afraid that his venerable relative's mind was becoming unsettled.

"I mean," replied the grandfather, "that, instead of a spirit of thanksgiving and praise for the blessings received, the whole family manifest a disposition to fret over little crosses, and to repine at ills often merely imaginary. However much they may be prospered in their worldly affairs, they have always something to complain of."

"That's true: now, to-day, as soon as we were seated, uncle commenced telling of some business transaction in which he had not been treated right; and though the amount he lost was a mere trifle, he seemed to feel it as much as a poor man would do. He is always complaining of his book-keeper, too, who is really a faithful fellow, and saying he doesn't see why it is he can not get any one to do his work as it should be done."

"Well, that's just like aunt, too. No body can ever do any thing to please her. She always orders the most beautiful hats, and yet is never suited with them, and her elegant dresses are never 'just the shade she wanted.' Though made by Mrs. B——, who fits so charmingly, she is always sure that somehow or other they do not set well, though it is impossible for her, or any one else, to point out any defect in them. Though she has such good servants, she is continually finding fault with them, and saying that she does not see why it is she must have so much more trouble with her help than other people have with theirs. If they chance to put a grain too little of salt into the soup, no one at table can enjoy his dinner for her fretting. Now, to-day, when I thought the oysters were cooked so nicely, aunt fancied they had not quite enough mace in them, and so commenced the old story of their willfulness and unfaithfulness."

"Well, my dear, we will not speak of that any longer," said the mother, who had been vainly endeavoring to catch Mary's eye. "We do not wish to notice the defects of our relations from any spirit of unkindness, but only that we may be careful to avoid the like."

"Well, mother, one thing is certain, that with all their wealth and their grand house, uncle's are not half as happy as we are, just because they are always complaining and looking at the dark side."

"I think," said the mother, "that it would be hard to find a happier family than ours; and though we are poor, as compared with your uncle's, we have, I trust, contented minds and a disposition to be grateful for the blessings we do enjoy."

"Ay, that's the grand secret of happiness," said grandfather, "that spirit of thankfulness for daily mercies which makes every day of your lives a day of thanksgiving; and I feel that the Lord will continue to bless you so long as you exercise it."

"But he hasn't made us rich, grandfather."

"Do you know any rich people who are happier than you are?"

"No, sir; they have things to make them happier, but somehow they don't seem half as happy as we do."

"Then, believe me, God has given you wealth of which they know nothing."

Thus things went on with the two families for several years, every thing in which Mr. John Horne engaged seeming to turn to gold in his hands, while his brother, Mr. William Horne, was still, in the eyes of the world, a poor man.

But the characters of the two families also remained unchanged—the one so fretful and unthankful, the other so cheerful and grateful that, as grandfather had said, every day was "thanksgiving day" to them. The children, like their parents, were happy, though Mary still played on the old piano, and they had none of the pictures and ornaments which made their uncle's house seem so attractive. Their dining-room was as small as ever, but no one guessed the inconvenience to which the mother was subjected in consequence, because she never complained of it. Her motto was not merely "what can't be cured must be endured," but "must be endured cheerfully;" and what a vast difference the addition of that one word makes!

At length there came one of those business crises, in which no one seemed secure. Like those fearful storms which once in perhaps a quarter of a century sweep over the earth, prostrating tall trees which had stood unmoved during so many shocks, and causing even the most firmly rooted oaks to tremble, so men, to whom failure seemed impossible, and even embarrassment in business a thing scarcely to be dreamed of, utterly failed to meet their liabilities; while others, who had always been considered perfectly safe, as they saw one business prop after another giving way, said, despairingly, "My turn may come next."

During this time the handsome fortune of Mr. John Horne was swept away, and he saw himself and family, in one day, reduced from affluence to poverty. Then, however, the true gold of their characters shone out resplendent. Their former complaints and murmurings were all forgotten, and as they stood up nobly to meet the trial, self was overlooked in the desire each one felt to sustain the others.

How much of the strength they displayed was granted them in answer to the earnest, agonizing prayers which their relations offered up, without ceasing, for them, can not now be known.

"What do you suppose uncle will do now, father?" asked Mary, one evening, after a long pause, during which each one had been busily thinking of the altered circumstances of their relatives.

"He is to become a clerk, my dear, in the house of S——."

"Uncle a clerk! and at his age! how wretchedly they must feel!"

"Are all their things to be sold, father?"

"Nearly all are to be sold to-morrow."

"I should think it would almost break Emma's heart to see the piano go."

"They intend to try and retain that, so that Emma can support herself by giving music lessons."

"Emma become a drudge of a music-teacher, and she so proud!" exclaimed both the boys.

"O how unhappy they must all be!"

"No, children," said grandfather, "I think very likely they will all be happier now than they have ever been before."

"Happier, grandfather?"

"Yes; hitherto their blessings were showered down so thickly upon them that they did not seem to appreciate them: now they will have to look around a little to find them, and the effort they thus make will bring happiness with it. Does my little Sarah remember how she teased, last spring, to go into the country after wild flowers, and when told that it was too early yet for many flowers to be in bloom, and that if she would wait a few weeks the ground would be covered with them, she exclaimed, 'O I shouldn't care at all about picking them, then! There would be no pleasure in finding flowers when they were as thick as that. I would much rather have to search around for them, they seem so much prettier then?'"

"Yes, grandfather, and it is true; I do enjoy the flowers much more if I have to run about first to look for them. Every one that I find then seems such a perfect treasure; and when I have to push away the dry leaves to find the dear little blue violets, they look so much brighter than if they had bloomed in plain sight."

"Mother, it is just two weeks till thanksgiving," said James; "I suppose we can't have it at uncle's this year?"

"I have been thinking," said the father, "that we had better have them all here to thanksgiving; that is, if mother can manage to entertain so many."

"O yes," was the cheerful answer, "we can get along somehow, and if we do have two separate tables it won't matter."

"I'll tell you what let us do, mother: set the table here in the parlor. Then there will be room for all to sit down the first time, and when dinner is over we children will all take hold and help carry things away, and so we can have the room cleared in a few minutes."

"O that would be nice! May we do so, mother?"

"Yes, you may."

"Then I will tell John that we are depending on having all the relations eating their thanksgiving dinner in our parlor," said the father, laughing.

The invitation was given in due time and with much cordiality, but uncle John's reply was, "No, no, we must have you all with us this year in our new home. You must not refuse us, for we begin to feel that we can keep thanksgiving this year as we have never kept it before."

"Uncle John declines our invitation for thanksgiving, and says they can not think of being here on that day," said Mr. Horne, as his family sat around the fire on the evening after the above conversation with his brother.

"What! they don't feel too badly to come here, do they?" exclaimed the mother with a startled look. "I shall go around and tell them that I insist upon their coming."

Her husband's smile dissipated her anxieties, and when he went on to relate the purport of what had been said, her eyes glistened and she answered, "We must go there, of course. What say you, grandfather?"

But grandfather did not reply. He seemed to be talking to himself, and the children heard him say,

"The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and will break
In blessings on your head."

The morning of thanksgiving day was bright and clear, but the sunshine that streamed into the windows of the breakfast-room at Mr. William Horne's was scarce brighter than were the faces surrounding the table. After the services in the church were over they all repaired to the house of their uncle. This was no longer the elegant mansion in which they had partaken of so many thanksgiving dinners, but a small, plain dwelling in an "out-of-the-way" street. When seated in the low and very plainly furnished parlor, the children of the party could not help looking round in surprise, drawing contrasts between that and the elegant rooms in which their uncle had formerly received them, and thinking to themselves that their relations must be very wretched at the change. But neither gloom nor discontent were visible upon their faces, and they were more cheerful in conversation than ever.

"We particularly wished to have you all here to-day," said the uncle, "because we feel more like keeping thanksgiving than we have ever done before. I suppose some of you think this very strange," he added, as if in reply to the surprised looks of the children, and glancing around the room as he spoke, "but it is true; I feel more like thanking God for all his goodness to-day than I did one year ago, although I was then a rich man, and I am now a poor one. 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be his holy name.' I can now return thanks for even the trials which he has sent upon us, for they have been the means of revealing our mercies to us. For many years God showered down blessings upon us in such rich profusion that we overlooked them, and neglected to thank him for them; worse than that, we murmured at imaginary troubles and unavoidable crosses. I wonder now that God could so long have borne with my ingratitude and sin. When he first laid his hand upon me to take away my worldly possessions, I fancied it was in wrath; but I see now that it was in mercy. We have so many things to be thankful for that we can not repine at what we have lost. Not the least of these is the consciousness that though reduced we are not dishonored. By giving up every thing, all just claims will be satisfied, and we are simply beginning the world anew. No widow cries to God for vengeance on me for having defrauded her. No orphans point to me as the usurper of their rights. In falling I have not been compelled to draw any one else down with me. Have I not much to be thankful for? Do you wonder that, in view of all these things, I wished to celebrate taking possession of our new home by a genuine thanksgiving?"

There was no fault-finding at dinner that day; no grumbling over bad cooking, or details given respecting troublesome servants. The greater part of the dinner had been prepared by the aunt's own hands, so that she was in duty bound to like it, and the guests showed plainly that the dishes were such as they could relish. "Why, aunt, I had no idea you were such a skillful cook!" exclaimed Mary.

"I did not know it myself till very lately, and they all make me quite proud of my talents in that line; but, then, we never know what we are capable of doing till we are tried," was the pleasant answer.

There was much lively conversation at table, and a good deal of laughter, yet each one seemed to bear in mind that it was thanksgiving day, and that in enjoying the good gifts of their heavenly Father they must not forget the giver.

Before the party separated some hymns were sung, Emma playing an accompaniment on the piano, and then a genuine prayer of thanksgiving was poured forth from the full heart of uncle John. When it was ended grandfather made a short prayer; the children thought it would have been a longer one if he had not been so choked by tears, and they wondered what made him cry when every body else seemed so happy.

"Well, this was the pleasantest day I ever passed at uncle John's; they were all so kind and so cheerful, for all they are poor!" was the exclamation of the children on their return home.

"They have learned how to keep thanksgiving, now," said grandfather. "And though they had to learn the lesson in a hard way, I am sure they will be happier all their lives for having learned it."

Uncle John is still, in the eyes of the world, a poor man; but each one of his family is doing something toward maintaining an honorable independence, and they consider themselves rich and happy in that they have learned to keep "thanksgiving."

POWER OF THE VOICE OVER CHILDREN.

A BLOW may be inflicted on a child, accompanied by words so uttered as to counteract entirely its intended effect; or the parent may use language in the correction of the child not objectionable in itself, yet spoken in a tone which more than defeats its influence. Let any one endeavor to recall the image of a fond mother, long since at rest in heaven: her sweet smile and ever-clear countenance are brought vividly to recollection; and so also is her voice—and blessed is that parent who is endowed with a pleasing utterance. What is it which lulls the infant to repose? It is no array of mean words. There is no charm to the untaught one in letters, syllables, or sentences. It is the sound which strikes its little ear that soothes and composes it to sleep. A few notes, however unskillfully arranged, if uttered in a soft tone, are found to possess a magic influence. Think we that this influence is confined to the cradle? No, it is diffused over every age, and ceases not while the child remains under parental roof. Is the boy growing rude in manner and boisterous in speech? I know no instrument so sure to control these tendencies as the gentle tones of a mother. She who speaks to her son harshly, does but give to his conduct the sanction of her own example. She pours oil on the already raging flame. In the pressure of duty we are liable to utter ourselves hastily to our children. Perhaps a threat is expressed in a loud and irritating tone; instead of allaying the passions of the child, it serves directly to increase them. Every fretful expression awakens in him the same spirit which produced it. Whatever disposition, therefore, we would encourage in a child, the same we should manifest in the tone in which we address him.

A CHAPTER ON SELF-MADE MEN.

BY WILLIAM H. BARNES.

THERE is a bond of relationship which binds great men together. They form a true brotherhood, though many mountains and seas divide them. They all performed great labors, and then alike they awaited the movement of many slow years, ere their merit was known and their fame spoken by the world's voice. Having had similar experience they enjoy a community of soul.

Yet the world, which is fond of making unfounded and unreal distinctions, has named some of the great men "self-made," because they arose from very deep obscurity to the zenith of greatness. This distinction is founded upon an incorrect idea which many men have. The truth is, birth and fortune never gave any man much advantage in the career of excellence. The way to greatness is as long and tedious, from the king's palace as from the peasant's humble hut. It is no more wonder nor honor for the son of a beggar to arise from the dust and become a great man, than for a prince of the royal line to reach the same elevation, as both must do this by manly and earnest endeavor.

Hence, this peculiar honor which the world gives, and which many men gladly receive, is entirely beyond reason. If a man be truly great perhaps he may have some innocent complacency; but because he became great by his own effort is no wonder, for no man ever attained such success without some high resolve and earnest action. When a man stands upon a mountain top, and thus sees more of the world than he ever saw at one glance before, he is thrilled with ecstasy, because he is up in the pure air of heaven, in the midst of such a glorious prospect, and not because he has gained that lofty place by climbing rocks and leaping dangerous chasms, for all men scale mountains thus.

Notwithstanding all that has been said in honor of "self-made men," no one has ever been so independent as not to owe much of his excellence to outward things. I doubt not that these propitious circumstances lie as thickly along the poor man's path as by the way of the wealthy. It is a characteristic of true greatness that it is able to reach forth its arms and draw all circumstances to itself and make them subservient to its wonderful will. Hence greatness, if it owes not its existence, owes much of its success to the proper employment of external forces. There is the beginning of a life first implanted in the human body, but all the building up of soul is with materials from without. Confine the spirit within the narrow limits of the human body, without any communication with externality, and no idea will penetrate the slumbering soul—the mind will be a rayless void. Through the five avenues of sense the wide world of nature, art, and humanity is continually making rich bestowments upon the soul. Every agent that gives a good idea to the mind shares in the honor of making the man. Then self is not the only architect of manhood, there are a multitude of builders, many of whom are forgotten as soon as their wonderful work is done. The great man is a product which is the result of many operating forces. At one time, while having such thoughts as these, many fancies came trooping over my soul, and finally assumed the form of

A BIOGRAPHICAL VISION.

I saw an inhabitant of the earth when he had been but a short while in this life. He was weak and helpless, able to do nothing more than utter a few sad moans. He had feet and hands, but he could neither walk nor work. Though he had a voice, he could say no words of gratitude to those who watched over him.

I wondered if all things in their beginnings were as frail and helpless as he. I looked abroad and saw a shrub which no hand had planted. It spread forth its limbs and leaves, and drank in the rain and genial sunshine. While the branches went heavenward, it struck its roots deep into the soil and thus obtained for itself life and strength. I saw a feathered songster, as young as the infant, start from its native bough in the morning and mount upward into the blue heavens, singing a song to its Maker. The infant seemed the weakest of all things animate. Had it not been for the love of some tender-hearted friends, whom God had given it, I am sure the child would have perished. But a ministering angel watched over the helpless one, by night and by day, till her eye grew dim, and her cheek grew pale. When first he tried to lisp the name of "mother," she smiled, and taught him to say other and greater words.

While yet she gave these lessons of love, the mother grew sick. She could no more watch over her boy, and grew paler and weaker every day. When she knew that death was near she wept, not because she was going to dwell with Jesus and the angels, but because her child must now be a lone orphan in the wide world. She had hoped to walk by his side a little way further in the journey of life. The boy was taken to her bedside. She placed her pale hand upon his head, and with a prayer and a blessing on her lips she died. The poor orphan was too young to realize this great bereavement. In after years he remembered nothing of the measureless wealth of a mother's love, which was lavished upon him in his infancy. But the mother did not die till she had fixed much of the earnestness of her own character upon his heart and soul.

When six summers had passed over his head he knew but little more than he had learned from his mother before she died. His senses were all acute; he was a bright, restless boy, but he possessed no wisdom. The universe above, around, and beneath was mysterious and unknown to him, but his young soul had neither strength nor courage to ask what it was or why.

That he might know something that would fit him for manhood in the world, his friends took him to a small school-house where there was a kind teacher and many scholars larger and older than he. His first lesson seemed useless and unmeaning to the young pupil. Had not the teacher been very patient and persevering the dull lesson might never have been learned. But he seemed to look to the great hereafter for his reward and labored faithfully. With slow and toilsome steps the boy walked along in the way of knowledge. The teacher taught him the secrets of his mother tongue, and thus gave to him the great key which unlocks all the sciences. By degrees the mystery of numbers became unfolded to his mind, and he stood in the vestibule of the great temple of mathematics. There was a glorious vista of columns and corridors before and above him, and he had no hinderance in the way of his walking forward and standing amid the splendors of the very holiest place of science.

But the time came at length when the master and scholar must part company. On that day the teacher took his pupil to the summit of the mount of intellectual vision, and giving him the telescope of history he bade him look along the vista of past ages and take note of the great men of those times. He then spoke to his pupil words of encouragement and hope, telling him that he might equal the wonderful men of antiquity if he would. Finally he pointed to the limitless fields of science which extended away in beautiful prospect before them, and told him that these should be his inheritance if he would espouse the discipleship of God and truth. From that time, having finished his preparatory course in the village school, the young man became an earnest student in the great university of nature. He started not with any of the wealth of the world in his hands, but he was rich in the resources of his own mind. Industry was the life of his soul, and it made every action which he performed effective, and every step onward. He reached eminence in the intellectual world by patiently going forward from the point where he bade adieu to his teacher.

When he stood upon the summit of the hill of science, whence his range of vision extended to the utmost limits of discovered truth, the world gazed upon him with wonder, and desired to know his origin and biography. They gave him the greater applause when they learned that he sprang from obscurity, like a planet that rises from clouds in the east and goes forth enlightening a hemisphere. He looked back to no long line of titled ancestry. He stood not on a foundation of gold or landed estate, but on the firm and abiding basis of his own merit. He was the maker of himself—the builder of that wonderful structure which arose grand and glorious in the eyes of the world, beautiful in its proportions, the joy of men.

Thus thought I as this vision passed before me. Yet, as I have since pondered upon this brief biography, I have thought that perhaps this man did not wholly make himself. There may have been forces and influences which operated powerfully in his favor, which he has never acknowledged, and of which the world has never heard. The most of these influences passed away, perhaps, and were forgotten before their great result was manifested fully to the world. One of the most powerful influences in making him the man he is was his mother, who died in the childhood of her son. Perhaps no one remembers her except that son, and his memory of her is now very dim. The kind schoolmaster who was so attentive to his young pupil in his first strivings after the good, the pure, and the true, deserves more credit than he has ever obtained, being one of the authors of his greatness. He labored to call forth the minds of his pupils, and to give them some of the rare delights of science. True, he never expected to obtain renown by performing these labors, for he did not know that any of the minds in his unambitious school would ever become great. And in this day, when there is such a continual strife for celebrity, a man ought to have fame for faithfully doing his duty without any hope of fame. If we knew his name it would be our duty to place it upon this page; but, alas! like the names of thousands of good schoolmasters, it is no more spoken among men. It is illegible upon the small, gray head-stone which the villagers placed over his grave. Though nameless now, he ought to be remembered, for he did something toward making one of the world's great men.

Pedigree is the most frail of all foundations, and the most foolish of all pretenses. In this age the man who looks back to his dead ancestors for locomotive force to enable him to make his way through the world, is thought to be very weak. Such a deep aversion to this foolish boast has taken possession of the minds of men, that many commit as sad an error in the opposite direction. When a man arises to wealth or eminence by his own exertion, he is generally disposed to magnify the difficulties which he has overcome. Such a man being "self-made" is continually dwelling upon the arduous efforts of his early life. In the often-issued editions of his story he has so greatly diminished his early advantages that they now appear to have been far below zero. The parents of such a man are generally shown to have been very poor and illiterate—totally unconscious that there was such a jewel in their household. To such young persons as are so unfortunate as to fall in his way, he is perpetually ringing the changes upon "early advantages," and holding himself up as an example for laudable emulation. Without shoes for his feet, or sympathy for his heart, he passed through the snows and sighs of his early life. Ah! rough were the millstones under which he passed; but he became the better for all that, and now stands up like a barrel of good flour, with the flattering adjective, "superfine," painted in large, red letters upon its head. As an example of this interesting class of men, we have

THE CASE OF MR. BOUNDERBY.

He lived in Coketown, a very ancient and honorable place, somewhat dingy with age and smoke, which smoke, having performed its part in the matter-of-fact business of manufacturing "woolen goods," came forth from many tall chimneys, and gave attention to the ornamental branches, by painting all exterior Coketown a dingy hue. The greatest man in Coketown was Mr. Josiah Bounderby, banker. He thought himself great because he had once been poor and was now rich, and all Coketown thought so, too, because the most of the inhabitants had no recollection of the time when they first heard Mr. Bounderby's story, and he had so faithfully kept it before those gentle people that they could not doubt the truth of his narration. Their mythology was sacred to the ancient Greeks and Romans, and thus in some manner was the history of their hero to the people of Coketown. Having infused himself so thoroughly into their thoughts and feelings, Mr. Bounderby became an essential part of Coketown; hence the historian of that place gives a very minute description of him.

"He was a rich man—banker, merchant, and manufacturer; a big, loud man, with a stare and a metallic laugh; a man with a great puffed head and forehead, swelled veins in his temples, and such a strained skin to his face that it seemed to hold his eyes open and lift his eyebrows up; a man with a pervading appearance on him of being inflated like a balloon and ready to start; a man who could never sufficiently vaunt himself a self-made man; a man who was always proclaiming, through that brassy speaking-trumpet of a voice of his, his old ignorance and his old poverty."

We may know the most of Mr. Bounderby, perhaps, by seeing him on his birthday, as the day itself is suggestive, and he needs not many external suggestions to induce him to enter upon the discussion of that favorite theme—his own origin, rise, and progress. He is in the house of a friend, and before him by the fire sits his friend's wife, whose bad health and weak nerves will not permit her to make any reply to his blustering speeches, except a faint look toward him now and then.

"I am a very different person to-day, ma'am, from what I was on my tenth birthday. I hadn't a shoe on my foot. As to a stocking, I didn't know such a thing by name. I passed the day in a ditch and the night in a pig-sty. That's the way I spent my tenth birthday. Not that a ditch was new to me, for I was born in a ditch. For years, ma'am, I was one of the most miserable little wretches ever seen. I was so sickly that I was always moaning and groaning. I was so ragged and dirty that you wouldn't have touched me with a pair of tongs.

"How I fought through it I don't know," continued Mr. Bounderby. "I was determined, I suppose. I have been a determined character in later life, and I suppose I was then. Here I am any how, and no body to thank for being here but myself, ma'am.

"My mother left me to my grandmother, and, according to the best of my remembrance, my grandmother was the wickedest and worst old woman that ever lived. If I got a little pair of shoes by any chance, she would take them off and sell them for drink. She kept a chandler's shop and kept me in an egg-box. That was the cot of my infancy, an old egg-box. As soon as I was big enough to run away, of course I ran away. Then I became a young vagabond, and instead of one old woman knocking me about and starving me, every body of all ages knocked me about and starved me. They were right; they had no business to do any thing else. I was a nuisance, an incumbrance, and a pest. I know that very well.

"I was to pull through it, I suppose," continued Mr. Bounderby. "Whether I was to do it or not, ma'am, I did it. I pulled through it, though no body threw me out a rope. Vagabond, errand-boy, laborer, porter, clerk, chief manager, small partner, Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown. Those are the antecedents and the culmination. Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown, learnt his letters from the outsides of the shops, and was first able to tell the time upon a dial-plate from studying a steeple clock under the direction of a drunken cripple. Tell Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown, of your district schools, and your model schools, and your training schools, and your whole kettle-of-fish of schools, and Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown, tells you plainly, all right—all correct; he hadn't such advantages; but let us have hard-headed, solid-fisted people. The education that made him won't do for every body, he knows well—such and such as his education was, however, you shall never force him to suppress the facts of his life."

Mr. Bounderby proceeds to make many other emphatic remarks upon his life and character, but we have already heard enough to know what kind of a man he is. He makes an apology for his rough expressions by saying that every body knows very well that he is not a refined character. Whoever expects refinement in him will be disappointed; he hadn't a refined bringing up.

Such was that remarkable, self-made man, Josiah Bounderby. Such was his story, as it rung in the ears and dwelt in the memories of all the good people of Coketown. His name and biography might have occupied a very prominent place in the book of the "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," had not some untoward circumstances made all Coketown acquainted with the true facts of his life.

Notwithstanding all of Mr. Bounderby's assertions, he had a mother, who lived honestly and quietly in a neighboring village, and by special arrangement and promise never made any mention of that great son of hers in Coketown, in order that he might make himself appear the more remarkably a self-made man. The good woman contented herself with making a yearly pilgrimage to Coketown, where she would look, from a respectful distance, upon her son's magnificence, and then go quietly back to her obscure home. Perhaps she was ignorant of the object which her son designed to accomplish by her obscurity; certainly she did not know all the details of that strange story which he palmed off upon the innocent people of Coketown. But deceptions generally come to the light, and Mr. Bounderby's story after a while lost its charm, when it became known to all Coketown that he had never been such a vagabond as he represented; that in his boyhood he had a good father and mother, who did all they could to give him a start in the world; yet he, in his wealth and prosperity, had forgotten to obey that good command, "Honor thy father and thy mother."

Doubtless there are many men besides Mr. Bounderby who neglect "to give honor to whom honor is due," or there would not be so much self-gratulation and vanity in the world. If there are any self-made men, they are those who have made the most manly use of the helps which God has given them.

THE CHEMICAL POWER OF THE SUNBEAM.

IF we carefully examine the history of scientific discovery, it will be apparent that the progress of knowledge is regulated by a constant law. The time appears to be fixed when any new truth shall be born unto man. These laws are far beyond the reach of human intellect; but we are permitted to see that the eternal One, who regulated the tides of the material ocean, has, in his infinite wisdom, fixed the extent of oscillation—the height and the depth of each mental wave, and commanded the great spiritual tide-wave of knowledge to advance in obedience to an undeviating law.

From the earliest periods of history—since man clothed himself in dyed garments—it must have been observed that some colors were darkened, while others were bleached, by the sun's rays. To the philosophy of this, his mental eye was obscured—the fact was constantly occurring—and a thousand facts are still forever presenting themselves to us, unnoticed or uncared for—and man did not perceive the important bearing of the phenomenon.

Eventually an Englishman, Mr. Thomas Wedgwood—the son of him who so greatly improved the English porcelain manufacture—conceived it quite possible, since different-colored media were not equally transparent to the radiant chemical power, to copy the paintings on the windows of old churches by covering white paper or leather with the nitrate or the chlorid of silver. He succeeded in his experiments, and, with the assistance of Sir Humphry Davy, extended his plan so far as to secure copies of images by the solar microscope, thus becoming the discoverer of the beautiful art of photography. The pictures produced by Mr. Wedgwood wanted permanence. They could only be preserved in the dark. Viewed by daylight they soon became uniformly black. A few years after this a French gentleman, M. Niepce, was induced to take up the inquiry, and he made the remarkable discovery, that the solar rays altered the character of all kinds of resinous substances. He, therefore, spread upon plates of glass and metal a thin coating of some varnish, and placing it in the camera obscura, allowed the beautiful images of Baptista Porta's instrument to fall upon the plate.*

These images, being the result of radiations from external objects, have relatively the amount of luminous and chemical power determined by the colors of their surfaces, and the quantity of illumination to which they are exposed. It was found, after exposure in this way, that some portions of the resinous surface were more soluble than others. The plates were consequently placed in some solvent, and thus was gradually developed "the clouded imagery" of the picture impressed upon the plate. Many of the pictures thus produced—called by their discoverer heliographs†—are still to be found in England, M. Niepce, being involved in the revolutionary troubles of France, having sought safety and repose at Kew. Niepce eventually returned to Paris, and then became acquainted with Daguerre, the Dioramic painter. They were both engaged in the same line of inquiry, and it was agreed that they should continue their investigations together. It is not quite easy to trace the progress made by Niepce and Daguerre, as it was not till after the death of Niepce that Daguerre announced the discovery of the process which bears his name.

During this period Mr. Henry Fox Talbot was quietly working in the same direction, and he so far improved upon the process of Wedgwood, as to give permanence to the sun-drawn pictures. Since the publication of these processes, photography has made rapid advances.

A few of the more important processes we will now undertake to describe even at the risk of not being well understood by those who have not made chemistry a study. It is difficult, within the limits allowed, to make a selection from, or to enter into the details of, the various methods by which photographs can be obtained; the most satisfactory course will be to state those general principles by which the resulting photographic phenomena may be best understood.

If silver is dissolved in nitric acid we obtain a salt—nitrate of silver. When this salt is dissolved in perfectly pure distilled water, it may be exposed to sunshine for any period without undergoing change; but add thereto the smallest portion of organic matter, and it is quickly decomposed, the silver being precipitated as a black powder. In paper we have the required organic principle, and if we wash a sheet with the solution of nitrate of silver, and expose it with any body superposed—say a fern-leaf—all the parts which are exposed will blacken, those screened will remain white, and thus there will be produced what is called a negative image. Chlorid of silver, obtained by washing the paper, first with a weak solution of common salt and then with nitrate of silver, is a far more sensitive photographic agent, and is now commonly employed.

The calotype process of Mr. Fox Talbot consists in washing paper, first with iodide of potassium, and then with nitrate of silver, by which process is obtained an iodide of silver. The paper should contain nothing but this iodide; therefore, all soluble salts are removed by soaking in water. This pale primrose-color paper, which is not sensitive to light, is washed with a peculiar organic salt called gallic acid; and, to increase the instability of the preparation, a little nitrate of silver is added to it, producing, what the inventor calls, a gallo-nitrate of silver. Here we have a preparation already quick with chemical energy; this is applied to the iodized paper, and the chemical power of the sun, as radiated from external objects, instantly produces a change—that change bearing an exact relation to the intensity of the rays falling upon each portion of the light-created picture.

Presently a picture becomes visible, and it is increased in intensity by washing it, in the dark, with a fresh portion of the gallic acid solution. The picture thus obtained is fixed by washing it with a salt, which dissolves the iodide or the chlorid of silver, which has not undergone change—the hyposulphite of soda—and subsequently soaking in clean water.

The daguerreotype consists in producing an iodide of silver upon the surface of a polished silver plate, and receiving the camera image upon this prepared surface. In both of these processes a decomposition of the iodide of silver results;

* The camera obscura is now too well known to require a description. It was the discovery of an Italian philosopher, Baptista Porta, in the sixteenth century.

† Meaning sun-drawing—a name far more happily chosen than photography—or light-drawing, modern science having shown that the chemical changes are not due to the light-producing power of the sunbeam, but to an associated dark principle called actinism.

but in Daguerre's process, the image is developed by exposing the plate on which it has been impressed to the vapor of mercury.

Mercury combines with metallic silver, but not with the iodide; thus it is deposited over every portion of the plate on which the solar radiations have acted—the thickness of the deposit bearing a strict relation to the intensity of chemical effect produced. This picture is also fixed by the use of the hyposulphite of soda; as, indeed, are nearly all varieties of photographic pictures.

By modifications, which can not be here detailed, these processes have been greatly increased in sensibility; the result which formerly required twenty minutes being now obtained in as many seconds.

A process more sensitive than either of those named has extended photography in a most remarkable manner—this is the collodion process. Collodion is gun-cotton dissolved in ether; to this is added some iodide of potassium dissolved in spirits of wine. This iodized collodion is poured over a sheet of glass—the ether evaporating leaves a beautiful film on the surface, which, upon the glass being dipped into a solution of nitrate of silver, becomes exquisitely sensitive. This prepared tablet being placed in the camera receives an image almost instantaneously, which is brought out in full vigor by pouring over it a solution of the proto-sulphate of iron or of pyrogallie acid.

The exquisite perfection of the collodion pictures, dependent upon the rapidity with which the images are impressed, is mainly due to the peculiar conditions of this singular preparation. By a preparation, in many respects analogous to the collodion, a degree of sensibility far exceeding any thing which the most sanguine photographer dreamed of in his ardent moments has been obtained. A plate prepared with albumen, iodide of iron, and alcohol, and acetic acid, was placed in a dark room of the Royal Institution in a camera obscura; opposite to it, at the proper focal distance, was a wheel, which was made to revolve many hundred times in a second, and this wheel carried a printed bill upon its face. This rapidly revolving placard was illuminated for a moment by a flash from a Leyden jar. When the prepared plate was examined by means of a developing agent, it was found that, notwithstanding the rapidity with which the image moved over the lens and the transient nature of the light, a picture of the printed bill was clearly formed, with the letters perfect. This was an experiment of Mr. Fox Talbot's, and is perhaps the most remarkable of the many examples of natural magic with which photography has brought us acquainted.

It has long been a problem, the solution of which has been anxiously looked for, whether we might hope to obtain pictures in all the beauty of natural color. This has not yet been quite successfully accomplished; but the approaches toward it are so favorable that we may hope, in a few years, to find our photographic pictures colored by the agent which now draws them.

That the delicate and fading images of the camera obscura should be permanently secured upon plates of metal and glass, and on paper, was, at one time, beyond the dreams of science. We rejoice in the reality, and Nature herself paints for us the portrait of a friend, or those scenes which are endeared to us by the tenderest and most refined associations.

We have now the means of obtaining truthful representations of the pyramids and the tombs of Egypt. The Assyrian Excavation Society have realizations from the pencil of the sunbeam of all that remains of the great monarchies of the east. The traveler in Central America has secured, with his camera, pictures of the wonderful works of the Aztecs and the cotemporary races, of whom we know so little, but whose works remain to speak of a savage grandeur and an advanced state of art, rivaling that which we find in the palace of Sardanapalus and the temples of the early Pharaohs. The ethnologist rejoices in his collection of portraits from all parts of the world; in his quiet home he is enabled, by the aid of photography, to study the physiognomies of all the races on the face of the earth.

The natural philosopher uses the same art to register for him the variations of atmospheric pressure and of the earth's temperature; more than this, the alterations in the magnetic intensity of this terrestrial globe are now faithfully registered by photography. The microscopist makes the light draw for him the details of organization, which it would be impossible for the human hand to trace. The astronomer places a sensitive tablet in his microscope; and not only does the sun draw his own image, but the milder moon traces out for him her mountains and her valleys, her beetling precipices, like old sea-coasts, and her dreadful volcanic craters, large and deep enough to swallow up all England.

What, then, may we not expect from photography, with the advance of science?

A few years since it was thought that two or three salts of silver and of gold were the only bodies which underwent any remarkable change when exposed to the action of the solar rays.

It is now proved that it is not possible to expose any body, whatsoever may be its character, to the action of sunshine without its undergoing a chemical or a mechanical change. For example, take a plate of glass, of metal, of stone, or a surface of leather, or resin—in fact, any organic or inorganic body, and placing a perforated screen above it, expose it for a short time to solar influence; then treating the plate as we do the daguerreotype—exposing it to the vapor of mercury—we shall find a picture of the superposed screen most faithfully made out on the surface; proving thus that it is impossible to expose any substance to sunshine without its undergoing a change; and that constant sunshine would be destructive to the permanence of matter, as now constituted. It has, however, been found that nature has a beautiful provision for restoring the deranged conditions. During darkness, by the action of some peculiar molecular forces, all bodies possess the power of restoring themselves to the state in which they were previously to the destructive action of the sunshine; and as night and repose are required to restore to the animal and vegetable economy the vital forces which have become exhausted by the labors of the day, and the excitements which depend upon light, so are night and darkness required to insure the permanence of the inorganic masses of the earth's surface.

Can there be a more beautiful provision than this? The laws by which the eternal Creator works are indeed wonderful and grand; the study of creation's mysteries induces a refinement of the mind, and a holy tranquillity of spirit. No one can arise from reading a page of Nature's mighty volume without feeling himself to be "A wiser and a better man."

THE RIGHTS OF THE WOMEN.

BY A LADY SUBSCRIBER.

VERY much has been said of late upon the "rights of woman," and the sphere which she is destined to occupy by Him who has appointed to us our sphere of action. With how much wisdom and discretion all this has been said is left for us to judge.

Being myself one of the "weaker sex," and having been called upon to mingle more in active life than usually falls to the lot of woman, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few remarks upon the subject without being considered a traitor to the rights of my own sex, or a designing flatterer of the other.

We hear many who are fond of declaiming upon woman's wrongs. And some are ready to believe that we are poor, oppressed sufferers. But as the judgment of such becomes more mature, and their minds more strongly fortified by observation and experience, we think they will begin to doubt whether their privileges are quite as much curtailed as they had at first imagined. Then they will also discover that those who raise the hue and cry about woman's rights, are not exactly the persons to render domestic life happy. And, indeed, they may learn at length they have mistaken strong will for strong mind; and that she who boasted of showing her spirit is far more liable to resemble Xantippe than Zoraida.

I trust my lady readers will pardon me if my remarks have partaken of bitterness or severity. The fact is—poor, spiritless soul that I am—I feel quite satisfied with matters as they are.

Another favorite theme of discussion, is our defective system of education. In many cases there may be cause of complaint upon this score; yet from personal knowledge of many female seminaries I am led to think the evil dwells more in imagination than reality. True, we are not expected to take degrees at college, nor often study any of the learned profession—with due deference to Miss Rev. A. Brown—as a means of support. It is equally true and evident to all, that very many ladies who are expensively attired are also superficially educated. I have often thought—though this is a secret—that many of our young gentlemen are in precisely the same predicament.

On the whole, I am persuaded that if we make good use of our means of education and usefulness, enough is placed within our power; and I leave it to others to sigh for civic honors, or contend with the plowmen or hostlers whether nature designed us to share their vocations and pleasures. For my own part I would recommend to the fair champions of "equal rights," to weigh well the advantages they already possess; to improve the means of knowledge within their reach, and, perhaps, when that is done, they will feel less inclined to envy those whom nature apparently designed to mingle in a more bustling sphere of action. 'Tis true, it often falls to the lot of ladies of high attainments to be treated by the weaker part of the other sex as trifles and playthings; but the buzzing of such insects need not disturb them. As relates to myself, conscious that a wide field of improvement lies stretched before me, I would rather feel that I am surrounded by beings able and willing to lead me forward, than by rival spirits, who are jealous of me and anxious only to stay my progress.

THE BRIDAL.

BY MRS. H. C. GARDNER.

THE orange wreath trembles
 Amid thy soft hair;
 It lovingly fastens
 The bridal veil there;
 It shades the white forehead,
 So pure and so meek,
 And the delicate crimson
 Of lip and of cheek.
 Thy dark eyes are drooping,
 As seeking to hide
 Their beauty, when beaming
 With pleasure and pride;
 From 'neath the curled lashes
 The shy glances steal;
 What depth of affection
 Those glances reveal!
 I know thou art happy,
 Why, then, should I weep;
 Or wish that forever
 My child I could keep?
 And yet, O, my darling!
 The spirit of gloom
 Comes in, as thy presence
 Goes out from our home!
 Gay smiles for the bridal
 Press back the vain tear!
 The fond regret stifles,
 It hath no place here.
 The shadows will deepen
 When thou art gone—
 O'erclouding my pathway,
 Beautiful one.
 O, then, in the evening
 To list thy sweet lay,
 So softly repeating
 The hush'd chords of day!
 Or, in the glad morning,
 To hear thy blithe song
 Swell out in its freshness,
 Our valleys among!
 The groves will be lonely;
 The forest arcade,
 Where oft in the summer
 Thy footsteps hath strayed;
 The fount by the hill-side—
 The flowers in the dell,
 Will miss thy bright coming,
 O sweet Gabrielle!
 White hands scatter roses
 Along thy green way,
 The sunlight is greeting
 Thy fair bridal day.
 The proud one beside thee,
 So closely allied,
 Would die to protect thee,
 His beautiful bride.
 God bless thee, my darling!
 A mother's warm love

Goes with thee wherever Thy footsteps shall rove—
 A love that is changeless,
 That nothing may sever;
 A love that is deathless,
 That lasteth forever.

WITH THE DEAD.

BY M. LOUISE CHITWOOD.

WHEN the leaves were growing emerald
 O'er the cottage door,
 And a crown of fragrant blossoms
 All the orchard wore;
 When the lark went singing upward
 To the pale blue sky,
 And the waters burst from bondage
 With a soft, low cry;
 Buttercups and violets meekly
 Budded in the dell;
 There was one I loved beside me—
 One I loved too well.
 When October's sun-burnt forehead,
 Shining with the frost,
 Leant upon the grave of Summer,
 Early, early lost,
 Came I 'neath the blighted branches
 O'er the cottage door;
 Came I listening for the footsteps
 That could come no more.
 "She will never come to you;
 She is with the dead;
 Pale young grasses grow above her;"
 That was all they said.
 Dead! so were the spring-time flowers
 So the summer's bloom;
 I sat down and saw the leaflets
 Frosted o'er her tomb;
 I sat there with bitter weeping,
 Daring to complain:
 "None like her has ever loved me;
 None will love again;
 O to hear her gentle blessing,
 How my heart hath yearn'd!
 I had thought that she would meet me
 First, when I returned."
 Came there one and sat beside me,
 That autumnal day,
 And he told me how she faded
 Like a rose away;
 How the tired lids droop'd for slumber;
 How her cheek grew thin;
 How she pined to let the angel—
 Death's pale angel in.
 "Bless'd seraph, free from sorrow,
 Rest thy weary head,
 I will rise and look to heaven:"
 That was all I said.

MOUNT OLIVET.

BY ANNIE T. SHANE.

HOW many overwhelming thoughts come sweeping through our minds at the mention of these words! The lonely Mount, that centuries ago witnessed the most intensely mournful scene that human mind could ever conceive, is known to every heart. From the little child, who hears its history Sabbath after Sabbath from his teacher's lips, to the proud man of genius and renown, there is not one to whom these simple words can not recall the thrilling scene of Olivet's lone mount. The last memorable supper with the little band who had followed their loved Master's earthly career, the passing through the silent streets of Jerusalem, by Kedron's murmuring waters, through Gethsemane's mournful shade, even unto the summit of the Mount itself, and the last great struggle of that mighty heart, as its anguish and despair breaks forth in the mournful cry, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!" then the tramp of many feet that broke the heavy stillness, and the rough voices of the mail-clad warriors, as they sternly demanded "Jesus of Nazareth;" then closing round that unresisting form, they led him from the lofty summit, down the fertile slope, through Gethsemane's still garden, and past Kedron's rippling waves, unto Jerusalem's proud city—comes it not all vividly before the mind, the oft-told tale, yet ever strangely new, so thrilling in its mournful interest!

My heart dwelt sadly on that by-gone scene, as, a few days ago, I rode slowly through the tall rows of cedars that mark the entrance of our own loved Olivet—the silent city of our cherished dead. It was a bright afternoon, and the lofty monuments and humble gravestones gleamed dazzling white in the rays of the setting sun. The bright flowers that gentle hands had carefully planted, lent additional beauty to the scene, while the wind sighed mournfully through the tall trees, as if breathing a requiem for the slumbering dead. I paused, at length, beside a large inclosure, containing the remains of many of our traveling ministers and their families. There were those who had been cut down in the midst of their extended usefulness; those who had lingered on through many years, till old age palsied the strong nerve and dimmed the glowing eye; and those who, in early life, had been called from their Master's service here to their reward above. Of this latter class was he whose name was engraved on a pure white slab before me—"Henry Furlong"—"To die is gain."

My mind went quickly back to a bright moonlight night, in a tented grove, three years ago. The songs of praise from hundreds of mingled voices, that had been heard at intervals throughout the day, had ceased, and silence reigned throughout the ground. Within our tent a little band had gathered, and though the midnight hour had passed we lingered in sweet converse. Death and eternity were spoken of, and hearts throbbed quickly at the thought of how near they seemed to the spirit-world, and tears fell fast from others' eyes as they remembered those so lately laid to rest. Bending forward, his voice tremulous with emotion, he, whom even then we deemed almost at home, exclaimed, "Could I have my wish, I would die at home within my mother's arms, my father at my side, my brothers and my sisters near me, and my last words should be, 'I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing!'" And that earnest wish was granted. He lingered far longer than we then deemed possible, and when at last the summons came it found him with his loved ones round him; and though the pallid lips could not give utterance to his thoughts, we knew that he had "kept the faith," and the "crown of righteousness" was surely his. He had left in writing, "that it might comfort his loved ones when he had gone," strong testimony of his unwavering hope and confidence; and as I stood beside that lowly grave, and thought of his pure, blameless life and his holy love, I felt, indeed, "for him to die was gain."

Very near his was another grave, and the name of "Mary Brison" is precious to more hearts than mine, and the various homes that, in life's checkered scenes, were hers, still fondly cherish her sainted memory. She hath watched often by the sick and suffering ones; she hath prayed for the anguished, burdened spirit; she hath wept freely with the sorrowing, rejoiced with the rejoicing, and soothed the dying as they neared the darkened vale of shadows. Humbly, earnestly, and hopefully she trod life's path, bearing patiently the trials of her lot, striving to fulfill her Father's will concerning her, and deserving most entirely the simple words engraven on her tomb, "She did what she could."

I wandered on sadly and mournfully, and as I bent above a tiny mound, I thought of the fair boy on whose brief life eight short summers shed their flowery radiance. I had watched him often in his childish sports; I had seen him lingering lovingly beside his mother's knee, and noted the deep, reverent look upon the fair young face when in God's holy house. And though the summons came unexpectedly, death had no terrors for his gentle heart. He spoke comfort to the stricken parents bending over him; told them of his mother's words long months before, "Even my little son is not too young to love God;" that he felt his name was written in the Lamb's book of life; and that his heavenly Father was waiting for him. Each member of the household was thought of, and entreated to meet him in the home above; and those who gathered round that dying boy, and listened to the words of wisdom and instruction that fell so strangely from his lips, felt that religion was indeed all-powerful to save, and that truly "of such was the kingdom of heaven." It seemed almost as the working of a miracle to look upon those tiny hands clasped so triumphantly, the pale face lighted up with glorious brightness, and the faltering voice telling of angel faces bending over him, and the sound of heavenly music from the harps above.

O, how can parents ever falter in their arduous task of love, or grow weary in leading their children in the path of Christian duty, when such a scene is to comfort them in the anguished hour of parting; and the consolation that they have trained an immortal spirit for the realms above, and given another angel to the glorious band, can soothe, sustain, and bless!

It was the inclosure sacred to our own family band that next I entered, and, O! the many tears that had fallen over the slumberers there! Upon one monument is engraved the name of the sainted grandfather I never knew, but whose memory has been ever fondly revered—Rev. Dr. George Roberts. Though years have passed since the bright Sabbath morn that witnessed his departure from earth's trials to heaven's glories, none who lingered in that hallowed room will ever forget the scene they witnessed, and on many lives the impress of his parting words and counsel still remain to purify and bless.

In this same sacred spot other of our loved ones are sleeping quietly; yet even in our deepest anguish comes the blessed thought, of all the little band reposing there we have the hope of a coming, glorious reunion.

Five times, within the last six months, has the voice of mourning been heard within our home; and the stroke was not less difficult to bear because some died far from us, and others were laid to rest by stranger hands. The first who left us was the aged saint, who but the previous Sabbath had occupied his usual place in the house of prayer.

On his physician's saying, "Father, you will soon be at home now," he replied, "Yes, I have the strongest indication of it, and it will be a blessed home to me. I shall meet those I have loved, and who have gone a little while before me. Glory be to God! Yea, though I walk through the valley and the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." "Heaven—Jesus—angels—praise God!" were often, often repeated when we could not catch the connecting sentences; and the last words he whispered were, "He is here; I see them, I see them;" then, with his hand raised upward, "There they are, there they are." And thus passed away the Rev. Joseph Shane, as pure and gentle a spirit as ever hallowed earth's dwellings.

Two short months have hardly flown since was brought unto us a cold and silent form that had left her home a joyous, radiant bride. The cherished idol of her family, the center of a large circle of admiring friends, and the beloved of all who knew her, Death, who, indeed, "loves a shining mark," has, in her removal, brought anguish unto many hearts. Great sweetness of temper, perfect amiability, a well-stored mind, combined with loveliness of person and winning manners, made her a general favorite, and Lissie Harden's memory will long be cherished in many homes. Sudden was her summons, yet she was well prepared to go, and left kind messages for the absent and the loved. Praise and thanksgiving resounded through the room, and the last whispered words were, "Precious Jesus," while those who lingered near gazed awestruck on the glorious beauty of her countenance, and the radiant smile that lingered on the pallid lips, even after the spirit had departed. She died among strangers; but they brought her here to rest with loved ones, and heaven will henceforth seem more precious from the thought that she is there.

And, O! how weary would earth's pilgrimage become, and how heavily these frequent partings press upon the spirit, did we not remember the "better land," where no sickness, pain, nor death can ever come, and where no night reigns, "but the Lord shall be our everlasting light."

"Yet mourn we not as they

Whose spirit's light is quench'd; for them the past
Is seal'd. They may not fall; they may not cast

Their glorious hope away!

All is not here of our beloved and blessed—

Leave we the sleepers with their God to rest."

THERE IS A GOD.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

O THERE is beauty every-where!
 Go forth beneath the quiet stars,
 When not a breath upon the air
 The holy stillness mars;
 When the pale moon is looking down,
 And silver clouds are fitting by;
 When thousand, thousand orbs of light
 Are shining in the sky;
 When the dim veil of eve is thrown
 O'er all the silent, sleeping earth;
 The hour when gladness fills the heart,
 And holy thoughts have birth;
 And then if holy thoughts come not;
 If from thy heart ascends no prayer,
 God pity thee! thou shouldst not dwell
 Upon a world so fair.
 If thou canst view the holy stars,
 And shed no penitential tear;
 If thou canst stand 'neath heaven's blue dome,
 And, mocking, say, "No God is here;"
 If from the altar of thy soul,
 No incense rises to thy God,
 Then what shall save thee from his wrath,
 When falls the chastening rod?
 O better hadst thou never lived,
 Than thus to mock thy Maker's name,
 Or if the cold, dark grave had closed
 Upon thy infant frame!
 O stand not here, 'tis holy ground;
 Thy very breath pollutes the air!
 God pity thee! thou shouldst not dwell
 Upon a world so fair.

REV. DR. ADAM CLARKE.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Know ye a prince hath fallen?

They who sit
 On gilded throne, with rubied diadem,
 Caparisoned and guarded round, till death
 Doth stretch them 'neath some gorgeous canopy,
 Yet leave no footprint in the realm of mind—
 Call them not kings, they are but crowned men.

Know ye a prince hath fallen?

Nature gave
 The signet of her royalty, and years
 Of mighty labor won that sceptered power
 Of knowledge, which, from unborn ages, claims
 Homage and empire, such as Time's keen tooth
 May never waste. Yes, and the grace of God
 So witness'd with his spirit, so impelled
 To deeds of Christian love, that there is rear'd
 A monument for him, which hath no dread
 Of the fierce flame that wrecks the solid earth.
 I see him 'mid the Shetlands, spreading forth

The riches of the Gospel, kneeling down
 To light its lamp in every darken'd hut;
 Not in the armor of proud learning brac'd,
 But with a towel girded, as to wash
 The feet of such as earthly princes scorn.

I see him lead the rugged islander,
 Even as a brother, to the Lamb of God,
 Counting that untaught soul more precious far
 Than all the lore of all the letter'd world.

I hear his eloquence, but deeper still,
 And far more eloquent, there steals a dirge
 O'er the hoarse wave, "All that we boast of man,
 Is as the flower of grass."

Farewell! farewell!
 Pass on with Wesley, and with all the great
 And good of every nation. Yes, pass on,
 Where the cold name of sect, which sometimes throws
 Unholy shadow o'er the heaven-warm'd breast,
 Sinks into nothingness, and every surge
 Of warring doctrine, in whose eddying depths
 Man's charity was drained, is sweetly lost
 In the broad ocean of eternal love.

THE RICH MAN'S CHOICE.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved:
 for he had great possessions." MARK X, 22.

O HAD he known that harps were hushed
 Amid the angel throng,
 Or heard the strain that would have gushed
 These shining cords along,
 Or seen where waved his crown of life,
 The fadeless and the fair,
 Would he, within that hour of strife,
 Have stood and pondered there?

That fearful hour, that silent kept
 The seraphs of the sky,
 With wily care the tempter swept
 His panorama by.
 Before him passed broad lands and fair,
 And coffers piled with gold;
 But for the gorgeous vision there,
 Perchance a soul was sold.

How could he stand! how could he pause!
 How, for one moment, weigh
 The things that should have been as straws,
 With life's long, blissful day!
 He knew beyond the shining gate
 The proffered "treasure" lay;
 O how could mortal hesitate!
 He sadly went away.

On Judah's hills, the green and fair,
 Is hushed the voice of yore,
 But still the tempter spreads his snare,
 Just as it spread before;
 And ye who earthly riches hold,
 And heritage fair,
 O barter not for lands of gold,
 Your priceless treasure there!

WHAT THE BIBLE IS AND DOES.—A nation must be truly blessed, if it were governed by no other laws than those of this blessed book. It is so complete a system that nothing can be added to it or taken from it. It contains every thing needful to be known or done. It affords a copy for a king, and a rule for a subject. It gives instruction and counsel to a senate; authority and direction for a magistrate. It cautions a witness, requires an impartial verdict of a jury, and furnishes the judge with a sentence. It sets the husband as lord of the household, and the wife as mistress of the table; tells him how to rule, and her how to manage. It entails honor to parents, and enjoins obedience to children. It prescribes and limits the sway of the sovereign, the rule of the ruler, and the authority of the master; commands the subjects to honor, and the servants to obey; and promises the blessing and protection of its Author to all that walk by its rule. It gives directions for weddings and for burials. It promises food and raiment, and limits the use of both. It points out a faithful and an eternal Guardian to the departing husband and father; tells him with whom to leave the fatherless children, and in whom his widow is to trust; and promises a father to the former, and a husband to the latter. It teaches a man how to set his house in order, and how to make his will. It defends the right of all, and reveals vengeance to every defrauder, over-reacher, and oppressor. It is the first book, the best book, and the oldest book in the world. It contains the choicest matter; gives the best mysteries that were ever penned. It brings the best of tidings, and affords the best of comfort to the inquiring and disconsolate. It exhibits life and immortality, and shows the way to everlasting glory. It is a brief recital of all that is past, and a certain prediction of all that is to come. It settles all matters in debate, resolves all doubts, and eases the mind and conscience of all these scruples. It reveals the only living and true God, and shows the way to him; and sets aside all other gods, and describes the vanity of them, and of all that trust in them. In short, it is a book of laws, to show right and wrong; a book of wisdom, that condemns all folly, and makes the foolish wise; a book of truth, that detects all lies, and confutes all errors; and a book of life, and shows the way from everlasting death. It is the most compendious book in the world; the most authentic and the most entertaining history that ever was published. It contains the most early antiquities, strange events, wonderful occurrences, heroic deeds, unparalleled wars. It describes the celestial, terrestrial, and infernal worlds, and the origin of the angelic myriads, human tribes, and infernal legions. It will instruct the most accomplished mechanic and the profoundest artist. It will teach the best rhetorician, and exercise every power of the most skillful arithmetician; puzzle the wisest anatomist, and exercise the nicest critic. It corrects the vain philosopher, and exposes the subtle sophist: it is a complete code of laws, a perfect body of divinity, an unequaled narrative; a book of lives, a book of travels, and a book of voyages.

WHAT IS IT TO "WALK WITH GOD?"—We think we can not answer this question better than by taking an extract from one of Baxter's beautiful works. May God give his blessing to every Christian who reads it, especially to those who are longing after a "closer walk!"

"To walk with God," says the holy man, "is to live as in his presence, and that with desire and delight. It is to believe and feel that, wherever we are, we are before the Lord, who seeth our hearts, and all our ways. It is to compose our minds to that holy reverence and seriousness, which become man in the presence of his Maker; and to order our words with that care and gravity which it is proper for those to use who speak before Jehovah. As we are not moved at the presence of a fly, a worm, or a dog, when persons of distinction and honor are present, so we should not comparatively be moved at the presence of man, however great, rich, or terrible, when we know that God himself is present, to whom the greatest of the sons of men is more inconsiderable than a fly or a worm is to them. As the presence of a king makes ordinary bystanders to be unobserved, and the conversation of the learned makes us disregard the babblings of children, so the presence of God should make the greatest of men to be scarcely observed or regarded in comparison of him. God, who is ever with us, should so fill our souls and engross our attention, that others, in his presence, should be but as a candle in the presence of the sun. Convinced of this, he who walks with God is careful to maintain that behavior, both with regard to the temper of his spirit and the conduct of his life in all things, which he knows to be most pleasing in the sight of God, and most becoming those who stand continually before him; while others accommodate themselves to the company with whom they converse, and are so engrossed with the creature, that they totally forget the presence of God. Hence men of God were wont to speak reverently, and yet familiarly, of God, as children of their father, with whom they dwell; as being fellow-citizens with the saints, and, therefore, a part of his household. Thus Abraham calls him, 'The Lord before whom I walk;' Jacob, 'God, before whom my fathers, Abraham and Isaac, walked;' and David says, 'I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.' Yea, God himself is pleased to use terms of gracious and condescending familiarity toward them. 'Christ dwells in their hearts by faith.' His Spirit dwelleth in them as his 'house,' and his 'temple.' The Father himself is said to 'dwell in them, and walk in them.' 'God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.'

"Our walking with God, therefore, implies not only a sense of the common presence of God, but a lively, abiding apprehension of his gracious presence, as our God and reconciled Father, with whom we dwell, and who dwelleth in us by his Spirit."

CHRISTIAN, WHERE'S YOUR SHIELD?—How often are we pained to see and hear of our fellow-soldiers in the Christian warfare being weary, being suddenly overtaken in a fault, being led captive by Satan our grand adversary! How is it? What is the reason of all these sad mishaps, which bring reproach on ourselves, and on the Captain of our salvation? There must be some cause. Perhaps we can show what it is. Often when reading Homer's "Iliad" we have gazed on the cuts, and observed the Trojan and Grecian warriors with their shields cast behind their backs when not engaged in actual warfare. We read that this was their practice. Their enemies were not always at hand, and their shields were not always needed. Surely, have we thought, this must be the manner in which some Christian soldiers are acting when they are suddenly taken captive by Satan. They must have cast their shields behind their backs, forgetting that their adversaries never sleep! Is it not so? Say, careless Christian!

Yes, you know it is. Your shield is the shield of faith; that faith which lays hold on the Savior, and lays claim to his merit for acceptance with the Father; that faith which unites you to Christ. So long as that shield of faith is in use, so long, and no longer, will you be safe. If faith draws you to the Savior, unites you to him, and you recline on his beloved bosom, Satan may roar as he pleases, may cast forth as many poisoned arrows as he pleases, but not one will touch you.

"While folded in the Savior's arms, You're safe from every snare."

O, then, take good heed where your shield is! Remember your threefold enemy—the world, the flesh, and the devil—never sleeps. Yours must be a continual warfare: you will have no opportunity for casting your shield over your shoulder. If you do so, a mortal wound may be struck before you are aware of it. Forget not that you are in an enemy's land, and encompassed by enemies: they are on every side. Be vigilant: let your faith in the Savior be strong and unwavering.

When St. Paul exhorts his fellow-soldiers in Ephesus to "put on the whole armor of God," and mentions each part of that armor, he lays special stress on the shield, knowing that to be of supreme importance. He says, "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

Your shield is not, like the Grecian's, made of iron or brass, overlaid with seven bull-hides: no; it is one through which no dart can possibly enter, though wielded by the arm of the most skillful and mighty of enemies. Up, then, Christian! up with your shield; and never, never think of casting it behind your back. Say with the poet, in prayer:

"Give me on Thee to call,
Always to watch and pray,
Lest I into temptation fall,
And cast my shield away.
For each assault prepared
And ready may I be;
Forever standing on my guard,
And looking up to thee."

"HE CARETH FOR YOU."—It is often hard to think so; that in his almightiness he should deign to have a thought for us. Why, the heaven of heavens can not contain him, and if amid the immensity of his creation this little world were blotted from existence its loss would never be perceived; and here we are, worms upon its surface, poor, helpless, and worthless; and yet he careth for us.

He careth for you. O what a load it takes from these poor, weak shoulders! He that has lit up the starry heavens. He that has rolled forth the planets; that guides the sun in its course, and hath established the everlasting hills; he it is that careth for us, and upon whom we are to cast all our care—spiritual as well as temporal; anxieties wearing the body as well as corroding the soul; fears, gloomy as night; uncertainties, dark and distressful: the whole burden of our sins, of our temptations, of our doubts, trials, and vexations—all to be cast upon him who careth for us. Surely, he must care a great deal for us to be willing to bear them all. And it is well for us poor mortals that we have some one who is thus willing and able both to care and to bear. Yet we see some Christians go groveling along as if such a promise had never found a place in God's word. They prefer to bear their own burdens instead of casting them upon the Lord. And they do bear them, and bear them till they are crushed under them; and not till they are crushed under them are they willing that God should take them to himself.

He careth for you. Children of affliction, hear ye this. What though the world forsake you, and leave you to mourn alone! What though a base ingratitude has stung you to the quick, and clouds of anxieties are clustering all around you! There is one that careth for you; and though all others should forsake you, he never will. True, the night is dark, and the billows are strong, and the tempest thickens, yet look up; there is one walking on the billows by your side who is mightier than you; and it is to just such as you that he loves to extend his care—that precious care, whose watchfulness is never withdrawn, whose love is never dimmed. In the valley he will walk by your side, and along the steep and dreary road will take your burden to himself. "Cast thy burden on the Lord, he shall sustain thee."

He careth for you. Child of perplexity, hear ye this. Why, then, take thought for to-morrow? to-morrow is all his own. Can you make it better? and if you could make it better, and take it out of his hands all to yourself, would you do it? I doubt it if you knew how much he loved you. Trials perhaps, but then trials producing patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and all producing what? why a heart fitted to love and serve him; just such a heart as he wants you to have; just such a heart as he says you must have if you are to dwell forever with him.

"THEY SHALL MOUNT UP WITH WINGS AS EAGLES."—Tis said the eagle, when clouds betoken a storm, rises into the upper air, and, resting on its wings, looks calmly down upon the warring elements. This beautiful fact is referred to by our heavenly Father. Why has he told us this story? Has it a moral? O, child of God, have thy cherished plans been crossed—thy loved ones taken from thee—"the friend, as thine own soul," become estranged? Have thy motives been misjudged, and those who should befriend thee become thine enemies? Read again. "They shall mount up with wings as eagles!" Does that smothered sigh say, "O that I had wings?" Ah, little one of Christ, thy wings are folded, and these disturbing influences are but to make thee stretch them. What hast thou to do with despondency? Heir of a kingdom, look up! look up! Rise heavenward, and resting on the "wings of faith," look calmly down upon conflicting elements!

THE GREAT PREPARATION.—We should make preparation, because we shall meet God in very solemn circumstances. It will be away from friends, from the body, from the familiar scenes with which they have been conversant here. It will be when we shall be alone with God. It will be the next act that shall succeed the solemn act of dying. A man who is to meet God as soon as he dies should make some preparation for it. If he were to meet him on a lonely mountain, like Moses, amid clouds and tempests—though he had left many friends at the base—as he clambered up its steep ascent, he would feel that he ought to be prepared for that solemn interview. How much more when he leaves his friends weeping around his pale, lifeless body; when he travels alone and disembodied the untrodden, dark way up to God; when he goes there without a friend or an advocate; when he goes, to come back no more!

We should make preparation to meet God, because when we are brought before him it will be too late to do what is necessary to be done. The path up to the judgment-seat is not a way of preparation; nor at his bar is it a place to prepare for eternity. It is no time to prepare for battle when the enemy is in the camp; no time to make ready to meet a foe when he has broken open your door. There is such a thing as putting off preparation till it is too late. A man may neglect the care of his health till it is too late. A student may suffer the proper time to prepare for a profession to glide away till it is too late. A farmer may neglect to plow and sow till it is too late. A man on a rapid stream near a cataract may neglect to make efforts to reach the shore till it is too late. And so in religion. It is easy to put it off from childhood to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood to old age, till it is too late. Beyond that interview with God there is no preparation. Your eternity is not to be made up of a series of successive probations, where, though you fall in one, you may avail yourself of another. There is but one probation—O, how short, how fleeting, how soon gone! The shuttle of the weaver flies not swifter; nor do the shadows move more rapidly over the plain. Each day leaves the number less—and not one of them can be recalled. Life is passed through not to be traveled over again; and each footprint is made to be seen by us no more. He that comes after us may track our way nearer and nearer to the beach where the ocean of eternity rolls; he may see step after step in the sand, till he comes to the last print, half washed away by the tide, where we plunged into the vast ocean, and disappeared forever. You go not back again. This day, this hour, you live but once—and this setting sun will have taken one irrecoverably from the allotted days of your probation. I wonder at man. The earth is our place of probation—and it is all—literally, absolutely all. In that probation, if ever, you and I are to be prepared for that vast eternity on which we enter in a few days. If not prepared then, we are never to be prepared. Point me, fellow-mortal, to the slightest proof whatever, or to the slightest presumption—I will not ask for proof—that another season of probation is to be granted to you beyond the judgment of the great day, and I will never urge this point again. But if there is none, my dying fellow-man, you ought to be prepared to meet God. It is not a thing of privilege, it is a thing of obligation. Your conscience, your reason, your sober judgment, all respond to the claim which I urge upon you, that you should be ready to meet God. You who have adopted it as a settled purpose that you will not enter a profession without being prepared for it: you who will not appear in the gay assembly without hours spent, under skillful hands, at the toilet, that you may be prepared for it, ought to be prepared to appear before God. You ought to have on a brighter than any earthly array; you ought to have on the garments of salvation—the pure and spotless robes wrought by the “Redeemer’s hands, and dyed in his blood.” Not as you are now, sinful, unforgiven, gay, worldly, thoughtless, ambitious, should you stand before the great and pure Jehovah to receive the sentence which will seal your eternal doom.

INSTANT ANSWER TO PRAYER.—In 1661 the noble husband of Lady Margaret Douglas, Marchioness of Argyll, was tried before the Scottish Parliament, by order of Charles II, on a charge of high treason. His dreadful sentence was, to be beheaded, after two short days, at Edinburgh Cross; and his head to be fixed on the west end of the Tolbooth, where the head of the Marquis of Montrose had been formerly exhibited. In this season of deep distress, the Marchioness betook herself to the throne of grace, and implored support and comfort, not so much for herself, as for her beloved husband, who, though guilty of no crime, was so soon to suffer a traitor’s death. In the morning of the day on which he was to be executed, she and Mr. John Carstairs were employed in wrestling with God in his behalf, in a chamber in the Canongate, earnestly pleading that the Lord would now seal his charter by saying to him, “Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.” It is a memorable fact, that, at the very time they were thus employed, the Marquis, while settling some worldly affairs, a number of persons of quality being present, was visited in his soul with such a sense of the Divine favor as almost overpowered him; and, after in vain attempting to conceal his emotions by going to the fire and beginning to stir it with the tongs, he turned about, and melting into tears, exclaimed, “I see this will not do: I must now declare what the Lord has done for my soul. He has just now, at this very instant of time, sealed my charter in these words, ‘Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee!’” This comfort he retained to the last, and alluded to the scene in his dying speech on the scaffold. Can it be doubted that the bestowment of the very blessing asked by the Marchioness and that godly minister, at the very instant, was a signal answer to their believing prayers?

Her ladyship bore the sad stroke of calamity with incredible fortitude; “giving herself always to prayer and fasting, and ministering to the necessity of saints;” surviving the Marquis nearly seventeen years. Mr. Neil Gillies, “indulged minister” of her parish, tells with beautiful simplicity how well this time was spent, and how her ladyship joined in every act of worship, languor and pain notwithstanding, till her spirit returned to God.

HOW TO CLOAK THE DAY.—The following, from the Greek of Pythagoras, is worthy of adoption by every one:

“Let no soft slumber close mine eyes
Ere I have recollected thine
The train of actions through the day.
Where have my feet marked out the way?
What have I learnt, where’er I’ve been,
From all I’ve heard, from all I’ve seen?
What know I more that’s worth the knowing?
What have I done that’s worth the doing?
What have I sought that I should shun?
What duties have I left undone?
Or into what new follies run?
These selfinquiries are the road
That leads to virtue and to God.”

Editorial Disquisition.

THE BLOODY SWEAT.

Our Savior's agony in the garden of Gethsemane is a profoundly interesting subject to the believer. Whether we regard the person of the sufferer, the cause of the suffering, the end attained by it, or the phenomena attendant upon it, it is a mysteriously sublime manifestation. We do not promise the elimination of all the difficulties connected with the subject, nor yet the solution of all its mysteries. For these results we may not hope, perhaps, till we are favored with the vision of angels. We have now simply to consider one of the striking incidents of this scene—one that has excited wonder in all ages, awakening the sorrow and sympathy of the believer, and being the occasion of shameless satire on the part of the skeptic. This phenomenon is thus described by Luke—xxii, 44—"And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly; and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground."

Whatever might be the real nature of this phenomenon, it is obviously described as the result of mental agony. For it is said, he "began to be sorrowful and very heavy"—Matt. xxvi, 37—and he says to the chosen three, whom he had taken apart from the others, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death"—verse 38. The original of the first passage is still more emphatic—distressed and filled with anguish, or, as Mark expresses it, sore amazed; that is, shocked, benumbed with agony. It was while in this agony and as a consequence of it, that the phenomenon of "the bloody sweat" appeared.

In order to reach definite and practical results in this discussion, we should first ascertain what is the precise import of the language employed by St. Luke, and then inquire whether such a phenomenon is physiologically possible.

Some have supposed that the inspired writer did not intend to say that he actually sweat drops of blood; but that his sweat was so profuse that it gathered in drops as large as drops of blood. Such a conclusion, however, can not be reached without giving to the original a forced and unnatural meaning. The words which are not inaptly rendered in the English text, great drops of blood—σφαῖρας αἱματός—mean literally clots or coagulated blood, and very accurately describe the appearance of commingled blood and sweat. Besides this, if only a comparison were intended, it is certainly an inapt and unusual comparison; and it is difficult to conceive why clots of blood should have been used to illustrate the rolling down of great drops of sweat. The meaning of the text is so obvious that very few commentators have found occasion to question its import or to depart from the ordinarily received interpretation.

There is another remarkable fact worthy of consideration in endeavoring to fix the precise meaning of the sacred narrative. The only one of the evangelists by whom this phenomenon is described is Luke. He was a physician, and would, therefore, be more likely to have his attention attracted to such a thing, and also to comprehend more fully the fearful agony that must have rent the Savior's heart to produce such wonderful effects. Being a physician, he could comprehend what he was describing; and what is remarkable, the term he employs is found no where else in the New Testament, and at the same time it is strictly medical.

1. Our Savior is represented as being in an agony; torn by conflicting mental emotions; and overwhelmed with a sorrow too great for utterance, and which seemed to paralyze all the functions of life. With what force does the sacred writer employ the word agonia—ἀγῶνη—to express this mental anguish! It signifies a struggle—a death struggle—between diverse and conflicting emotions.*

2. The word Thromboi—θρομβοί—which is used in the text, and which is translated great drops, is found no where else in the New Testament. Lexicographers tell us that it designates a piece or bit of any liquid congealed or coagulated into a mass; that the phrase was often applied to milk and blood; and Hippocrates used it frequently to designate coagulated blood.† Schleusner gives several references to the writings of Greek physicians—scriptis medicorum Græcorum—in which thromboi is used in the sense of clots of blood. But in the sacred text we have σφαῖρας αἱματός—clots of blood, which fixes the signification with great distinctness.

3. The expression indicates not merely a slight effusion of blood, but a profuse sweating of it. The full force of the word katabainontes—καταβαίνοντες—especially when we add εἰς τὴν γῆν—flowing down upon the earth—is reached only by the supposition of an effusion striking for its quantity as well as for its character. Hence, the Vulgate conveys the idea of its flowing down in the manner of a stream or torrent.‡

We can not, therefore, see any room to raise a doubt or question as to the precise meaning of the sacred historian.

If we look at the question in its physiological aspects, mysterious and unusual as is such a phenomenon, we can find no evidence of any physiological impossibility. Perspiration, both sensible and insensible, is constantly going on in our bodies. The skin in all parts of the body is perforated by small, regularly formed tubes, terminating outwardly by innumerable small orifices, from which the perspiration exudes, and inwardly by what physiologists call "blind extremities." These tubes are surrounded in their whole length by a delicate network of extremely attenuated vessels; and the ultimate ramifications of the arteries penetrate to their interior surface. Hence they are made to discharge the watery parts of the blood in the form of vapor, and its grosser ingredients in the form of a glutinous liquid.

This perspiration is powerfully increased by excitement, and especially by mental or bodily anguish. How often have we seen the large drops of sweat gather upon the brow, the cheeks, the lips, while the soul was struggling beneath some enormous load of anguish that had fallen perhaps suddenly and with crushing weight upon it. But when those passions or feelings that cause the heart to beat with more rapid and violent action are excited, there must be, of course, an increased flow of the blood to the skin. The first result of this is blushing, whether from shame or anger. It is not unfrequently the case that when the emotion is very powerful a copious effusion of sweat follows. We can readily conceive that greatly increased mental excitement might force out the blood itself through the pores, and this, mingling with the natural perspiration, would exhibit the phenomenon of "bloody sweat." The natural meaning of the text is, unquestionably, that the blood was mingled with his sweat, and thus it poured from him profusely, and fell in great drops upon the ground.

Physiologists recognize the occurrence of this bloody sweat as a physiological fact. Dr. Millingen, in his "Curiosities of Medical Experience," speaks of it as the most singular of all the maladies that affect cutaneous transpiration, and says, "It is probable that this strange disorder arises from a violent commotion of the nervous system, turning the streams of blood out of their natural course, and forcing the red particles into the cutaneous excretories. A mere relaxation of the fibers could not produce so powerful a revulsion." He says also that it may arise in cases of extreme debility in connection with a thinner state of the blood. This malady is called diapedesis. Haller says that the passions of the mind sometimes force blood from the skin; and from this he infers that "the sudoriferous tubes are not much smaller than the capillary blood-vessels." He also says that a mental passion which effects no change except a contraction of the nerves may make wonderful changes in the secretions, and expel both the blood and bile through the vessels of the skin. Kannegiesser remarks, in the German Ephemerides, as quoted by Dr. Stroud, that "violent mental excitement, whether occasioned by uncontrollable anger or vehement joy, and, in like manner, sudden terror or intense fear, forces out a sweat, accompanied with signs either of anxiety or hilarity." After ascribing this sweat to the unequal constriction of some vessels and dilation of others, he further observes: "If the mind is seized with a sudden fear of death, the sweat, owing to the excessive degree of constriction, often becomes bloody."

But let us prosecute this inquiry in the light of facts. Dr. Stroud, on the authority of De Thou, an eminent French historian, gives the following instance: "An Italian officer who commanded at Monte-Marco, a fortress of Piedmont, during the warfare in 1552, between Henry II, of France, and the Emperor Charles V, having been treacherously seized by order of the hostile general, and threatened with public execution unless he surrendered the place, was so agitated at the prospect of an ignominious death that he sweated blood from every part of his body." The same writer relates a similar occurrence in the person of a young Florentine at Rome, unjustly put to death by order of Pope Sixtus V, in the beginning of his reign, and concludes the narrative as follows: "When the youth was led forth to execution, he excited the commiseration of many, and through excess of grief was observed to shed bloody tears, and to discharge blood instead of sweat from his whole body—a circumstance which many regarded as a certain proof that nature condemned the severity of a sentence so cruelly hastened, and invoked vengeance against the magistrate himself, as therein guilty of murder."

We have already referred to the German Ephemerides. This work gives several examples of bloody tears and bloody sweat occasioned by extreme fear. Among them is the case of "a young boy, who, having taken part in a crime for which two of his elder brothers were hanged, was exposed to public view under the gallows on which they were executed, and was thereupon observed to sweat blood from his whole body." In his commentaries on the four Gospels, Maldonado refers to "a robust and healthy man at Paris who, on hearing the sentence of death passed on him, was covered with a bloody sweat." Another mentions the case of a young man who was similarly affected on being condemned to the flames. Lombard mentions a general who was affected in the same manner on losing a battle. A similar case came under the observation of Sporliuus, a physician of Bal: "The patient was a child of twelve years of age, who never drank any thing but water; having gone out into the fields to bring home his father's flocks, he stopped upon the road, and, contrary to habit, drank freely of white wine. He shortly after was seized with a fever. His gums first began to bleed, and soon after a hemorrhage broke out from every part of the integuments, and from the nose. On the eighth day of the malady he was in a state of extreme debility, and the body was covered with livid and purple spots, while every part from whence the blood had exuded was stopped with clots."

We might rest the case here, and claim that we had given sufficient facts, as well as philosophy, to authenticate the Divine narrative. But we wish to go farther, and show that the cases are not so exceedingly rare but that they are fully recognized, and their diagnosis fully observed by competent physicians. Schenck gives the case of "a nun who fell into the hands of soldiers; and, on seeing herself encompassed with swords and daggers, threatening instant death, was so terrified and agitated that she discharged blood from every part of her body, and died of hemorrhage in the sight of her assailants." In the Memoirs of the Society of Arts in Haarlem, the case of a sailor is mentioned "who was so alarmed by a storm, that he fell down, and his face sweated blood, which during the whole continuance of the storm returned like ordinary sweat as fast as it was wiped away."

Dr. Millingen cites the case of a widow of forty-five years of age who had lost her only son. "She one day fancied that she beheld his apparition beseeching her to relieve him from purgatory by her prayers and by fasting every Friday. The following Friday in the month of August a perspiration tinged with blood broke out. For five successive Fridays the same phenomenon appeared, when a confirmed diapedesis set in. The blood escaped from the upper part of the body, the back of the head, the temples, the eyes, the nose, the breast, and the tips of the fingers. The disorder disappeared spontaneously on Friday, the 8th of March, in the year following. This affection was evidently occasioned by superstitious fears; and this appears the more probable from the periodicity of the attacks. The first invasion of the disease might have been purely accidental; but the regularity of its subsequent appearance on the stated day of the vision may be attributed to the influence of apprehension."

The case of Catherine Merlin, of Chamberg, is well authenticated and worthy of being recorded. She was a woman of forty-six years of age, strong and hale. She received a kick from a bullock in the pit of the stomach, which was followed by vomiting blood. This having been suddenly stopped by her medical attendants, the blood made its way through the pores of various parts of her body, the discharge recurring usually twice in twenty-four hours. It was preceded by a prickly sensation, and pressure on the skin would accelerate the flow and increase the quantity of blood. The Medico-Chirurgical Review, for October, 1831, gives the case of a female subject to hysteria, who, when the hysteric paroxysm was protracted, was also subject to this bloody perspiration. And in this case she continued at different times to be affected with it for three months, when it gave way to local bleeding and other strong revulsive measures. But the case of the wretched Charles IX, of France, is one of the most striking that has as yet occurred. The account is thus given by De Mezeray: "After the vigor of his youth and the energy of his courage had long struggled against his disease, he was at length reduced by it to his bed at the castle of Vincennes, about the 8th of May, 1674. During the last two weeks of his life his constitution made strange efforts. He was affected with spasms and convulsions of extreme violence. He tossed and agitated himself continually, and his blood gushed from all the outlets of his body, even from the pores of his skin; so that on one occasion he was found bathed in a bloody sweat."

From these and other instances that might be cited, it is clearly evident that the sweating of blood may be produced by intense mental emotion. The instances of it are comparatively rare, it is true, but, nevertheless, perfectly well authenticated.

We think we have abundantly elucidated the fact that they who make this subject a ground of caviling against the Bible display their own ignorance and malignant opposition, rather than any shrewdness of discrimination or superior intelligence.

But the skeptic again inquires, "How could the disciples, in the dead of the night, at the distance of a stone's cast, and without any light, know that Jesus Christ sweat at all—much less could they know that he sweat blood?" Let us examine this cavil. As to the distance, it must be borne in mind that when our Savior said to the disciples, "Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder," he took three of them along with him, and he was only a little removed from them when he endured his agony. What Luke says of his being "withdrawn from them about a stone's cast" is closely connected with his arrival "at—the place," and may, therefore, refer, not to the three he had taken into the interior of the garden to be the special witnesses of his agony, but to the eight he had told to "sit here"—that is, at or near the entrance. That our Savior could have been but "a little" removed from the three disciples is evident from the fact that the garden itself must have been small. Maundrell, if we recollect right, makes it only about one hundred and fifty feet square; while Dr. Durbin says that it contains "about a quarter of an acre," which would make its dimensions something over one hundred feet. These three disciples appear to have been near enough to observe his movements and to hear portions of his prayer. Mark says, "He went forward a little, and fell on the ground." His separation from them, as well as their heaviness—sinking down into the helplessness of sleep—beautifully symbolizes the fact that he had no support from human sympathy, and placed no reliance upon human aid—an "arm of flesh" in his mighty struggle. Yet he had them sufficiently near to be witnesses of what occurred—or at least a part of it. We have a glimpse only of the scene; while, for wise purposes, a veil is drawn over most of it, hiding it from the inspection of mortals.

Again, the caviler assumes that the night was dark, and that they were without torches. How does he know that? It is not said that the night was dark. Every known fact is against such a presumption. Our Savior and his disciples evidently were not troubled either in going forth to the garden or in their intercourse with each other on account of the darkness. They must, then, either have been provided with torches, or the night could not have been very dark. The disciples saw him fall to the earth; they saw also the angel that appeared to strengthen him in his agony. The "lanterns and torches" brought by those who came to arrest him might have been brought simply to enable the officers to explore the dark hiding-places where they supposed he would endeavor to conceal himself from them. Dr. Clarke says—John xviii, 3—"They could have needed the 'lanterns and torches' for no other purpose; it being now the fourteenth day of the moon's age, in the month of Nisan, and consequently she appeared full and bright." At this time of night, too, she would be nearly overhead, and thus would shed a brilliant light, not only to guide the party that were seeking to arrest him, but also to enable the disciples to discern all his movements, and especially the bloody sweat which overspread his face, and rolled down to the earth in great drops. Nor could the indications of it wholly have passed from him when arrested; and the place where the blood dropped upon the earth, even in the morning, must have been a sad witness of the Savior's overwhelming agony. Thus, without any necessity of supposing a supernatural revelation of the fact, we have abundant evidence of our Savior's bloody sweat in the garden. And any cavils that arise out of it must ever rest upon what we do not know, rather than upon any thing we do know—upon our ignorance, and not upon our knowledge.

Again, the skeptic has objected, "If Christ really were divine, really God, it is absurd to represent an angel as being sent to strengthen him." Here, again, is an entire overlooking of the character and office of Christ. He came in his human nature, and in that nature was he at once to set before the world an example of perfect holiness, and to make an atonement for sin. He must then submit to the common conditions of humanity; he must meet his trials, endure his sorrows, and be sustained in his conflicts as are men. It was not wonderful, then, neither was it out of place, but perfectly in keeping with his character and condition, that one of those who are sent forth to be ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, should appear and minister to him in the midst of the sorrowful agony of his soul.

We have not room to append a few thoughts upon the scene of our Savior's agony. Nor have we space to add some practical suggestions we had intended.

We would say to the sinner, Look upon this picture of a Savior's agony, and learn what a fearful thing sin must be, and how awful the agony of despair when the burden of its own sins falls upon the soul, and no ministering angel comes to its relief.

Christian, look upon this scene; mark the divine Redeemer's submission to the Father; and behold here not merely the sufferings of thy redeeming Lord, but a living example of submission, of patience, of calmness, and of trust in God in the severest trial and conflict of thy life's pilgrimage!

DEATH OF BISHOP CAPERS.—Rev. William Capers, D. D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, died of disease of the heart, at his residence in Andersonville, near Charleston, South Carolina, January 29th. Bishop Capers was born in St. Thomas parish, South Carolina, January 26, 1790, and was consequently sixty-five years old at his death. He received the degree of A. M. from the South Carolina College, where he was educated, and was admitted into the annual conference of his native state as a traveling preacher in 1806. In 1828 he visited England as the representative of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States to the British conference, and for several years was one of the general missionary secretaries. He was elected bishop in 1846. In the work of instructing the slaves no man ever did a better or nobler work. His manners were easy and agreeable, his piety marked, his pulpit elocution good, and his style of writing of a superior cast. His remains sleep in the Washington-Street Cemetery, Columbia, South Carolina.

PWEDD CHURCHES.—The Episcopalians have recently had considerable discussion on the question of free seats in churches. The Churchman, New York, is one of the ablest papers of the denomination in this country, and it, editorially and by correspondents, has been laboring zealously to show that the system of renting and selling pews is impolitic and antisciptural. The leading objection which we have seen urged against the practice is, that the poor are in part or entirely excluded from church-going.

THE DEMERARA BELL-BIRD.—The campanero, or bell-bird of Demerara, is of snowy whiteness, and about the size of a jay. A tube, nearly three inches long, rises from its forehead, and this feathery spine the bird can fill with air at pleasure. Every four or five minutes in the depths of the forest, its call may be heard from a distance of three miles, making a tolling noise, like that of a convent bell.

MUSKETS AND MISSIONS.—The United States army numbers about 10,000, who cost the country last year $3,525,240 for pay, subsistence, clothing, etc.—a sum ten times as much as is annually contributed by all the Protestant Churches of the country for missionary purposes, and thirty-three times as much as is raised by the Methodist Episcopal Church for both foreign and domestic missions. In thirty years the United States have spent $200,000,000, for which they have nothing to show but some old forts, guns, battered uniforms, and demoralized veterans. People sometimes talk about the money "used up" in trying to evangelize the heathen; but it would take the Churches, the way they are going on now, at least two hundred years to spend the same amount of money which the United States Government has squandered in thirty years.

JAPANESE RELIGION.—A newspaper item to the effect that the Japanese were a race of Atheists has been widely circulated; but it turns out untrue. They are true and ardent worshippers of a Supreme Being, and believe in a future state, though they do not receive Christianity. During the seventeenth century Christianity was introduced by the Jesuits, and for a time made rapid progress; but the missionaries, inflated by success, became haughty and presumptuous, and beginning to interfere in politics and government, brought about a violent persecution. So deadly a hatred was conceived against the Portuguese, that in the space of forty years they and their religion were completely extirpated. Even to this day, in certain parts of the empire, the custom of trampling on the cross is annually celebrated. To such a pitch were the Japanese exasperated that none of the Romish ceremonial was permitted to survive.

THE GREAT RESPIRATORY APPARATUS.—Dr. C. D. Griswold, in a communication to the Home Journal, has the following: "The great air-passage into the lungs is supposed to divide into six hundred millions of branches, the termination of each being a minute cell—Weber—like the buds upon the terminal branches of a tree. The blood which has been partially exhausted of its nutrient principles in its circulation through the system, returns to the heart, and from thence is sent through the lungs—the vessel through which it passes dividing up in as many branches as the air-tubes, and each passing over an air-cell. Now the air in the air-cell parts with its oxygen, which is received into the blood, and the impurities of the blood—carbonic acid—pass into the air-cell in exchange, to be carried out. So rapidly does this change go on, that the blood, in passing around these air-cells, parts with its impurities, and takes up the necessary nutrient principles for the uses of the system, and is then conveyed back to the heart through the returning vessels, to go out into the general system again."

BAPTIST NEWSPAPERS AND COLLEGES.—Of regular Baptist periodicals in the United States there are twenty-eight weekly newspapers, fifteen monthly publications, and two quarterly reviews. In the British provinces are four weekly newspapers and a quarterly publication, called the Grand Ligne Mission Register. There are in the United States twenty-six Baptist colleges and ten theological institutions, or departments of theology connected with the colleges.

OPERATIONS OF THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The American Tract Society publishes an abstract of its proceedings, and gives the following results of their twenty-nine years' operations: Books published, 9,463,374; tracts, 138,764,824; periodicals, 24,102,600; making 212,330,000 publications—of which 682,933,000 pages have been given away.

EASTERN AND GREEK CHURCHES.—The numbers belonging to the Eastern and Greek Churches are given in the Church Review, from Neale's History, as follows:

Patriarchate of Constantinople, Servia, etc.....	12,000,000
" Alexandria.....	5,000
" Moscow.....	80,000,000
" Antioch and Cyprus.....	120,000
" Jerusalem.....	15,000
In Greece, Montenegro, etc.....	800,000
In the Austrian dominions.....	2,900,000
Total.....	66,740,000

MARRIAGE IN ENGLAND.—In England it seems that the twenty-sixth year is the mean age at which men marry, and the twenty-fifth that at which women marry. The average age of the wife is about forty and a half years, of the husband forty-three years; or, the husband in Great Britain, on the average, is two and a half years older than the wife.

INTERESTING STATISTICS.—The number of languages spoken throughout the world is 8,064; of which 587 are in Europe, 896 in Asia, 270 in Africa, and 1,264 in America. The inhabitants of the globe profess more than 1,000 different religions. There are nearly as many males as females. The mean duration of human life is 28 years. One-fourth part of all children die before the age of seven years. The population of the globe is estimated at nearly 1,000,000,000—of whom about one-third die every ten years, or more than 40 each second. There are more deaths and births in the night than in the day.

DISTASTERS OF THE YEAR.—The entire loss by fire in the United States during 1854 is estimated at $20,578,000: 171 lives were lost at these fires. There were 40 fires where the loss was $100,000 and upward. There were 587 persons killed and 325 wounded during the year by 48 steam-boat accidents; 186 persons were killed and 589 wounded in the 193 railroad accidents that occurred. During the year there were 689 murders, 74 of which were in New York, 64 in California, 50 in Texas, 47 in Louisiana, 46 in Kentucky, 45 in Virginia, 43 in Ohio.

A WATER-CIRCLED BEDSTEAD.—The bedstead of the Emperor of Japan is superbly carved and gilded. By a singularly ingenious contrivance, a current of water may be conducted off around the tester, and at pleasure made to fall in transparent curtains of rain, completely encircling the royal couch, for the double purpose of keeping off the musketoos, and tempering the warm air to the delicious coolness which, in that sultry climate, is the consummation of bliss to reposing listlessness.

CHANGE OF NAMES.—Toward the middle of the fifteenth century it became the fashion among the wits and learned men, particularly in Italy, to change their baptismal names for classic ones. Among the rest Platina, the historian at Rome, calling together his friends, took the name of Callimachus, instead of Phillip. Pope Paul II, who reigned about that time, unluckily for the historian, chanced to be suspicious and illiterate. He had no idea that people could wish to alter their names unless they had some bad design, and actually scrupled not to employ imprisonment and other violent methods to discover the fancied mystery. Platina was most cruelly tortured on this frivolous account. He had nothing to confess; so the Pope, after endeavoring in vain to convict him of heresy and sedition, released him.

ENGLISH PEOPLE'S COLLEGES.—A late number of the English Literary Gazette gives some account of the People's Colleges, which have been established in Sheffield, Nottingham, etc., where courses of instruction adapted for the working classes are efficiently carried on. The old system of "Popular Lectures" having degenerated into mere passing entertainment, the People's College will only introduce lectures as a secondary part of the system, supplementary to the class instructions. Mr. Ruskin has volunteered to teach in the department of drawing and perspective. The fees will be from half a crown to four shillings a course, though the teachers of the first course of the College, at 31 Red Lion Square, will give their lessons gratuitously. The Gazette deprecates the theological element in this course of training.

SOUTHERN METHODIST BOOK CONCERN AND PUBLISHING INTEREST.—The Committee and Agents in this establishment have recently had a special examination of its affairs, with the following results, as we draw them from their figures and from other sources:

OPERATIONS UP TO 1854.

Assets—as per report of old Agent to the last General conference—including first payment of $70,000 from the New York Book Concern, and also $17,061.06 from the Chartered Fund.....$148,736 33
Total liabilities at same date.....30,557 66

Total surplus.....$118,177 68
Or deducting what had been received from the Methodist Episcopal Church; namely.....87,051 06

Gain since the organization of the South. Church.....$31,126 63
The General conference, to meet the deficiency of their six papers, ordered the payment of.....31,000 00

Balance.....$126 68

In the above "assets" also appear to have been improperly included $16,285.16, drawn by Commissioners in the Church suit; and also about $5,500 advanced on account of the Expositor and True Issue, making.....21,785 16

Deficiency or loss.....$21,668 53

The Agents, we believe, up to this time, have declined paying the $31,000.

PRESENT CONDITION.

The total surplus above is.....$118,177 68

Add bonds of New York Book Concern.....121,000 00

DR. BEAUMONT.—Rev. Dr. Joseph Beaumont, of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, England, expired suddenly in the pulpit of Waltham-Street Chapel, Hull, England, January 21st. Just as he had finished reading these two lines of the opening hymn,

"Thee while the first archangel sings,
He hides his face behind his wings,"

he suddenly gave a start back in the pulpit, fell down, and shortly afterward expired. He was in the sixty-first year of his age, and had been forty-two years in the ministry. He was a most able and excellent minister of the Gospel.

THE BURNETT TREATIES, GREAT BRITAIN.—The decision of the great literary prizes—one of $9,000 and another of $3,000—to the authors of the two best treatises on "The Being and Attributes of God," was announced January 20th. The successful competitors were found to be—for the first prize, the Rev. Robert Anchor Thompson, A. M., Louth, Lincolnshire; and for the second, the Rev. John Tulloch, manse of Kettins, Cupar Angus, Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrew's, Scotland. The judges were Professors Baden Powell, Henry Rodgers, and Mr. Isaac Taylor. They were unanimous in their judgment. The essays varied in length, from a few sheets to six volumes, and several of them were written in female hand. Several other candidates, and one in particular, were declared to have attained high excellence.

Literary Notices.

NEW BOOKS.

THE FEMALE PROSE WRITERS OF AMERICA. With Portraits, Biographical Notices, and Specimens of their Writings. By John S. Hart, LL. D. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Philadelphia: E. H. Butler & Co.—This is a large 8vo. of five hundred and thirty-six pages, double column, printed on fine calendered paper, and is an elegant specimen of typography as well as binding. It contains sketches of sixty-one female prose writers of America, with choice selections from their writings, and constitutes a splendid gallery of distinguished literary women. Among the distinguished names on this catalogue are C. M. Sedgwick, Caroline Gilman, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Willard, Mrs. A. H. L. Phelps, Mrs. Kirkland, Mrs. Child, Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Stowe, Elizabeth Wetherell, Alice Cary, H. F. Lee, Ellen Louise Chandler, etc. It is illustrated with portraits of Fanny Forrester, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs. Kirkland, Mrs. Hentz, Mrs. Ellett, Mrs. Stephens, Margaret Fuller, and Mrs. Neal. The editorial labor has been performed by Professor Hart with sound discrimination, excellent good taste, and great fidelity. The great difficulty of obtaining material for biographical sketches has been overcome with good success, and the sketches are well prepared and full of interest. As a "gift-book," this work has few equals. We trust ladies who are providing elegant books for their center-tables will honor both their own good taste and their sex, by putting there such works as this instead of the elegant trash too often found in such places. It may be obtained through booksellers generally.

FULL PROOF OF THE MINISTRY: A Sequel to the Boy who was trained up to be a Clergyman. By John N. Norton, A. M., Rector of Ascension Church, Frankfort, Ky.—A pretty good story, in which "the sects" receive some side thrusts, and "the Church" through great tribulation rises to honor and great success. The work gives evidence of Mr. Norton's loyalty to "the Church," but is a poor comment upon his catholicity. Indeed, a meaner manifestation of narrow-minded bigotry we have rarely seen. Published by Redfield, New York; and for sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

ELEMENTS OF MENTAL SCIENCE. By Rev. Moses Smith, A. M.—The whole title of the above work is, "A New and Extensive Analytical Examination of the Elements of Mental Science: containing evidence of difference, distinguishing between elements of mind which lie at the foundation of mental action, and elements of mind which lie at the foundation of moral action." The analysis of the mental powers followed here lacks simplicity in some points and involves some repetition. The author also has in some instances failed to express himself with that perspicuity especially necessary in treatises of this kind. Yet the work contains very much that is valuable, and we commend it to the attention of students in mental science.

MEMOIRS OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON. By Count De Las Casas. New York: Redfield. Four Volumes. 12mo.—This work contains the life, exile, and conversations of Napoleon, and is enriched with portraits and other illustrations. Las Casas is a most enthusiastic admirer—almost worshiper—of the great military adventurer. He says in his preface:

"Circumstances the most extraordinary have long kept me near the most extraordinary man that ever existed. Admiration made me follow him without knowing him, and when I did know him, love alone would have fixed me forever near his person. The world is full of his glory, his deeds, and his monuments; but no one knows the true shades of his character, his private qualities, or the natural disposition of his soul. This great void I undertake to fill up, and for such a task I possess advantages unexampled in history.

"I collected and recorded, day by day, all that I saw of Napoleon, all that I heard him say, during the period of eighteen months in which I was constantly about his person. In these conversations, which were full of confidence, and which seemed to pass, as it were, in another world, he could not fail to be portrayed by himself as if in a mirror, in every point of view, and under every aspect. Henceforth the world may freely study him: there can be no error in the materials."

For sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

A YEAR OF THE WAR. By Adam G. De Gurovski, a Citizen of the United States. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Here is a Pole who seems ambitious to do honor to "the Great Bear," and to write the epitaph of a hopeless denationalization over the grave of his own country.

THE WAY FROM SIN TO SANCTIFICATION, HOLINESS, AND HEAVEN, is a carefully prepared and practical volume from the pen of Rev. T. Spicer, A. M., embracing the following topics: The Moral Disease; The Healing Fountain; The Way to the Savior; The Great Salvation, and also Admonitory Counsel addressed to Awakened and to Impenitent Sinners. Printed at the Conference Office, New York, and for sale at the Methodist bookstores.

REST FOR THE SOUL IN GOD. Funeral Discourse. By Rev. C. B. Davidson. Preached in Evansville, Ia., on the Occasion of the Death of Mr. James Reilly.—A chaste, beautiful, and appropriate discourse.

CHRISTIAN SANCTIFICATION.—This is a sermon on the nature, subjects, and means of sanctification, by Rev. M. P. Jameson, A. M. The author thus sets forth his aim: "I aim at the emancipation of honest souls from the net-work of egotistical mystification." If we understand him, he assumes that the young convert attains to "perfect love" when regenerated, and that "second blessing," as it has sometimes been called, "is excluded by the law of regeneration." He defines sanctification to be "the progressive conformity of the heart and life to the will of God." Sanctification thus defined, he says, "never can be completed in this life," and intimates that the beatified soul may continue to march on in this progressive sanctification "throughout the mighty years of eternity." Whether the sermon is orthodox or heterodox will depend altogether upon the meaning applied to the terms employed. But one thing is certain, the tone that pervades it—the sneering allusions to the "Guides" and "Ways," to the experience of the "Katy and Hetty's," to the "special class of persons who are 'lost in the ocean of perfect love,'" and to those who are represented as wishing to impose upon believers "yokes and burdens," "additional to what God required at their hands," fall below the dignity of the subject, and mar the beauty of the discourse. In all frankness and kindness, we must express our doubt whether such a discourse is calculated to promote the great work of sanctification any where. After all this caveat, we must say the discourse contains some pertinent truths, and forcibly put.

Notes and Queries.

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.—A brother minister, after expressing, in terms that we need not repeat here, the satisfaction derived from our article on the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, says, "I should be glad to have you reconcile the theory you suggest with Hebrews vi, 4, 5, 6."

Our attempted solution of that extremely difficult and much-controverted passage, Matthew xii, 31, 32, is perhaps hardly worthy of being dignified with the title of "theory." In the preparation of that article want of space compelled us to omit what we had prepared upon the very point presented in the above query; it also obliged us to omit several other things, that would have been in place had we felt that the circumstances called for a more extended and guarded exposition. As it was, we preferred to give the subject in outline, directing more especial attention to the insuperable objections that lie against the more commonly received exposition of that passage.

The conclusion which we reached was, that the "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" did not consist in any one sin, but in a course of continued willful and hardened resistance to the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit; and that in sinning thus there is a tendency to fixedness of character; but whether unalterable fixedness of character is ever reached in this life we did not presume to say, further than that there are strong presumptions against such a supposition. We discarded the idea that it was a peculiar sin which could be committed only while our Savior was upon earth; but, on the other hand, endeavored to show that every obstinate and persevering sinner in the end becomes guilty of the irre-missible sin.

Now we are prepared to answer the query—not dogmatically, but according to the light we have. Our Savior was not addressing Christian believers, but unbelieving Jews—sinners. We may, therefore, understand it as an admonition addressed to all sinners, premonishing them that their sins are tending to the accumulation of irremissible guilt. Such, precisely, we are inclined to think, was the design of the apostle's admonition addressed to apostatizing Christians, premonishing them of the danger of total and final apostasy. The apostates here referred to can not be renewed again, for the very reason that they persistently reject the only plan of salvation and renounce the only scheme of redemption. So long as they do this, their renewal to God is impossible, in just the same sense that the persistent sinner "hath never forgiveness." The apostle could not have meant that the renewal of a backslider is impossible; for the most gracious assurances are given even to those who have so far apostatized that "repentance" and doing over again their "first works" have become necessary—even to such the most gracious assurances are given that, if they will return, God will accept them graciously.

SUNDAY QUERIES PROPOSED.—We give below sundry queries that have been proposed for this department, and invite brief, pertinent solutions of them from our literary friends:

"Mr. Editor,—I should like for you to tell us in your 'Notes' what is meant by the word 'signed' which is often attached to a man's name when he affixes it to a document; and why do we say that he has 'signed' a note, 'signed' a deed, etc.? Also, I should like to know how and when such a phrase came into use.

"Yours, truly, A. R. MCCCCO."

Query.—Is the mind conscious of its own existence, or only of its own operations?

Query.—What is the origin of "tis for tat"?

"Dear Brother,—I see you have a space for notes and queries. If you please, let me propound a question to be answered in the Repository. From whence originated surnames? It used to be Moses, John, James; now it is Thomas Hardin, James Makewell, etc. Please give me, as well as your other readers, a few notes on this matter, and oblige

A READER OF THE REPOSITORY."

"Mr. Editor,—Will some of the contributors to your department of 'Notes and Queries' inform your readers how the phrase 'Follow suit' originated?

"A READER."

"Mr. Editor,—Not long since I heard the saying, 'Let us make the ballads of a people, and I don't care who makes their laws,' attributed by a gentleman who has some pretensions to literature to Washington Irving. It did not strike me as being correct; and yet I am at a loss to discover where the expression originated. Will you inform us?

J. RPO."

ORIGIN OF POPULAR VULGARISMS.—It is singular how many of our most popular vulgarisms have their origin in some whimsical perversion of language or of fact. Take for example: "He! Betty Martin!" a phrase "well traveled." Its origin seems to be as follows: A Popish form of prayer addressed to St. Martin, one of the worthies of the Roman calendar, commences with the words, "O, mihi, beate Martine;" which were vulgarly anglicized, "My eye, and Betty Martin," and finally corrupted still farther to "He! Betty Martin!"

"MIND YOUR P'S AND Q'S."—The singular phrase, "Mind your P's and Q's," is said to have originated as follows: In the old English ale-houses, the pints and quarts of beer were scored down against the beer-bibber. Hence, when one got to drinking rather freely, he was admonished to "mind his P's and Q's," or pints and quarts.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD JARGON.—The word jargon is derived, by corruption, from the Italian chierco, a clergyman. When the common people heard the Latin tongue used in the liturgies and prayers of the Church, they called it—being a language they did not understand—chiericon; that is, clergyman's language. Chiericon soon slid into jargon, just as chirurgicon has softened itself in surgeon.

WHERE WILL MAN SPEND ETERNITY?—The editor of a leading Boston religious paper in discussing this question uses these words:

"After the resurrection, the saints will have bodies, and will need ground to tread upon such as can be found only in the planetary worlds. Their bodies will be capable of migration from world to world; for like those of Enoch and Elijah, and the body of Christ which was taken up into heaven, they must have this as one of the properties of all the bodies that are made like to Christ's glorious body. With this endowment, therefore, the redeemed from earth may colonize any of the planets. It may be that, up to this hour, not a single star has been trodden by the foot of a rational and immortal being; yet that, in the fullness of time, these countless worlds shall sustain a population, which had first been born, buried, and raised from the dead, on our earth.

"If the planets are to be the abode of the redeemed, so also may they be of the lost. It may be true, as appears to the eye of astronomy, that some of the planets, too distant from the sun, and others too near, would make miserable abodes for human beings; and that they so exist for the very purpose of becoming the abodes of the wretched—penal colonies to receive the criminals sentenced from this world."

Other people have had their speculations; but they are but speculations as to where heaven and hell may be located, or where the redeemed and lost may spend their eternity of being.

THE DARKNESS AT THE CRUCIFIXION.—Rev. H. Blunt, England, in a volume of lectures, states the following: "Dionysius, the Areopagite, being at Heliopolis, in Egypt, at the time of our Lord's crucifixion, exclaimed, when he beheld the midday darkness that attended that awful event, 'Either the God of nature suffers, or the frame of the world will be dissolved!'" The opinion frequently prevails that none but Christian writers mentioned the occurrence of the crucifixion; but there are numerous Pagans besides Dionysius who have stated the event and the circumstances connected with it.

CARRYING THE WAR INTO AFRICA.—In one of the famous wars between Carthage and Rome, about two thousand, five hundred years ago, Hannibal, a Carthaginian leader, led his army into Italy, and for several years continued to threaten the city, and lay waste the surrounding country. Scipio, a Roman general, saw the necessity of getting rid of Hannibal and his forces; so he determined to lead an army into Africa, and threaten Carthage, and thus make it necessary for Hannibal to return home for its defense. This scheme had its intended effect; and in all time, this retaliating upon an enemy, by adopting his own tactics, is called "carrying the war into Africa."

Mirror of Apothegm, Wit, Repartee, and Anecdote.

"ONE EXCELLENT PASSAGE."—A clergyman once occupied the pulpit of the late William Howels, whose discourse, on account of its heresy, gave umbrage to the pastor. When the sermon was concluded, this clergyman asked him in the vestry-room how he liked his discourse. "There was one excellent passage," said Howels—"a passage which particularly gratified me." "Which was that?" replied the other, not a little rejoiced by the seeming approval of such a man. "Why, sir," said Howels, "the passage I was most delighted with was your passage from the pulpit to the vestry-room!"

CRISPIN AND QUIRK, OR A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.—

A son of the bar to a son of the awl
Three half crowns was indebted for shoes;
 And though frequently Crispin was destined to call,
 Still Quirk would the payment refuse.
 Crispin met him one day; and began, "My friend Quirk,
 Can a lawyer be summon'd, I pray?"
 "O yes," Quirk replied. Crisp, to finish the work,
 "I'll summons your worship to-day."
 "That trouble," the lawyer rejoind'd, "I'll not give;"
 Then temperance whipt out in a trice;
 "Your bill's three half crowns—then this balance receive,
 The rest is my charge for advice!"

PLAINTIFF vs. DEFENDANT.—On a trial at the Admiralty Sessions for shooting a seaman, the counsel for the crown asked one of the witnesses which he was for, plaintiff or defendant. "Plaintiff or defendant!" said the sailor, scratching his head; "why I don't know what you mean by plaintiff or defendant. I come to speak for that man there!" pointing at the prisoner. "You are a pretty fellow for a witness," says the counsel, "not to know what plaintiff or defendant means." Some time after, being asked by the same counsel what part of the ship he was in at the time, "Abaft the binnacle, my lord," says the sailor. "Abaft the binnacle!" replied the barrister; "what part of the ship is that?" "Ha, ha, ha!" chuckled the sailor; "an't you a pretty fellow for a counselor," pointing archly at him with his finger, "not to know what abaft the binnacle is?"

THREE KINDS OF MEN IN THE WORLD.—Somebody says there are three kinds of men in this world—the "wills," the "won'ts," and the "can'ts." The first effect every thing, the next oppose every thing, and the last fail in every thing. "I will" builds our railroads and steamboats; "I won't" don't believe in experiments and nonsense; while "I can't" grows weeds for wheat, and commonly ends his days in the slow digestion of a court of bankruptcy.

THE PETITION OF THE LETTER H.—Sheweth—That many ladies and gentlemen, and likewise other persons of different occupations, trades, characters, and dispositions, to whom h used to have free access, have now either totally forsaken him, or associated him with a company of strangers, among whom he cuts a most ridiculous figure.

A young lady, to the great mortification of h, was observing the other day that ills made a pretty contrast with the valleys below, that the ouces were prettily interspersed among the woods, and that she was fond of *ear*ing the howls in the evenings. She admires the arbor of Portsmouth—she is fond of riding on crackback, and is constantly shooting harrows at susceptible arts. In the middle of summer she drinks hale at her meals, and hunts hartichokes without receiving any arm from them. She ates of weather, but likes a clear eaven; and yet I assure you she is a very hamiable young lady; she as a fine air, sweet eyes, quick hears, delicate harms, and a good art.

PETITION OF THE LETTER H TO THE INHABITANTS OF KIDDERMINSTER, ENGLAND.—Protesting.

Whereas, by you I have been driven
 From 'ouse, from 'ome, from 'ope, from 'eaven,
 And placed by your most learned society
 In hexile, hanguish, and hannxiety;
 Nay, charged, without one just pretense,
 With harragance and himpudence—
 I here demand full restitution,
 And beg you'll mend your helo-cution.

THE TRUTH UNWITTINGLY TOLD.—The managers of a Roman Catholic school, near Dublin, Ireland, state at the bottom of their advertisement: "Poor Protestant children taken in and done for!" Charming confession!

POETICAL SUBLIMITY.—I stood alone in the halls of my ancestors. The silver moonbeams struggling through a casement shed a wild luster over the dreamy solitude. I passed in agony the deserted chambers. I cried, in anguish, "Where are the friends of my youth?" Echo answered, "Why, my good fellow, I haven't the slightest idea."

WHAT A GOOD WIFE SHOULD BE LIKE AND NOT LIKE.—A good wife should be like three things; which three things should not be like her.

First. She should be like a snail, to keep within her own house; but she should not be like a snail, to carry all she has on her back.

Second. She should be like an echo, to speak when spoken to; but she should not be like an echo, always to have the last word.

Third. She should be like a town-clock, always to keep time and regularity; but she should not be like a town-clock, to speak so loud that all the town may hear her.

WHAT SELFISHNESS IS AND DOES.—Selfishness is poverty; it is the most utter destitution of a human being. It can bring nothing to his relief; it adds soreness to his sorrows; it sharpens his pains; it aggravates all the losses he is liable to endure, and when goaded to extremes, often turns destroyer and strikes its last blows on himself. It gives us nothing to rest in or fly to in trouble; it turns our affections on ourselves, self on self, as the sap of a tree descending out of season from its heavenward branches, and making not only its life useless, but its growth downward.

THE LITTLE TROUBLES.—It is the little troubles that wear the heart out. It is easier to throw a bombshell a mile than a feather—even with artillery. Forty little debts of one dollar each will cause you more trouble and dunning than one big one of a thousand.

LACK OF BRAINS.—A poor fellow, having got his skull fractured, was told by the doctor that the brain was visible; on which he remarked, "Doctor, write to my father, for he always declared I had none."

Editor's Table.

CLOSE OF THE NUMBER.—Having done the best we could toward filling another number with interesting and useful matter, we now come to the work of gleaning the fragments that are scattered around us. In these chitchats "with you, dear reader in that other chair," you must not expect we shall be very formal or precise. We sometimes indulge in a short gossiping review of our contents; but we have not space for that now. Our readers will, therefore, do this work for themselves.

OUR ENGRAVINGS for the month present quite a contrast. "In for It" presents an equestrian in no very comfortable plight. A gust of wind has just swept by him, and is rolling up the dust behind; while just before him comes down in one broad sheet an outpouring from the skies. Our hero is astride a noble horse, to whose fine parts the artist has done ample justice; and he is evidently preparing himself heroically to brave the furious onset. We trust both horse and rider will get through with no other damage than a thorough drenching.

Portrait of Mrs. Hale.—We think our readers will give the artist credit for having got up a fine picture. It is from a portrait painted by T. B. Read, the poet-painter; and was engraved expressly to form one of our series of engravings and sketches of "The Literary Women of America." We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Hale is preparing a revised and enlarged edition of "Woman's Record;" and also, as she states in a note to us, that she is now seeking material to enable her to give a fuller account of female missionaries, and especially those connected with Methodist missions, than her invaluable work at first contained. Our Methodist friends, who have knowledge of any facts pertaining to our female missionaries, would do the cause of religion a service by putting her in possession of such facts. We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Olin, widow of the late Dr. Olin, is also engaged in the good work of assisting to make Mrs. Hale's collection complete.

AN ERRATUM.—In the article by Bishop Morris, in our last number, he is made to say, on page 130, fifth line from the top, "the more they read of it"—that is, of fictitious and ungodly literature—"the less they know of it;" which should have read, "the less they know, or care to know, of what is essential to their everlasting welfare." How the two little intruders—"of it"—got in, or how they eluded the eye of our proof-reader after they had got in, we are unable to say.

A WORD TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS we would utter, if we could gain their ear for a moment. You must not expect us to write special letters to inform you whether your articles are "accepted" or not. We can't do it—haven't time. Nor can we tell when any special article will be published. So long as such articles neither appear in our pages nor are mentioned among the "rejected," their authors may infer that their favorites are either standing at the gate waiting their turn, or are placed among the venerable and honorable "reserves," to be called out as emergency may require. This is the best we can do for you, friends. We are frank, however, to say, that we don't let a capital article wait long.

ARTICLES DECLINED.—"Twilight Musings" was accompanied by no name; hardly passable if it had been. "The Angel's Call," "Poetry," "Music," "Treasures of Earth and Heaven," "To Nannie," "Precious Bible! Book Divine," "A Voice from the Grave," "A Fragment," and "Withered Flowers," are evidently from rather unpracticed hands. Their authors with more practice will no doubt succeed better.

We are sorry to disoblige the author of "The Home Hearth" and the "Old Mill Wheel," but neither will answer our purpose. From the latter we excerpt a fine stanza:

"Now the ponderous wheel revolving,
Cuts the streamlet's waves apart,
And from out the splashing waters
Sweetest voices seem to start,
Sympathizing with the changing
Feelings of the human heart."

This poem contains some fine thoughts and some beautiful lines; but it lacks uniformity.

"Push, Keep Pushing, by Fritz," has got more push than poetry in it. We give a specimen:

"Push, push, still keep pushing—why faint by the way?
Why ever be sad or desponding?
The night, dark and stormy, must give place to day;
These thick mists will soon be abounding."

We advise the author to stop pushing the Muses, lest they should take vengeance upon him one of these days.

"A Dissertation upon Books" will not answer. "Jane Varel," ditto. "Disappointment," rather prosy.

The article by "A New Contributor" is altogether too adulatory; and in addition to that, we doubt whether any good moral effect can result from such articles.

We must also lay aside "I'll Wait," etc., "The Passage of the Red Sea," "A Mother's Soliloquy," and "Clarence Hastings." "Music" has some good qualities; not enough, however, to redeem it. By the way, Shakespeare never said, "The man that hath no music in his soul is fit for murder, treachery, and death." "Evening Reflections" was accompanied by no name.

We clip a few lines from a poem written by a blind girl on receiving the likeness of an only niece:

"The likeness of my only niece
To me has just been given;
They say she has a pleasing face,
But from my view 'tis hidden.
To others it may seem quite strange
Such gifts afford me pleasure;
But all mementos from my friends
I hold as sacred treasure.
In fancy, it I love to view,
Because she is my brother's;
I take some real pleasure, too,
In showing it to others."

We must make an excerpt from "The Soliloquy of a Poor Student," though we can not publish the entire piece. It is a cold night; the clock strikes twelve; his lamp burns low; his fire goes out for want of coal; the frost gathers upon the very grate; the wind and snow find entrance through his creviced cabin, and whistle round his head; his thin coat gives free ingress to the cold; and as he attempts to indite a letter to his distant mother, the ink freezes in his pen, his fingers grow stiff, and his feet become numb. His first thought is, that with his three remaining cents he will have wood; but then how shall he pay the postage of his letter to his mother? If he retires to his cot, it will be to freeze; so he rises and paces the floor of his room to recover warmth to his chilled frame, and, as he walks, he says:

"O mighty shades
Of poets who have tread this self-same path,
Come now, from your high bowers of glory, come,
And walk this cell with me, till morning light!
I feel their presence. Now around my brow
There runs a thrill; it shoots through all my frame.
I'm warm. I feel not hunger; I am strong;
External circumstances can never quench
The vital vigor of a soul of flame.
Hail, elder brothers! spirits of pure fire!
Great victors over time and destiny!
And now illustrious, crowned with fadeless bays,
Gods of the lyre, kings of the realms of thought,
Creations of your own; your own bright dower;
Woke from nonentity to shine forever.
O glorious boon! to thrill the human heart,
And make its pulses own your potent touch,
And lay your hands among its strings at will,
And wake its deathless music. Be this mine.
Give me the power to sweep a lyre like this,
And tune its notes to virtue and to God;
And then let sorrow come; blow, wintry wind;
Gather round me, hunger, want, despair;
Fall thick upon my heart, ye frosts of time;
I'll laugh and mock your rage. Above you all,
In clear, proud numbers, victory shall swell,
Although a dying hand shall sweep the strings."

The author tells us that the above was written impromptu, and under circumstances that suggested it pretty strongly.

SOMETHING FOR THE CHILDREN.—"Do you intend," says a friend, "to ignore the claims of the little ones to attention in your pages?" Not at all, sir. And if you or any of your friends, or any of our other friends, have any gleanings in this line, we hope to be favored with them. Here, however, are a few that are too good to be lost. We insert them, therefore, to the exclusion of several other things we had designed:

"You Said that Afore."—The literary criticisms of children are sometimes not despicable. An extemporaneous preacher of ability relates one from which he derived advantage. His reputation for eloquence was increasing, and he was encountering some unperceived dangers, which spring from the pleasure of fluency. He was on one occasion induced to lecture in a large apartment of a private dwelling. It was densely crowded, and the uninterrupted attention flattered and quickened the zeal of the speaker. Almost at his feet sat a very small boy, who never turned his eyes from the face of the orator. Perhaps in his secret heart was a joy of satisfaction, that he could thus fascinate both the simple and the wise. Suddenly the lips of the child-orator were opened:

"You said that afore."

Wholesome truth, though unpalatable. The fluent speaker remembered, and made good use of it. After the lapse of years he said, that many times when he had been tempted to remit laborious study, or logical arrangement, the echo of that little shrill voice, "You said that afore," returned to him, bringing the patience of wisdom.

The Little Boy and his Learned Grandfather.—A young child was permitted to pay a visit to his grandfather. He knew that he was highly venerated for his talents and learning, and felt a proportionate ambition to make a favorable impression. Seating himself with great deliberation, in a high chair, he crossed his short legs, and taking one small foot in his hand, and holding his head slightly on one side, looked in the face of the lofty, dignified man, and said,

"What's your opinion, sir, of the restoration of the Jews?"

The Angels' Fingers pointing at us.—A little girl, looking at the stars as they came twinkling one by one through the boughs of the trees, exclaimed, "See, there are the angels' fingers pointing to us."

The Little Boy and the Echo.—A boy walking through a wood happened to bark like a dog, an accomplishment which he had taken pains to acquire, and was surprised to hear an answer in his own tones.

"Doggy! doggy!" said he, and there was a quick reply of "doggy, doggy."

"Who are you?" called the boy.

"Who are you?" was the response.

To the clear voice of the questioner he replied, "Why, George Thompson!" and this was repeated more than once, in such a mocking manner that he grew angry, and exclaimed, "What a fool you are!"

Hearing this reverberated, he ran home, much excited, and told his father there was a bad boy in the woods, shouting and calling him names.

STRAY GERMS.—Memory and Action.—Memory presides over the Past; Action presides over the Present. The first lives in a rich temple, hung with glorious trophies, and lined with tombs; the other has no shrine but Duty, and it walks the earth like a spirit.—Reveries of a Bachelor.

The Past and the Present.—The Past belongs to God; the Present only is ours. And short as it is, there is more in it and of it than we can well manage. The man who can grapple it, and measure it, and fill it with his purpose, is doing a man's work: none can do more; but there are thousands who do less.—Ibid.

The Future.—The Future is a great land; a man can not go round it in a day; he can not measure it with a bound; he can not bind its harvests into a single sheaf. It is wider than the vision, and has no end.—Ibid.

The Beauty of Goodness.—The beauty which wins permanent affection is the beauty of goodness. Goodness will soften the hardest and light up the dullest features. Physical beauty may excite passion, and intellect attract admiration, only goodness can win everlasting love.—Grace Aguilar.

What you may Write on Infancy.—Infancy is a fair page upon which you may write—goodness, happiness, heaven, or sin, misery, hell. And the words once written, no chemical art can erase them. Infancy is the soft metal in the molder's hands; he may shape it in the image of a fiend or the form of an angel—and when finished the statue hardens into rock, which nothing but the hammer of God's providence can break; nothing but the fire of God's providence can melt for remolding.—Ibid.

Wealth, honor, and favor may come upon a man by chance; nay, they may be cast upon him without so much as looking after them; but virtue is the work of industry and labor; and certainly it is worth the while to purchase that good which brings all others along with it.

OUR COURSE IS STILL ONWARD.—Our clerk who has charge of the Repository department informs us, that he has just completed mailing the work for March, and that of our edition of twenty-three thousand only about fifty are left. Subscribers are still coming in at this date—March 1st—at a rate which indicates that an edition of twenty-five thousand will be wanted before the close of the volume.

EGYPT, ASSYRIA, AND THE BIBLE.

BY PROFESSOR R. A. LAFITTE.

WHAT three words in sacred or profane history call up such a crowd of associations as Egypt, Assyria, and the Bible? Egypt, the cradle of learning; a mighty nation when Abraham was an exile and Jacob a wanderer; great when Joseph was a slave and Moses an infant exposed to death; whose monuments to-day, the wonder and admiration of the world, attest her greatness and power, pointing back to a period anterior to the birth of Grecian civilization and Roman dominion! Egypt, in her prowess and power, in her magnificence and wealth, stands out like her own pyramids, with a boldness of outline that has made her the wonder of ages. Assyria, the birthplace of the race, where the garden was planted in beauty, and seraph wings in downward flight scattered heavenly fragrance; the home of mighty cities and powerful nations, whose kings have often desolated Judea, desecrated the temple of God, and felt the avenging hand of Jehovah; where the ark bore its precious burden above a submerged world, and where Noah built his altar of sacrifice spanned by the bow of the covenant! But the Bible is more wonderful than either. Those are in ruins; this survives the wreck of ages, a monument rivaling Egypt's mighty works. Little did the haughty king imagine that the history of his power and greatness should alone be preserved by the records of his despised slaves. Yet so it is. Egyptian history begins on that dark night, when, from their homes in Goshen, the persecuted people of God took their way toward the Red Sea. Assyria rises up from her shroud of death, where she has long slumbered, and Egypt lives in the ruins of her former power, crumbled by the lapse of ages, and shattered by the shock of war; but the Bible is as fresh and undimmed by the passage of time and the change of nations as when it was given from the Mount, or laid up in the Temple.

The Egyptians were the most zealous race of writers that ever lived. Their homes, their temples, their furniture, even their tombs are covered with historic inscriptions, and yet, strange as it may seem, no history of their nation has come down to us, and all that was known to us previous to the reading of the inscriptions on the monuments was gathered from other sources. Clemens, of Alexandria, who lived about 200 A. D., writes more fully of the ancient Egyptians, and of their language, than any other person. He speaks of ancient Egyptian books, called the "Sacred Books," and consisting of forty volumes. Of these only one is extant, which is called the "Book of the Dead," describing the rites and ceremonies for the burial of the dead. A proof of its great antiquity is in the fact that it is written with the same character as the inscriptions upon the oldest monuments.

There is another important work written by Manetho, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 180 B. C. The original was in three volumes, and contained the history of the ancient kings and their succession. This work has been lost, but large parts of it are quoted by Josephus, Eusebius, and others.

The oldest historian, however, who has written concerning Egypt is Herodotus, the father of Grecian history. Having been expelled from his native country for some offense, he traveled extensively, and spent, during the time, a year in Egypt. The second book of his history is devoted to Egypt, detailing something of its history, and the manners and customs of the people. His knowledge was chiefly derived from the priests, and is not always trustworthy. Herodotus lived 484 B. C. Diodorus Siculus, also a Greek historian, visited Egypt about 58 B. C., and has written largely upon Egyptian history; but he is not considered as good authority as Herodotus. These comprise all the ancient writings now extant concerning the ancient Egyptians. For the remainder of its history we must apply to the monuments.

The line of succession in the kings of Egypt, as given by Manetho, was corroborated by a slab of stone dug out of the ruins of a temple just above Abydos, which formed part of the vestibule. It is called the "Tablet of Abydos," and is now in the British Museum. Although fragmentary, it contains a series of rings inclosing the names of a long line of Egyptian kings, mostly agreeing with the names of Manetho.

Before going further, it may be interesting to notice the character of the inscriptions upon the monuments of Egypt. It had long been supposed by scholars that the characters cut in the walls of the temples and houses were real historic records; but no Daniel could be found to read the "handwriting upon the wall." It was not till the time of Napoleon's great expedition into Egypt that any approach was made to the true reading of the hieroglyphics. That expedition was accompanied by a corps of the most learned men in France, and in their survey of the ruins of the Nile they took copies of the inscriptions, and these were sent to the various learned societies of Europe. A new and increased interest was felt in trying to find the key of these hidden treasures. The first step toward the accomplishment of this object was the satisfactory proof obtained, that the Coptic was the language of the ancient Egyptians. Soon after Young discovered that the characters were not entirely pictorial or symbolical, but alphabetical in their nature, representing Coptic words. The fortunate discovery of the Rosetta Stone, which contained an inscription in three forms, the hieroglyphic, demotic, and Greek, and the rise of Champollion le Jeune, crowned with success the long and patient labors of many renowned scholars. Egypt is no longer a sealed record.

As one of the first fruits of this discovery the claims of certain French infidels were hushed. At Dendera is a temple, having beautifully represented upon its ceiling the zodiac, which was declared to be four thousand years old. But the reading of the inscriptions upon it showed that it was built in the time of Augustus. Another temple at Eneh was declared to be not less than seventeen thousand years old, but it was found to have been built in the time of Antoninus, about 140 A. D. And so each succeeding year and each fresh discovery have but increased the proofs of the verity of Scripture history.

Pictorial writing seems to be the earliest that prevails in any semi-barbarous nation. It was used by the aboriginals of this country. Pictorial epistles were sent to Montezuma to apprise him of the landing and approach of the bold invader.

Such, undoubtedly, was the original form of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, becoming more and more symbolical and alphabetic in their nature, till all similarity to the original was nearly lost, and the character became merely an arbitrary sign. The hieroglyphical language takes the form of some object to represent the initial sound of the Coptic word, which is the name of that animal: as in our language, a lion would stand for L, a boat for B, a church for C, etc. As several words began with the same letter, so there would very naturally happen to be ten objects representing the same letter. These homophones, however, were limited in number. In accordance with all the Shemitic languages the vowels were not written, but only the consonants. The following illustration, copied from Gliddon, will give a general idea of hieroglyphical writing.

Take the word America, and a column of figures of the following objects would represent the word:

A an asp, symbolic of sovereignty.

M a mace, indicative of military dominion.

E an eagle, the national arms—courage.

R a ram, denoting frontal power—intellect.

I an infant, typifying the juvenile age of our country.

C a cake or consecrated wafer, symbolical of a civilized region.

A an anchor, denoting commerce.

Underneath these figures would be a waved line, denoting a country. This is called a determinate, and some sign is always affixed to these words, denoting the class. These would have been the symbols for America if all the letters had been used; but omitting the vowels, and M R C would be the country of America.

In time only an outline or a part of the object would be used, instead of a minute representation of the object, and this abridging continued till arbitrary characters were formed, bearing little resemblance to the originals. Thus two other forms of writing were derived from the hieroglyphic, the hieratic, or priestly, and the enchorial, or demotic, or popular language of a later date.

The traveler in Egypt is struck with wonder, not only at the titanic character of the ruins, but still more, if possible, at their wonderful preservation. The architecture looks as fresh as if just from the hand of the artisan. Some unfinished blocks in the quarries at Syene look as if the workmen had just left their work, so fresh are the marks of their tools, and yet two thousand years have nearly rolled away since the sound of the hammer ceased. There are temples that have been roofless for centuries, with the paintings as fresh upon the walls as if but just executed. An obelisk, that had stood undecayed and undecaying in Egypt for ages, upon its removal to Paris began to decay so fast that government was obliged to coat it with a preparation of India Rubber to protect it from the ravages of the climate. This wonderful preservation is due to the exceeding dryness of the air. A long and narrow strip of land situated between two deserts, Egypt is never wet by fertilizing showers, but owes its fertility to the annual overflowings of the Nile, the adored river-god of the Pharaohs.

The melting of the snow on the mountains of central Africa causes the river to begin to rise about the twenty-first of June. In July it overflows, and subsides in September. A rich deposit of mud is left, and ere the waters subside the husbandman wades over the ground and sows his seed upon the waters, which, as the waters subside, is deposited in the mud, springs up and bears fruit. Hence that beautiful figure, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and after many days thou shalt find it again."

The ruins of Egypt lie scattered along both banks of the Nile, and a voyage up this magnificent stream is one of the most delightful in the world. The clear sky, the pure, dry air, the waving palms, and the oriental character of the whole scene, while the mud huts of the Arabs, mingling with the mighty ruins of the past, so captivate the senses that it seems more the dream from some Arabian Night's Entertainment than a real voyage. There are some drawbacks, however, to the charms. One traveler relates that one night he encamped upon its banks, but could not sleep from the swarms of flies which tormented him. Rising from his couch, restless and nervous, he beheld his tent floor covered with toads. He proceeded forthwith to eject more than sixty from his door. Just as he was again about to lie down he espied in a corner a large toad, which, with imperturbable gravity, winked and snapped his jaws, each time taking captive a fly. Thereupon he arose, and driving the whole sixty toads back into his tent sought sleep once more.

The ruins are chiefly of stone, and consist of pyramids, obelisks, temples, and tombs. These are covered with inscriptions and scenes representing nearly all the manners and customs of the people. The temples were colossal in their structure. Long avenues of sphinxes lead to gigantic gateways or propylæ opening into vast halls, whose roofs were supported by rows of columns, sometimes sixty feet high. The walls and gateways, and even the columns, are covered with a multitude of inscriptions and pictures, recording the achievements of their kingly builders. Here a king is seen dragging along captives taken in some war—the distinctions of race are clearly marked in the figures. Accompanying him are men bearing spoils and leading animals peculiar to the captured country. The name and date are written above. "We have here the art of writing as a familiar practice, in the scribes who are numbering stores on every hand. There are ships which would look handsome in Southampton water any sunny day. There are glass-blowers who might be from Newcastle, but for their dress and complexion. There are flax-dressers, spinners, weavers, and a production of cloth, which an English manufacturer would study with interest. There are potters, painters, carpenters, and statuary. The hunters employ arrows, spears, and the lasso. The lasso is as evident as on the Pampas at this day. There is the bastinado for the men and the flogging of a seated woman. Nothing is more extraordinary than the gymnastics and other games of the women. The great men are attended by dwarfs and buffoons, as in a later age; and it is clear that bodily infirmity was treated with contempt, deformed and decrepit persons appearing in the discharge of the meanest offices. It was an age when this might be looked for; when war would be the most promising occupation, and wrestling the prevailing sport, and probably also the discipline of the soldiery; and when hunting, fishing, and fowling would be very important pursuits. But, then, what a power of representation of these things is here! and what luxury coexisting with these pursuits! Here are harpers, with their harps of seven strings; and garments and boat-sails with elegant patterns and borders, where, by the way, angular and regular figures are pointedly preferred; and the ladies' hair, disordered and flying about in their sports, has tails or tassels, very like what may have been seen in London drawing-rooms in no remote times. The incident which most reminds one of the antiquity of these paintings is, that the name of bird, beast, fish, or artificer is written up over the object delineated."

Miss Martineau.

This was the condition of Egypt and the state of the people when the "father of the faithful" visited the country.

The Bible does not need the testimony of the Egyptian records to substantiate its claims. It rests upon an impregnable fortress of evidence peculiarly its own, and convincing to every one who carefully examines it. But the unscrupulous assertions of certain infidels, who are continually crying out that the discoveries in Egypt have contradicted the truth of the Bible, demands that the true state of the case be presented. There is some dispute, it is true, about some points in chronology, but this does not invalidate the credibility of the occurrence of the event, since time is not an essential element in the consideration of the facts of the Bible. So in profane history, a wrong date does not lead us to deny the actual occurrence of the event recorded. But while there is this slight difficulty, the discoveries of Egypt and Assyria have added greatly to the means of illustrating the manners of the people who lived at that time, as well as corroborating many important historical facts. We will commence these illustrations by

THE LIFE OF ABRAHAM.

It is in the person of this great patriarch that we are first brought in connection with Egyptian history. At the command of God he had left Ur, the land of the Chaldeans, and wandering, he knew not whither, he was divinely directed to the land of Canaan, the promised inheritance of his seed. Here we find him a pastoral chief of great substance and renown. At length a famine arose in Palestine, and he was compelled to go down to Egypt to obtain food for his household and flocks. But as he came near the confines of the country he became not a little anxious on account of Sarah, who, although sixty-five years old, was still sufficiently beautiful to be desired by the princes of Egypt, and thereby endangering the life of her husband. Therefore, he persuaded her to pass as his sister during their sojourn in that country. What he feared really came to pass; for the princes of Pharaoh saw her that she was very fair, and reported her to their royal master, who took her to his harem, conferring upon Abraham gifts of "sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and men-servants, and maid-servants, and she asses, and camels." But God interfered and acquainted Pharaoh with the true relation of Sarah to Abraham, by which he restored her with a mild reproof, and sent them away. Now, in this simple narrative there are certain facts stated which the monumental records attest to be true.

1. Egypt was then a powerful nation.

That such was the case the dates and inscriptions on the ruins amply testify. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the chronological arrangements of dynasties and reigns, it is certain that Egypt then exhibited "indubitable evidences of mighty genius, abundant wealth, and great cultivation. At that period Thebes was the capital of a district to which it gave its name. The great temple of Karnack was completed in all its majesty and glory. The caves of Beni-Hassan, with their beautiful and elegant catacombs, displaying, even to this day, the most perfect architectural symmetry and arrangement, and ornamented throughout with colored figures and devices, had been excavated and finished. Heliopolis was also founded about this time, and its splendid obelisk, made out of a single block of granite, and covered with the most exquisitely sculptured hieroglyphics, had already been raised. Such works prove the power, wealth, and energy of Egypt, and attest the existence of art and science in great perfection."—Sacred Annals.

2. The kings of Egypt bore the title of Pharaoh at that time.

Pharaoh is a misinterpretation of the Hebrew word Phrah. It was used sometimes as a proper name; sometimes the title "king of Egypt" is added; and sometimes the real name is given, as Phrah Necho, Phrah Hophra. It is a Coptic word, and signifies the sun, and is often represented on the monuments, written over the royal banners of some king, by the hawk, the winged globe, and sun, all emblematic of regal power. For as the sun is the ruler of all lesser lights, so in the king was to be found the source of all wisdom and power. The monuments, therefore, fully sustain the assertion of the Bible, that the kings of Egypt, from the earliest ages, were known by the title of Pharaoh.

3. Slavery existed in Egypt at that time.

The oldest monuments contain representations of slaves. Indeed, it would be difficult to find any nation, in early times, where slavery did not exist. They were generally captives taken in war. They were both black and white, and they were found in the houses of the priests as well as of the military chiefs. The traffic in slaves was tolerated by the Egyptians, and many persons were engaged in bringing them for sale, as at present. It was a common custom of those days. Joseph was sold to Potiphar; the Jews had their bondsmen bought with money—Lev. xxv, 44—the Phœnicians, who traded in slaves, sold "the children of Judah and Jerusalem" to the Greeks—Amos iii, 6—and the people of Caucasus sent their boys and girls to Persia, as the modern Circassians do to that country and Turkey—Herod. iii, 97.

The power of the master over the slave seems to have been absolute in some cases, even over life and death. Nevertheless, they were generally treated kindly, and looked upon more as members of the family than as menials. Taylor says "that we find from the monuments that the mistress of a mansion was very rigid in enforcing her authority over her female domestics. We see these unfortunate beings trembling and cringing before their superiors, beaten with rods by the overseers, and sometimes threatened with a whip wielded by the lady of the mansion herself." In other instances, however, they were much better treated, and an affectionate relation seems to exist between the mistress and her slaves. In a tomb at Thebes there is a representation of a lady attended by her slaves, between whom there appears to be very great mutual regard. The children of these slaves followed the condition of the father, and, unlike the custom in America, became members of the family and heirs to the inheritance.

4. There was famine in Canaan but plenty in Egypt.

Though there is no monumental proof of this proposition, there is abundant proof derived from the character of the two countries. Canaan is a mountainous region—a region of sunshine and showers, and thus subject, like all other like countries, to long seasons of dry weather. But Egypt is not dependent upon rain for her fertility, but upon the annual overflow of the Nile. That Palestine has been accustomed to long famines we learn from the history of the past, while Egypt very seldom suffers from such a calamity. The fact, then, is in harmony with the natural phenomena of the countries and with the observation of the past.

5. Sarah was fair, and was unveiled.

When we remember the present rigid and universal practice of the east, and also that these customs have prevailed from the very earliest times, the assertion that Sarah was unveiled will appear quite remarkable. Sarah was from Mesopotamia, where the people were of a light complexion, while the Egyptians, though not as dark as the Ethiopians, were, as we learn from the monuments, of a tawny color, beside whom Sarah would be said to be "very fair." That she was not veiled appears from the fact, that the princes of Pharaoh saw her and reported her beauty to the king. From the earliest times the women were accustomed to be veiled. How happens it then that Sarah was not veiled in Egypt? The monuments answer by showing incontestably that the ancient Egyptians did not follow this custom, and thus substantiates the sacred narrative. The custom of wearing the veil did not prevail in Egypt till after the conquest of that country by the Persians. Greater freedom and equality was enjoyed by the Egyptian women than by those of any other nation. They are represented on the monuments as mingling, without restraint, with the men in all social and domestic affairs, as in our own land. This seems a proper place to say something of the manners and customs of the Egyptian ladies as represented on the monuments.

It is a little strange the most important ceremony to young ladies, namely, marriage, is nowhere represented on the monuments. But Diodorus Siculus says, that they obtained greater authority than has been accorded them in most nations. It was even inserted in the marriage contract that the man was to obey the wife, who was to have the control of all the important affairs of the household. But though Diodorus is not always to be trusted, we know that the women were intrusted with the highest authority, even ascending the throne, as in those modern countries where the Salic law has not been introduced. Their occupations varied with their sphere of life. Among the pastoral tribes the women tended the sheep, and made the tent cloth, and performed most of the menial services. The peasants did all the labor of the field, tilling the ground, carrying burdens upon their heads, and going to market. Among the higher classes the woman was equal with her lord. Here she is represented as weaving, spinning, and engaged in embroidery. She attended public feasts with her husband, and not alone, as is the custom among the Moslem women. They are represented at the feasts as sitting with the men promiscuously or in little groups by themselves, eagerly engaged in conversation. "Nor were married people afraid of sitting together, and no idea of their having enough of each other's society made it necessary to divide them. In short, they shared the same chair at home, at a party, and even in their tomb, where sculpture grouped them together. The master and mistress accordingly sat together at a party on a large fauteuil, and each guest, as he arrived, walked up and received their welcome. The musicians and the dancers hired for the occasion also did obeisance to them before they began their part. To the leg of the fauteuil was tied a favorite dog, monkey, or gazelle, or some other favorite pet, and a young child was permitted to sit upon the ground, or on its father's knee."

"In the mean time the conversation became animated, especially in those parts of the room where the women were grouped together, and the numerous subjects that occurred to them were fluently discussed. Among these the question of dress was not forgotten, and the patterns or the value of the trinkets were examined with proportionate interest. The maker of an earring, or the shop where it was purchased, was anxiously inquired; each compared the workmanship, the style, and the materials of those she wore; coveted her neighbor's or preferred her own; and women of every class vied with each other in the display of 'jewels of silver and jewels of gold,' in the texture of their 'raiment,' the neatness of their sandals, and the arrangement or beauty of their plaited hair."—Wilkinson.

Indeed, the entire list of ornaments, as described by Isaiah iii, 18-23, can be made out from the monuments: "The bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires, like the moon; the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers; the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the head-bands, and the tablets, and the earrings; the rings and nose-jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins; the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils."

I am sorry to say the women are never represented as writing or reading, and hence we presume they had no very decided literary taste. All these scenes remind us of the advanced civilization of the Egyptians and their high social refinements.

Herodotus states that the Egyptians could take only one wife, and hence an objection has been raised to the statement, that Pharaoh took Sarah to his harem. The statement of Herodotus is doubtless true; but while each man was allowed only one wife he was not restricted to the number of concubines he might take to his harem. These held a subordinate position to one who was known as the wife or mistress of the mansion. It was to introduce her into his harem that Pharaoh took Sarah; and such liberty we know was in perfect accordance with eastern customs and despotic authority. The whole scene is perfectly oriental in character, and the conduct of Abraham in this case, contrasted with his equal bearing with the kings of Canaan, indicates the power and greatness of the Egyptian nation.

6. The gifts.

These gifts are stated to be sheep and oxen, asses and camels, besides slaves. A recent writer has objected that some of these animals were unknown in Egypt, while the horse, which was abundant, is not mentioned. But more extensive observation of the ruins has shown, by numerous representations, that these were all abundant in ancient Egypt except the camel. No representation of the camel has been found upon the monuments. But we know that it was possessed by neighboring states, and hence the probability, at least, that the king would possess them. In regard to the horse there are a great many representations of them on the monuments, chiefly used for war. Only one representation of a person on horseback has been found. Although horses were thus abundant in Egypt, we know that they were not introduced among the Israelites till the time of the kings, and were not used in peace or war in the time of Joshua. How unlikely, then, that they would be used in the simple pastoral times of Abraham. Hence, the omission of horses rather goes to show the authenticity of the sacred record: since any one writing the history later than the kings would have been likely to mention horses among the gifts, which would have been altogether useless to Abraham.

It has been supposed by some that Hagar was one of the maid-servants which Abraham received at that time. If so, the Egyptians must have held some of their own nation in servitude; and this conclusion is sustained by the representations upon the monuments.

Thus we see that modern discovery has but strengthened the proof of the authenticity of the sacred record in relating this episode in the life of Abraham.

THE MISSIONARY'S WIFE.

THERE is something exceedingly interesting in a missionary's wife. She who has been cherished as a plant that the winds must not breathe on too rudely, recovers from a separation from her friends to find herself in a land of barbarians, where her loud cry of distress can never reach their ears. New ties twine round her heart, and the tender and helpless girl changes her very nature, and becomes the staff and support of the man. In his hours of despondency she raises his drooping spirits: she bathes his aching head, and smooths his pillow of sickness. I have entered her dwelling, and have been welcome as a brother; sometimes, when I have known any of her friends at home, I have been for a moment more than recompensed for all the toils and privations of a traveler in the east. And when I left her dwelling it was with a mind burdened with remembrances to friends whom she will perhaps never see again.

IN MEMORY.

ON THE DEATH OF OTWAY CURRY.

BY COATES-KINNEY.

From Mexic and Floridian climes,
Up Mississippi's track,
Home to Ohio's vernal vales
The spring birds warble back;
Not merrily the plummy flocks,
But solemnly this year;
For grass is sprouting on the grave
Of him who loved them here.

Ne'er in the season of the buds,
Or blooms, or leaves, or fruits,
Shall they again his presence hail
With their melodious flutes:
Death froze him when the brooklet froze,
Pining for him and them—
But, melted now to gurgling sobs,
Rippling his requiem!

Young Nature dons her gown of green,
And blossoms into smiles;
Yet very mournful is her heart
These merry April whiles;
For the poet who so loved her,
And so homed with her recluse,
Has ended life's hard battle here
By death's eternal truce.

It is a weary, weary world
To him whose aim is high—
Strained tiptoe toward the stars, without
The angel wings to fly!
But, nestled in this narrow life,
The soul, here blind and bare,
Nurtured and brooded o'er by Faith,
Shall fledge to angel there.

Unsmitten with this noisy fame
Which elbows through the throng,
He kept climbing up to heaven
On the ladder of his song:
The ladder he has left for us—
And this his fame sublime,
To help man heavenward upon
The golden rounds of rhyme.

Like midnight thunder on the hills,
Some flashing lives go out,
And leave the jarred world blind and mazed
In wonder and in doubt;
But he departed like the eve,
Flocked after by the stars;
The starshine of his memory
No cloud of envy mars.

Ohio ne'er has lost a son
More worthy her regret;
The west has comets yet of song—
Her planet, though, has set;
Our country weakens with the want
Of good, true men like him,
To guard her tree of liberty,
Like Eden's cherubim.

Earth, through her thousand million men,
May search the centuries,
Nor find a burning soul lived forth
More holily than his:
His pure life reached up into heaven,
And plucked its beauties down—
Which death has gathered back again,
To make his glory-crown.

PHANTOM BUILDING.

BY ELIZABETH C. WRIGHT.

A FOOTSTEP in the dust we trace,
And then, of him whose step was there,
We build above that lowly place
A phantom figure in the air.

Lorn Orusoe saw a shadow host
Hold savage orgies on the strand,
Because upon that barren coast
A human footstep pressed the sand.

The Arab bites his wordless lip
To see an armed train pass by,
When naught of barb or "desert ship,"
Save footprints meets his searching eye.

We see a dead stalk on a wall,
And suddenly to golden bloom
There bursts through every death-spell's thrall,
The wall-flower's phantom o'er its tomb.

A snowless winter walk we take,
Through some deserted graveyard old,
Where 'neath our feet the scentless brake
And grass lie withered, brown, and cold.

Their rustling crush recalls their past,
Like magic life-word to them spoke;
Their brown arms up toward heav'n they cast;
Their win'try doom of thralldom broke.

Up from the dull and frozen mold,
Transfigured springs the fragrant fern,
And awaying grass and daisies bold
Smile round each solemn gravestone's urn.

We pass. Some trailing brambles clasp
Fast to our skirts with hooked thorn;
We stoop to loose this tightening grasp
Of stems, of life and verdure shorn.

We cast the rough incumbrance down,
When, full-leaved, up before us rise,
With berries bowed, these briers brown,
Grown green and strong before our eyes.

Can summer skies melt bonds of death
With surer skill than this we share?
Dare magic words in whispered breath,
Evoke more phantoms than we dare?

What matter for the driving storms—
The drifting snows—life's wintrier parts;
While in us live all glowing forms—
Creative summer, in our hearts?

WE'RE ALL COMING.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"AND now it is at last really settled. Elder Green told me so this very afternoon, with a twinkle of unusual satisfaction in his eyes. You may depend upon it, he's at the bottom of the whole thing, Maggie."

"Of course he is. But just to think of it, papa, we are actually to have a 'donation.' There'll be pyramids of biscuit, and piles of apples, and mountains of cake, and mole-hills of jellies, and lots of other good things. Won't we have a nice time, though?" and Maggie Hiller drew her stool closer to her father's feet, and lifted her sweet face to the one that gazed down fondly upon her. It was a great pity there was no artist looking into the front window of the little parsonage parlor just at that moment. He might have bequeathed such a sweet picture of the past to us. The room alone would have been this, with the great, old-fashioned fireplace, where the flames rolled in large, golden billows about the huge logs, piled on a pair of burnished andirons that must have been cast in the very same pattern Ben Taylor discourses so charmingly about; there, too, was the large, old clock, set in one corner, its top reaching within a half inch of the ceiling, and the high-back chair, and the low mantle, and the striped carpet would have been carved in all our memories—a sweet, domestic vision of the olden time.

But parson Hiller and his fair child, Maggie, were, after all, the finishing touch of that home tableau. He sat there, the very incarnation of an old Puritan minister, straight, and calm, and stern, with the flame-light rolling over his broad forehead and twisting itself among the hairs that hung about it, white as mountain snows, forming such a picturesque contrast to the brown locks upon which his hand was laid so tenderly.

No body called Maggie Hiller handsome, but there were times, and this was one of them, when she was very beautiful. Those plaits of rich hair, gathered back from either cheek, the smiling mouth, with its twin dimples, and those clear, hazel eyes, filled with the light of a heart in the freshness of its nineteenth summer, made Maggie her mother's child, and so doubly the parson's darling, for he was a widower.

"Well done, my child, your imagination has certainly run wild and flowered about donation-time. How are you certain, my little Maggie, that you are not counting too largely upon our good friends' purses and pantries?" and the light in that stern face was beautiful as it bent over the girl's.

"No, indeed, papa. People always expect to be generous at donations. Beside, I remember our last one—don't I, though? It was nine years ago, and I verily believe I did nothing for a month afterward but look at the presents I received, and show them to mamma and—" the young girl caught her breath as though some word were trembling on her lip which it were sin or shame to utter; a sudden shadow struck off all the sparkling from her face, and heavy tears gathered in her eyes. "O, papa, don't you remember?" and there was a sob behind every word. "She was there then, and—and, O, I must speak it, so was Ralph!" She groaned rather than spoke the name, burying her face in the hands that were clasped on her father's knee, while her whole frame shook like a frightened child's.

Parson Hiller sprang to his feet as a man does when he is suddenly stung. His face was very white, and its expression of displeasure almost fearful, as he looked down on the trembling girl. "Margaret, how dare you! have I not said that his name—"

"I know it, father." She had gained courage now and lifted her head, though it seemed as if a stronger spirit than hers would have quailed before that stern rebuke. "I know it, father, and O, forgive me, for I couldn't help it; it has lain so long a burning and a pain at my heart, that at last it would find its way over my lips. O Ralph, my brother!"

That cry! it would have melted a heart of stone to hear it. It was so full of deep, undying tenderness, and yet so much grief wailed through it.

It must have smote heavily upon the pastor's heart, for his face waxed paler, and the muscles round his strong mouth quivered a little, but this time he did not speak.

A moment later and a pair of soft, cool fingers were twisted among the minister's, and a low voice was saying pleadingly, "You won't be angry with me, will you, papa? Now I am all you have to love, too. And I can't help thinking of him, for O he is my brother that I played with under the shadow of the chestnut-trees out yonder; the brother by whose side I have walked so many times through the clover meadows to school; the brother that I loved so dearly!"

"How proud we all were of him, too, don't you remember, papa? and how generous and noble-hearted he was, though I know he was rash and wayward at times."

"How mamma used to love him, too, almost better than she did me, I believe, because he had your own gray eyes and broad, high forehead! I can see her now watching him when we sat down in the evening by her side, till her eyes grew moist with pride and tenderness, and she would bend down and kiss his cheek and say, 'Ralph, my boy, you are your father, every inch of you.'

"O it does my heart so much good to speak his name again, papa! It will ease yours, too. Let us sit down here and talk about him and the old time," and very gently she tried to draw him back to the arm-chair.

Many changes had passed over parson Hiller's face while his child was speaking, and once or twice he had opened his lips to check her; but the pleading of her eyes was so like a pair that were lying under the snow that the words had died on his lips. But when Maggie would have drawn him to the chair he refused to follow her, and spoke—his voice trembled at first, but it grew strong and stern as he proceeded.

"My child, you have to-night violated the most positive command I ever laid upon you. But I know it was the love for him which you could not stifle that caused you to do this, and so, greatly as you have offended, I forgive you. But never, never again ask me to talk of him. He was my child once, but he has never been so since that hour when I turned him from my doors. I talk of him! and what shall I say except to denounce him? Disobedient and reprobate, ay, worse, a thief and a murderer!

"It may seem harsh to you, Maggie," continued the parson, for he had heard the low cry that broke from the white lips of his child, "but it is nevertheless true"—he paced up and down the room with strangely agitated steps, and his white hairs shone mournfully in the firelight. "I did not forget that I was a father till duty compelled me. 'Acknowledge your fault and I will forgive it,' I said when he came home and I knew the extent of his crime.

"You know how he forgot that I was his parent and answered me. Then I did what the word of God and my duty to my fellow-men demanded.

"And he went out from us, and a curse is upon his head, for he broke his mother's heart. He laid her," and here the stern voice grew tremulous as an infant's, "before her hairs were gray, and while her life was in its prime, in the bed where she lies to-night.

"And if he should dare to darken my doors again, I would point him to that grave, and say as I said then, 'Go!'

"No, no, papa, you wouldn't—you couldn't!" Maggie sprang suddenly before him, and she looked almost like one inspired as the light of her soul broke into her face. "You couldn't say the word to him when you knew all the time that mother was looking down on you from heaven, and that if she could speak she would bid you 'stop.'

"Remember, John," she would say, that sainted mother, 'he is our boy, our first-born, the child over whose cradle we have watched together, and over whom we have said so many prayers.'

"O papa," and the poetry in the girl's nature sprang unconsciously to her lips, "ceasing for a moment the great halleluiah of the just made perfect, my mother bends down and whispers from beyond the stars, 'Forgive him for my sake, John, forgive him.'"

And it seemed to the parson—as he looked on the face of his child, wrapped over, as it was, with the light of her spirit—that an angel was speaking; that the voice of his dead wife was calling him.

He sank down and buried his face in his hands; the great deeps of his heart were at last broken up, and the tears trickled through his fingers.

* * *

It is a sad story, and our pen can not linger over it.

Enough that in his boyhood Ralph Hiller's impulsive, headstrong nature was always coming in collision with the sternest, hardest points of his father's character.

It was a great misfortune, but the two never understood each other. Parson Hiller was a good parent and a Christian, but he was a lineal descendant of the old Massachusetts Puritans, and his high-toned love for right and justice, his calm, rigid, inflexible nature was one which the milder social atmosphere of his own times could not modify, for they were his birthright.

Ralph Hiller left home at eighteen. With all his faults there were many rich veins in his ardent, impulsive nature; but if his father's regimen had been too severe, that of his gentle mother had been too indulgent, and so neither had succeeded in harmonising the discordant elements of his character.

A few words will tell the rest. He entered the large mercantile house of his uncle in New York. The relaxation of all parental discipline proved too sudden, for Ralph was unacquainted with the world, and his country life had little fitted him to be his own master. It is the old story—he was decoyed into a gambling saloon, induced to drink freely, and finally to play. Of course he was at first successful, and this prompted him to stake larger sums of money. Then the tide turned, and one night Ralph Hiller rushed out madly from the gambling saloon, for he was in debt five hundred dollars. A few days of unmitigated misery went by, and the wretched youth discovered there was no method of escaping detection but by defraying this debt.

There was but one way to do this. "It will not be robbery," whispered the tempter in Ralph Hiller's ear, for you can win back the money and refund it to your uncle. But he was not so successful as he had anticipated, and the theft was discovered.

For the sake of both families Ralph's uncle would not give his nephew's crime publicity, but accompanied him home and there revealed to his horrified parents the deed their son had committed. Stung to incipient madness by the stern reproaches of his father, Ralph Hiller refused to solicit even the forgiveness of his uncle.

There was a fearful scene that fair June morning in the parlor of the parsonage, with the harsh commands of the father, the vehement refusals of the son, added to the tears of the distracted mother, and those of the little Maggie. At last, finding his son inflexible, parson Hiller spoke clear and slow, "Ralph, yield at once to my commands or go out of that door no longer a child of mine!" And Ralph went.

"Sir, is there no hope?" and the sick man turned and fastened his eyes with such wild appealing eagerness on the physician that his heart was strangely touched.

The doctor shook his head sadly. "My dear sir, it would only be cruel kindness to deceive you now. You probably can not live a fortnight."

The invalid turned with a low moan upon his couch, and the doctor went out softly. There were two other occupants of the small, illy-furnished chamber, whose every adjustment betrayed the absence of a woman's harmonizing taste, and these were a boy and girl: he could hardly have reached his seventh year, and four summers had just braided their light in the golden hair that fell rich and bright as a sunset cloud over her brother's lap, for the child was sleeping. But the boy had listened to every word the doctor had spoken; and if you had seen the quivering of the little fellow's lips, or the tears dashing over his dark eyes, you would have known he felt it, too.

"Papa, papa, did the doctor say you must die?" The voice was very mournful, and the little fingers gently pulled away those of the sick man from his face.

"Yes, Walter. O my children! my children!"

"Don't, there, please don't, papa. It frightens me so to see a great man cry. If mamma was only alive, or if I was only bigger and could take care of Mary; but she's so little, you know, papa, and I'm hardly seven, I can't do any thing to help her." He said it very mournfully, with the tears trickling down his cheeks.

"Papa, papa!" and the lips were brought nearer the averted face of the sick man, "can't you take us with you? I shan't want to stay behind when you're gone, and sister won't, either. You an't got any body to leave us to, you know, and mamma's there, and I want to go with you."

Suddenly the sick man sprang up in his bed, the hectic burned in his hollow cheek, and his eyes seemed to his child like two flames of fire. "Yes, I have got somebody with whom to leave you, my poor child," and he wound his arms round the boy. "They're a long, long way from here, and you've never heard their names, Walter; but though they have cursed the father, they'll be very tender to his motherless children. They didn't curse me, though. It was only he that said it, and I should have gone back long ago if the thought that she was lying under the grass and I had placed her there hadn't withheld me. But it shall no longer. O, thank God, thank God, there is somebody with whom I can leave you!"

Poor Ralph Hiller! The world had not dealt very kindly with him since he went out from his home, with the curse of the "disobedient" on his head.

He was a young man yet, but he had laid his gentle wife in the grave two years before. Financial embarrassment had succeeded her death, and a sudden revolution in his mercantile vicinity had stripped him of all his possessions. Sickness, the result partly of anxiety and disappointment, partly that of constitutional infirmity, succeeded, and so Ralph Hiller was dying.

"Walter, Mary, I can not keep on any longer. It would have been better now had we not left the tavern and waited for the stage. But our journey of a thousand miles has taken my last cent, and as the old man promised to bring us in his cart within a short distance of M——, I agreed to his proposition.

"It was strange, but I felt so strong and eager then to keep on my journey, and now I can hardly stand.

"It is three miles, too, to that house on the hill. You can see it, Walter, with the bright light in front. It is a straight road; haste, leave me now, and if you ever get there—" the words died on the man's lips, and he sank senseless upon the pile of withered leaves which the winter wind had heaped under the tree. It was a bitter cold night, with the stars lying in cold, shining rifts about the sky, and the winds holding high festivals along the shores of the distant Hudson.

"Wally, wake up papa, wake him up," sobbed little Mary Hiller, who stood watching her prostrate parent, with both hands wrapped in her brother's, "he'll get cold going to sleep there."

"He isn't asleep," said the boy sadly. "O, if there was only somebody here!" and he looked round wistfully on the woods which lay dark and barren all about him. There was no help; he could see the lights from the distant village twinkling like stars through the night, and he must find his way to them as best he could. "Come with me, sister," he said, turning bravely to the child, "we'll walk fast, and that'll keep us warm, you know. Keep your shawl tight round you. Now come," and the boy drew her gently onward.

But, as I said, the night was very bitter, and the little one's limbs were very weary and benumbed with cold, and it seemed almost as if the angels' loving eyes must have grown dim with tears as they looked down on those children—the road was so long, and cold, and dreary.

"Wally, Wally, I can't go any farther; I'm so tired and cold," and the great tears were frozen on the little creature's cheeks. "I want to lie down and go to sleep." The tender feet had pattered along bravely for awhile by the side of Walter, but the child's steps had grown slower and feebler till at last they had come to a full stop in the road, some mile and a half from the "house on the hill."

"No, no, little Mary don't want to go to sleep here on the ground where it is so hard and cold. Perhaps they'll have a nice bed when we get up to that house, you know. Just see how it's all lighted up, and how warm 'twill be when we get there. Come, I won't walk so fast, that's a good girl."

"I can't, Wally, I can't. My feet are so heavy they won't move, and my fingers ache so at the ends; just as if somebody was bitin' 'em.

"Please let me lie down, Wally, and you can put your arms round me, and I can go to sleep just as well as I could in the cradle at home;" for the intense cold was beginning to induce that lethargy which would have proven too fatal to the child.

Walter was suffering intensely with the cold, too, and for a moment he felt tempted to comply with the child's request, but the thought of his father roused him again.

There was but one method which could induce the child to proceed, and Walter knew well that the little fainting heart in that benumbed frame was very warm with love for him, and rubbing the cold hands with all his might he said sorrowfully,

"And so, Mary, you will leave Walter to go all that long way alone. It will seem a great deal longer, and he will cry all the time, now papa has gone, and Mary has left him, too. Won't you go for my sake, little sister?"

The blue, closing eyes opened again. Two or three sobs broke over the child's lips, but betwixt them she whispered, "Kiss me twice, Wally, and I'll try." And Walter pressed his lips, not twice or thrice to the blue ones of his sister, and wrapping her hands tightly in his own they recommenced their journey.

In after years, when Walter looked down on that night, he would say it seemed little short of a miracle to him, how that last mile and a half was accomplished. Ah! the boy could not see that an angel went before him and led the way.

* * * * *

The severity of the weather had in no wise lessened the gathering at parson Hiller's that evening. Both the parlors were opened for the occasion, for the old and the young were assembled under the beloved roof, and the low hum of many voices mingled musically with the loud crackling of the huge logs in the chimneys. O they were a happy company! You could have told that by the smiles on every face; by the light in the eyes of all into which your own would have looked.

"Now, Miss Maggie, I've got hold of you a minute while they're setting the table, and I want you just to peep in here," cried Hannah, who reigned sole mistress of the culinary realm, drawing our heroine into a large, old-fashioned pantry. "There," she said, aiding the effect of her remarks by emphatic punches in her auditor's ribs and sides, "did you ever in your born days, Miss Maggie, see the like o' this! Three barrels o' flour, two whole cheeses, three firkins o' the very best butter, to say nothin' o' the potatoes and apple sarce, the turnips and doughnuts—where on the globed airth we can stow such a heap is a marvel to me," and the good woman heaved a sigh of mingled satisfaction and fatigue as she glanced round the closely piled shelves.

Margaret laughed her own gay, rippling laugh, that would have reminded you of nothing in the world but birds among spring blossoms. "Never you mind, Hannah, you'll find a place somewhere, and—hark! wasn't that a knock at the kitchen door?"

"Yes, I believe 'twas; dear me! it does seem as if there was no end," and Hannah went out with such an air of the martyr that it elicited another laugh from Maggie, which was broken short by the woman's loud exclamation, "Goodness alive! what have we got here!" Another moment, and Maggie was at the door.

Two little children stood there; their limbs were stiff and their flesh was blue with the cold. It was a pitiful sight as they shivered in the bitter wind, and the younger would have fallen if her brother's arm had not upheld her.

"Please, ma'am, we have walked a long way in the dark, and little sister is almost frozen; won't you let us come in?"

Before Maggie could speak Hannah's strong arms had pulled both the children into the house.

"Let you come in, you poor little souls!" she cried with tears of genuine sympathy rolling down her cheeks. "I'm thinkin' the creature that wouldn't do this would never get into the great door above. Come close to the fire. Just look at them little red arms, Miss Maggie."

Maggie Hiller didn't speak, for her heart was too full for that; but she bent down and unloosed the girl's bonnet-strings, and the curls fell in a golden shower over her hands.

"Wally said you would be kind to me and let me go to sleep on a good bed when you made me warm. Mayn't Mary go now? she's so tired," and the little one looked up with touching earnestness.

"Yes, darling, you shall have a nice bed," she answered with a break of tears, as she sat down and lifted the little one to her lap. "But first you must get warm, and have something nice to eat, you know."

"Yes, I'll get some hot tea and plenty of other good things," said the prompt Hannah, as she drew a stool near the fire. "Sit down there, little boy, and we'll have you fixed off in a minute."

"But I want first to tell you about papa. He was sick and fell to the ground—"

At that moment a sudden ejaculation of wonder from many voices reached the kitchen. Maggie and Hannah looked wildly at each other, and then the former lifted the little girl from her lap and said briskly, "Stay with them, Hannah, till I see what is the matter."

A man, white and attenuated as one risen from the dead, stood in the center of the room, staring wildly about him. No body knew him; the eyes of all the guests were fastened in wonder and dismay upon him; for he had rushed wildly in and was staring about the company like one demented, and yet he had not spoken.

I said no body knew him, but Maggie did as soon as her eyes rested on him. There was a cry of joy and of exceeding tenderness, "Ralph, Ralph, my brother!" then with one bound her arms were wrapped about his neck, and her lips were laid to his cold cheeks.

"O, Maggie, then you have not forgotten me!" He whispered the words faintly.

"Forgotten you, Ralph! Did you think that the sister that had slept in your arms and kneeled by your side at prayer; who never had a joy or a sorrow that she didn't tell you—O did you think she could forget you!"

"And my father, Maggie?"

Before she could answer parson Hiller came forward, and his tones were very tender as he said, "Ralph, my boy, you are welcome home again."

A smile went over the man's lips. "O," he said, "if she, too, were only here to tell me this, I could die in peace."

"She did say it, Ralph," said Maggie, eagerly catching her brother's meaning. "With her dying hands she drew down my head to her lips and whispered, 'Maggie, when Ralph comes back—for I know he will do this some time—tell him that his mother loved her boy to the last.'"

"Papa, papa," the child voices rang sweet and eager through the parlor, and the next moment the children rushed to the side of their parent.

"I can not see you," and Ralph sank feebly into a chair, and then for the first time a sudden, terrible fear smote to the hearts of parson Hiller and his daughter. "But, children, come close to me. Father, sister, they are all I have to leave you, and for my sake you will be very tender of them."

"Thank God, my prayer is heard! I shall die at home. It was this thought that gave me strength when I woke up to-night in the woods yonder, and it was this that bore me to you, though I was dying. I am going first to that far country where mother is waiting, and when she asks for those I left behind, I shall tell her 'They're all coming.'" His head sank upon Maggie's shoulder, and when they lifted it Ralph Hiller was with them no longer.

And if the donation, which had commenced so auspiciously, closed with many tears, there was a rainbow of hope in the hearts of the chief mourners.

The sympathizing parishioners never knew the nature or extent of Ralph Hiller's early sin, and only supposed some unhappy misunderstanding had occurred between the father and the son. There was a new grave made by the mother's, and the next spring a marble monument threw its long, slender shadow over the rose and cypress that loving hands had twined there. Under the name of Ralph Hiller was simply engraven, "They're all coming."

And now, reader, do your beloved, who have gone to that "upper country," say these blessed words of you?

Where the mountains rise in their serene, solemn beauty, with the green scrolls of that eternal summer folded over their bosoms; where the jubilee of the seraphim rolls sweetly along the golden valleys, does the rejoicing cry for you sometimes rise up—a cry that wanders over the white plains, and is gathered up among the echoes of the hills of jasper—" They are all coming!"

THE "WALUM-OLUM;"

OR, BARK RECORD.

BY REV. T. M. EDDY, A. M.

THE early history of the Indian tribes is involved in deep obscurity, and much of it can never be brought out. The conquerors were too incessantly occupied in hunting, shooting, and scalping them to give close attention to their antecedents, theology, or ethnology. Their worthy sons have been too much occupied in cheating them in diplomacy and woolen and cotton cloth, and killing them with bad whisky, to devote any considerable share of attention to their origin, traditions, or destiny. Nevertheless, there have been some who, regarding the red man as a broken fragment of our common humanity, have busied themselves in inquiries concerning him—they have asked him whence he came; they have interrogated his traditions, his songs, and his worship. But they have gathered few treasures. The veil of mystery envelops the Indian. Only this is surely known—he was once strong, he is now weak and is doomed to annihilation. The heel of the Anglo-Saxon is "crushing out" his hope, his heart to do, and his existence itself.

The scanty researches made show this much—the religion of the tribes must be appealed to for all the information, or nearly so, we can hope to gain. This is true, not merely of Indian tribes, but all barbarous nations. A distinguished oriental traveler has said, "By a proper attention to the vestiges of ancient superstition, we are sometimes enabled to refer a whole people to their original ancestors with as much if not more certainty than by observations made upon their languages, because the superstition is ingrafted upon the stock, but the language is liable to change."

Mr. E. G. Squier, some years ago, read before the New York Historical Society an interesting paper upon the "Traditions of the Algonquins," which seems to strengthen the idea of many, that a system of hieroglyphics was known among the Indian tribes. There fell into his possession, from the papers of Professor C. S. Rafinesque—who was a great Indian antiquarian; so far as facts were concerned he was reliable, being honest and painstaking, but deficient in those mental traits essential to accurate generalization; hence, while his conclusions were generally wrong his data were ordinarily reliable—to resume after this biographical and critical parenthesis, he found a MS. entitled, "Walum-Olum—painted sticks—or painted and engraved traditions of the Lenni Lenape." A note in the handwriting of the Professor states that the MS. was obtained of Dr. Ward, of Indiana, who procured the wooden originals from a remnant of the Delaware Indians, on White river, in 1822. It is also stated that the characters were long inexplicable, "till, with a deep study of the Delaware, and the aid of Zeinberber's MS. Dictionary, in the library of the Philosophical Society, a translation was effected."

It is the opinion of Mr. Squier that this singular paper bears strong internal marks of genuineness, and is strongly supported by collateral circumstances. Lookiel, in his "History of the United Brethren in America," has written the following of the people among whom it professedly originated: "The Delawares delight in describing their genealogies, and are so well versed in them that they mark every branch of the family with the greatest precision. They add also the character of their forefathers: such a one was a wise and intelligent counselor, a renowned warrior, or a rich man, etc. But though they are ignorant of the art of reading and writing, yet their ancestors were well aware that they stood in need of something to enable them to convey their ideas to a distant nation, or preserve the memory of remarkable events. To this end they invented something like hieroglyphics, and also strings and belts of wampum, etc." Again: "The Delawares use hieroglyphics on wood, trees, and stones, to give caution, for communication, to commemorate events, and preserve records. Every Indian understands their meaning."

The fact of picture-writing among the Indians has been scouted by men who would give half a comfortable fortune for a brick from the ruins of an Egyptian temple, if scrawled over with inscriptions by the onion worshipers. We may, then, give another authority or two. Mr. Schoolcraft has said of the Ojibwas: "Every path has its blazed and figured tree, conveying intelligence to all that pass, for all can understand these signs, which are taught the young as carefully as we teach our alphabet." Heckwelder says: "They have certain hieroglyphics by which they describe facts in so plain a manner, that those who are conversant with their marks can understand them with the greatest ease."

These signs were essentially mnemonic, and a simple or compound sign served to reveal an entire sentence or series of sentences. "A single figure with its adjuncts would stand for the verse of a song, or for a circumstance which it would require several sentences to explain."

The MS. under immediate notice comprises five divisions; the first two embody traditions concerning the creation and a general deluge, and the rest a history of various migrations and a list of ninety-seven chiefs in the order of succession.

It stands in the following form: First, the mnemonic symbol, of which there are one hundred and eighty-four. Second, the suggested verse or sentence in the Delaware dialect. And, third, a literal translation of the same in English.

I regret that I can not give the symbols. The copious type of the publishers of the Repository have hardly any representations of the Algonquin symbols. Hence I will give only the original Indian terms and the literal translations, and then a brief paraphrase of one or two sections. As to the accuracy of the translation this one fact seems strongly confirmatory. Mr. Squier submitted it without explanation to the educated Delaware chief, George Copway—Kah-go-ga-gah-bowh—who, without hesitation, "pronounced it authentic in respect, not only to the original signs and accompanying explanations in the Delaware dialect, but also in the general ideas and conceptions which it embodies."

The subject of the first song or chant is the creation, and I will give it entire:

1. Sayewitalli wemiguma wokgetaki°
At first there all sea-water above land.
2. Haikung-kwelik owanaku wakyutali kitan-Above much water foggy (was) and (or also) there creator he was.
3. Sayewis hallemiwis nolemiwi kitanitowit-essop
First being eternal being invisible creator he was.

* "The terminal aki is a contraction of ahkiki, land, and frequently simply denotes place."

4. Sohalawak kwelik kakik owak
He causes them much water much land much air or clouds awasagawak much heaven.
5. Sohalawak giahuk nimpanum alankwak
He causes them the sun the moon the stars.
6. Wemi-sohalawak yulik yuch-aan
All he causes these well to move.
7. Wich-owagan kshakan moshakwat
With action (or rapidly) it blows wind it clears up kwelik kabipelep great waters it ran off.
8. Opeleken mani-menak dalsin epit
It looks bright made islands is there at.
9. Lappinup ketanitowit manito maniloak
Again when creator he made spirits, or makew.
10. Owiniwak angelotawiwak chichaukwak wemiwak
First beings also and angels souls also and all.
11. Witan-manito janwis lennowak mankom
After he made beings men and grandfather.
12. Milap netami gaho owini-gaho
He gave them the first mother first being's mother.
13. Name-alk-melap tnipewik aweak cholemak
Fishes he gave him turtles beasts birds.
14. Makimani-shak sohalawak makowini a'okowak Bad spirit but he causes them bad beings black snakes amangamek
monsters, or large reptiles.
15. Sohalawak uchewak sohalawak punguak
He causes them flies he causes them gnats.
16. Nitesak wemi owini w'dalsinewnap
Friends all beings were then.
17. Kiwes wunand wish-manitoak essopak
Thou being good God good spirits were there.
18. Nijini netami lennowak nigoha netami
The beings the first men mothers first okwewi nantinewak.
wives little spirits (fairies) [babies?]
19. Gattamina netami mitsi nijini nantino
Fat fruits the first the food the beings little spirits.
20. Wemi winge-namenep wemi kain elandamep
All willingly pleased all easy thinking wullatemanawi happy
21. Shukand eli kimi mekenikink wakom°
But then while secretly on earth snake god powako inis'ako
priest snake worship snake.
22. Mattalugos pallalugos maktatin owagan Wickedness crime unhappiness actions payat-chikutali
coming there then.
23. Wak-tapan-payat wihillan mboagan
Bad weather coming distempers death.
24. Wownemi wi-wunch atak kilahikan
This all very long aforesime beyond great waters netami-epit
first land at.

So ends this remarkable poem, and the skeleton of "a system" is in it, and some of the bones are large and well developed. The following paraphrase is given by our author:

1. At the first there were great waters above all the land.
2. And above the waters were thick clouds, and there was God the creator.
3. The first being eternal, omnipotent, invisible was God the creator.

* The snake. Algonquin symbol of malignant force.

4. He created vast waters, great lands, and much air, and heaven;
5. He created the sun, the moon, and the stars;
6. He caused them all to move well.
7. By his power he made the winds to blow, purifying, and the deep waters to run off;
8. All was made bright, and the islands were brought into being.
9. Then, again, God the creator made the great spirits;
10. He made also the first beings, angels, and souls;
11. Then made he a man, being the father of men;
12. He gave him the first mother, the mother of the early born;
13. Fishes gave he him, turtles, beasts, and birds.
14. But the evil spirit created evil beings, snakes, and monsters;
15. He created vermin and annoying insects. [Query, Mmaketoes?]
16. Then were all beings friends:
17. There being a good God, all spirits were good—
18. The beings, the first men, mothers, wives, little spirits also.
19. Fat fruit were the food of the beings and the little spirits:
20. All were then happy, easy in mind and pleased.
21. Then came secretly on earth the snake [evil] god, the snake-priest, and snake-worship—
22. Came wickedness, came unhappiness,
23. Came then bad weather, disease, and death.
24. This was all very long ago at our early home.

This song and the paraphrase give some interesting statements of the faith of "the poor Indian's untutored mind." There was the watery chaos—"the earth in the water and out of the water"—and the formless clouds, then the mighty God—one God and eternal put forth his power—land and water, air, the expanse or firmament all gemmed with stars, and sun, and moon, moving well. How admirably this agrees with Mosaic history! and how the Indian mind has seized upon the sublime conceptions of the Hebrew historian!

The origin of evil, the knot so hard to untie, is here boldly cut by the theory of the independent evil principle or snake-god.

Seriously, one is struck with the agreement throughout with the inspired history. The creation, the temptation, the fall, with that fall the entrance of misery, where before all "were happy, easy in mind and pleased," and the reign of wickedness, "then came unhappiness, bad weather, disease, and death." All these call up vividly the Bible lessons taught us in our happy Christian homes. And, though we receive not the divinity of the bad spirit, we have read that the serpent tempted Eve, she listened, fell—"sin entered into the world, and death by sin."

As to the origin of these notions there is internal evidence that they had received some Christian traditions. The idea of a Great Spirit prevails among the various Indian tribes, and they have never been Atheists. Atheism is the heritage of civilised fools; the savage is too poor to afford so costly a luxury.

Among the Algonquin tribes the idea of a deluge was every-where received. The details differed in almost each recorded instance, but the event is prominent. The flood is ascribed to the Great Serpent, who is generally placed in antagonism to Manabozho, a powerful demigod or intermediate spirit, about answering to Milton's Michael, the general of the angelic armies. These two persons have many a sore conflict, do vast damage, the deluge being only an instance in the long chapter. In the Walum-Olum, however, there is a slight variation from the above; there it is represented as a general conflict between the "beings"—good spirits—and the maskinako—evil spirits. In midst of the confusion and destruction, Manabozho appears as preserver. Our space will not permit transcribing the entire song in both languages, but we give the paraphrase:

1. Long ago came the powerful serpent [maskanako] when men had become evil. (See Gen. vi, 5, 6.)
2. The strong serpent was the foe of the beings, and they became embroiled, hating each other.
3. Then they fought and despoiled each other, and were not peaceful.
4. And the small men [matlapewi] fought with the keeper of the dead [Nihanlowit].
5. Then the strong serpent resolved all men and beings to destroy immediately.
6. The black serpent, monster, brought the snake-water rushing,
7. The wide waters rushing, wide to the hills, every-where spreading, every-where destroying.
8. At the island of the turtle [tula] was Manabozho, of men and beings the grandfather—
9. Being born creeping, a turtle land he is ready to move and dwell.
10. Men and beings all go forth on the flood of waters, moving afloat, every way seeking the back of the turtle [talapin].
11. The monsters of the sea were many, and destroyed some of them.
12. Then the daughter of a spirit helped them in the boat, and all joined, saying, Come help!
13. Manabozho, of all beings, of men and turtles the grandfather.
14. All together, on the turtle then, the men, then, were all together.
15. Much frightened, Manabozho prayed to the turtle that he would make all well again.
16. Then the waters ran off, it was dry on mountain and plain, and the great evil went elsewhere by the path of the cave.

So ends the song or legend of the deluge. The allusion to the turtle is mysterious. This is known—the Algonquins always held the turtle in as much reverence as a New York alderman.

According to some authors, the mother of the human race having been ejected from heaven was received on the back of a tortoise, around which matter gradually accumulating formed the earth.

There is another tradition, that the great turtle was a chief spirit of the Chippewas—"The spirit that never lied." The island of Michilimackinac was sacred to this spirit, and its name denotes "great turtle." The Turtle tribe of the Lenape claim superiority, because of their relationship to the great turtle, which is their Atlas, bearing the world upon a pair of shoulders particularly broad.

Ah! how much better the clear teachings of the book divine! How simple and yet sublime are its utterances! "What profit? Much every way—chiefly the oracles of God."

The pictured records now go into a detailed history of the tribes, which is interesting and curious, but too long for insertion. The sum is about this: After various migrations the tribes finally reach the great and fine island of the snakes, from which, like worthy St. Patrick, they expel the snakes, and, multiplying, they spread toward the south—the beautiful or shore-land. Here, for the first, they build houses and plant fields. A drouth drives them forth, and they seek the shillilaking, or buffalo land. Dissensions prevail—they separate—one party, the wetamowi, or Wise, tarry, the others remove. The Wise build a town on the Wicwasaw, or Yellow river—the Missouri—and for a long time are peaceful and happy. Warlike chiefs arise, under whom conquests are made in all directions. At length arises the great chief, Opekasit—east-looking—who, wearied with so much slaughter, leads his people toward sunrise. They reach the Mecus-sipu—great river—the Mississippi, where they halt. Here arises chief Tagawanena—the hut-maker—under whose chieftaincy they learn that eastward the land is very rich and possessed by the warlike Tallegwi; thither they remove. The Tallegwi "welcome them to hospitable groves;" the shout, palliton! palliton!—war! war!—is raised, and they assail the Tallegwi; the war rages for many years, till the "manifest destiny" of the northern invaders prevails, and the Tallegwi are driven southward. The conquerors now occupy the country along the Ohio below the great lakes. To their north are their friends, the Talawaton—literally, not of themselves—rendered Huron. They have occasional battles, but no general war.

Here is a break in the history, and the record resumes by saying they dwelt securely in the land of the Tallegwi—they built houses and planted corn. They flourished under a long line of chiefs, and cultivated the arts of peace. But war again arose. After much fighting there was an exode under Linkewinnik—the sharp-looking—who conducted his band eastward, beyond the Thelopokushung, or Alleghany Mountains. Here they spread widely, warring with the Mengwi, or spring people, the Pungelika, lynx or Eries, and the Mohagana, or wolves. The record then gives the division into tribes, and the names of the chiefs, and brings the history down to the European invasion. Here they terminate.

In these traditions these points are very distinct. After the deluge—"long time ago"—they came from the north and made their home away in the west, and from thence they migrated eastward. The Indians generally claim a western origin. Lawson says, "When you ask them [the Carolines] whence their fathers came that first inhabited the country, they point westward and say, 'Where the sun sleeps, our fathers came thence.'"

And whence did they come? Who can tell? "God hath made of one blood all the nations of the earth;" but from what son of antiquity did they descend? From what venerable seer, beside what smoking altar did they receive the truths which, though corrupted, they have never lost? Who built the towers and walls, whose ruins are found thickly scattered through the homes of the fathers? What rolled them backward from civilization, or semi-civilization, to barbarism? Who can tell? Only He whose "counsels" sweep the past and the coming eternity!

Meanwhile they are driven back to the western habitation of their ancestors, and a gloomy destiny awaits them. The other day the writer saw some dozens of them, sole remnants of a once great tribe.

Cruel have they been—often treacherous and revengeful—but they have been cruelly and shamefully wronged, deceived, cheated, and our nation has done it.

May God in mercy pardon our great oppression!

A CONSCIENTIOUS KING.

SATAN labors, and with great success, to deceive mankind into the idea that the adoption of one sin is pardoned, or, at least, excused, if they refrain from others. In this way did he work upon Herod, who, though living in incest with Herodias, yet was very tender and scrupulous about an oath: "Nevertheless, for his oath's sake." O, what a conscientious king! what a very conscientious king!

GHOST STORIES.

BY ALICE CARY.

NUMBER IV.

SCENE FIRST.

A BRIGHT fire in the grate of a fashionable parlor in the city of—no matter what. Leaving curtains, carpets, sofas, pictures, and all to the imagination, we come at once to the two inmates—a fat, powdered and curled, and pompous woman, and a small, pampered, and puffed-out lap-dog; the woman dozing on the cushions of the sofa, and the dog muffled luxuriantly up in her lace mantle, wheezing and sneezing now and then, but not at all to the discomfort of the elegant lady, as it appeared from her motionless posture and deep and satisfied breathing. The bronze clock had run silently past one, and would presently reach two, when the door-bell rang once, and again and again loud and impatiently, and in the midst of the clang a young lady, muffled in shawls, the price of which would have made many a poor family happy, entered the room hurriedly, and demanded, with an angry gesture, why she was kept waiting an hour in the chill of a December midnight.

"I am sure, my dear Louise, it could not have been long. I heard the servant in the hall almost the very moment you rang."

"Much you know about it, mamma, fast asleep by the fire. I don't suppose it seemed long to you. Is there no tea for me, and nothing to eat? I am almost dead;" and the splendidly dressed and really handsome young lady dashed herself into the easy chair, which she pulled rather roughly against her mamma, and employed herself in almost wrenching off bracelets and pins, which she tossed aside as the veriest trifles.

"I did not suppose, my dear, that you would care to eat after the supper at the ball; but I will order a cup of tea at once; and what else will you have, my sweet child—a sandwich—a bit of chicken, or what?"

"Don't trouble yourself," answered the pouting Louise; "but I don't know how you supposed I could eat in corsets and white gloves, and this dress—preposterous!"

Notwithstanding this discouraging reception of her proposal, the mamma arose to give the order; and the puffed-up dog, whose name was Queen, leaped to the caressing arms of its worshipful mistress, the haughty, handsome, and spoiled Louise, who took its little silken ears in her delicate hands with a fondness she would have disdained to bestow on a fellow-mortal just then.

Scarcely five minutes were gone, when the tea, together with other delicacies which need not be mentioned, were brought, and the shining service of silver and china were arranged near the glowing fire; but Louise had no appetite now; she preferred to go to bed, and ordered the things removed forthwith.

"What is the matter with my pretty dear?" asked the mother, in tenderest accents, and at the same time loosening the pearls and flowers from her daughter's hair, that was wound in heavy and luxuriant braids about the forehead of the girl. But not till two or three maids were called out of bed to free the lady from her troublesome finery, and array her in a comfortable dressing-gown, did her ill-humor in any wise begin to subside. At this juncture she was prevailed on to sip a little wine and eat a mouthful or two to sustain her till the morrow, which delicate beginning ended in the second bringing of the tea and salver. At the close of the repast, the pretty darling was coaxed into an unburdening of her mind to her anxious mamma, on this wise:

The ball had been a brilliant affair; but in its splendors, even the lavish expenditure bestowed on the beautiful Louise had been quite eclipsed, or she fancied it was so, and, at any rate, had failed to draw after her the admiration and attention she had expected. That flower must be beautiful, indeed, that draws all the loiterers of the garden to one spot; and there are those who admire the modest and unpretending daisy more than the flaunting hollyhock or the high-looking sunflower.

"I might as well have staid at home," she said, wiping some real tears into her lace handkerchief, "and I wish I had—the fact is, mother, there were plenty of ladies, not half so much dressed as I, who were more sought. I could have scratched their faces, and torn their little quiet ribbons to pieces. I was never so provoked and disappointed. If I had not tried to be the belle, I should not care; but just think of it—I was like a silent peacock in an orchard full of singing-birds. I shan't go to the next ball; I'll show them that a ball is a small thing to me. I am sure I don't care a straw for any body that I saw to-night, man nor woman; they may admire each other as much as they choose; I shan't put myself in their way any more." And making her face ugly with its unamiable expression, the spoiled beauty put herself into a defiant posture.

"Pray, how did such and such a one look?" asked the mamma; "did Mary E. wear the old blue satin train? and did Miss W. appear in the everlasting white silk? Really, I should think their old dresses would attract attention to them by this time, if nothing else;" and the two ladies laughed affectedly.

"Well, never mind, my dear," said the elder, presently; "suppose we go off out of town, just in the height of the season, and see if we are not missed. I guess our suppers will not be easily supplied, and I rather think there will be some inquiry made about us before long. It will be serving the whole set just right. What say you, Louise—will it not be exquisite revenge?"

The daughter agreed that it would be most delightful, and clapped her little hands in glee, as she thought what a sensation their secret resolve would make throughout the great city if it were only known. It is probable, however, that she quite overrated the importance of herself, and that no startling effects would have been observable in the cold and dark of the aforesaid December, if their curious conspiracy could have been made public.

Then arose the question where they should go; for, after a little reflection, it appeared quite clear to the elder lady that if they should make themselves a little less conspicuous, they would be more sought; that their assumed indifference to the gayeties in which they might share would, in fact, throw about them a wonderful charm; "And there is cousin Victor Blake's—his quiet country-house will afford delightful pastime for a month. We shall have riding for pleasant days, you know; and then we shall be the leaders of every thing, for his simple-minded neighbors don't know any thing about stylish folks. Bless me, is not the idea charming?"

The young lady said it was charming; but her face wore its sullen and dissatisfied expression still, which even the caresses of the pet Queen failed to soften. Quite different was the expression on the face of the elder lady; her keen gray eyes were evidently resting on some triumph, the nature of which she did not impart to the disappointed Louise. A shrewd calculator, however, might have guessed the object upon which her mental vision was resting, and whereunto her assured smile lengthened itself. "Yes, yes," she said, "we will drop in upon Victor for a month or so; he is rich and handsome—or he was handsome when I saw him last—that is some four or five years ago. A very delightful person he is, too, or was. I really wonder why I have neglected him so long. He must be a man of some importance in his neighborhood. I wonder if he is still mewed up with old Jane, that crazy sister of his! Pity she were not in an asylum. I will try to effect her removal; it would be such a relief to poor Victor to be rid of her."

What further she designed to effect she said not; but, as I remarked, an inference might have been drawn from the enjoyment with which she dwelt on the handsome and wealthy young man, and the pertinacity with which she insisted on the belief that he could not possibly be much over forty, and was a very proper match for a girl past twenty-seven. She did not say Louise was twenty-seven; on the contrary, she said, "You are understood to be twenty-one, my dear, are you not?"

"What is the difference about my age?" replied Louise; "you ask me every other day; I am younger than you are, and that's enough!"

This outbreak was quieted by a kiss from the mother, and a sudden change of the subject to the snow which came driving against the windows.

"Well, my love," resumed the mother, "we will make our preparations very quietly to-morrow, and the day following we shall be off, and then what a vacuum there will be in society here!"

So near the daybreak of the aforementioned December night the mother and daughter separated.

We need only say that they were rich and idle people, on no very good terms with the world, nor yet with themselves; for it is impossible to be satisfied with ourselves while we live selfishly and idly. Their name was Gordon, and their fireside the frequent scene of bitterer anger and disputation than what we have recorded. To make a sensation; to be thought to have more money and more servants, and a larger house and more liberal expenditure than they really had; and to have it supposed that they were respectively younger by ten or twelve years than they were, that their relatives were all people of distinction, and had at their disposal the highest positions in the country, was the great aim of their lives. And on their small capital it was an exceedingly hard thing to effect.

SCENE SECOND.

The snow coming down on the roof of a very comfortable country-mansion; all quiet and still without; the trees taking the snows noiselessly, and no wind stirring their dry tops. At two or three windows only are there lights; for though the house is ample, it seems not to have many inhabitants. Within, if we had been there, we should have had our first impressions confirmed. In the kitchen sits a tidy middle-aged woman, sewing on some pretty material, which she now and then spreads out in the candlelight as if to admire—probably, too, to contemplate the progress she is making. The fire of wood burns bright before her, and in its warmth, and near the woman's feet, lies the great watch-dog, fast asleep. A large wooden bowl of flour stands on the table, near which a cup is brimming up with yeast, and a basin of apples hard by, and a neatly dressed fowl, together with a small measure of coffee, indicate the preparation for breakfast. All is orderly, and wherever you turn indications of plenty meet you—the proprietor is neither mean nor poor, you will say at once. And is this the mistress with the sewing work? possibly; and yet, though you scarcely know why, something inclines you to decide in the negative, and at the same time you are far from believing her only a servant; her face beams with kindly intelligence, her tongue makes cheerful music with a pious hymn, and her hands ply the needle industriously.

Adjoining this room is another, on the ample hearth of which a bright wood-fire is burning; rich draperies hang over the windows, some pots of flowers bloom in exquisite vases, and some shelves of elegantly bound books completely occupy one side of the room. The carpet is not showy, but of an exceedingly rich and costly pattern; and all the furnishing of the place evinces cultivated taste and liberal means.

Sitting on a low stool before the fire is a young girl, or seemingly young, for it may be the simplicity of her dress, which is almost childish, and the many curls falling about her bare neck and shoulders, take something from the years that have gone over her. As she looks up from her profitless employment—the cutting and making of paper flowers—there is, you will see, a wandering and unsettled light in her deep-blue eyes, and an expression both of pain and pleasure in her face which you will find it impossible to reconcile. Now she laughs out with excess of glee, and now she is pouting and petulant, perhaps crying; and now, with serious and earnest countenance, sits looking into her own heart as though it were a troubling mystery to her. Now she goes to the window as though in expectancy of some one, bending her ear close to the pane, and listening very eagerly. You can not tell whether she is child or woman, nor whether she is pleased or vexed; for her cheek flushes and grows pale alternately, and her eyes now flash and then again swim in tears.

The room has another inmate, though, for the most part, she seemed unconscious of it—a young man, with blue eyes like the girl's, and black, luxuriant tresses like hers, too. He is reading at a table, or, rather, his eyes are fixed on an open book; for his face changes not its almost solemn expression, and he turns no leaf of the book on which his eyes are resting.

If you come close to him, you will see that his black hair is streaked with white; and though no melancholy sigh escapes him, you will be conscious of a grief too deep to be thus dissipated. An hour goes by, and another, and all this time he has sat without motion or change of muscle. A light shines down in his face, and the cheerful voice of the woman that we have seen in the adjoining room asks if it is not time for Jenny to go to bed; he assents in silence, and reaches out his arm to the girl, who comes for the good-night kiss, and the two women go out together. Let us go, too, closing the door softly behind us, and placing this scene against the first, see if we shall not conclude we have been looking into the home of Mrs. Gordon's handsome cousin—Victor Blake—and if pretty Jenny is not the crazy Jane we have heard of.

SCENE THIRD.

Snow in the December midnight—the dense black woods whitening under its weight, and the tree-tops bending almost together above a lone-some little house, neighbored only by silence and darkness, for far as the eye can see no window light shines. The watch-dog whines at the door—the rude, low, unpainted door—and hard by stands one cow, unsheltered and shivering. Humble, homely, mournful, is all without; but within is the desolation of desolations—death is there—the children are weeping and can not be comforted, and the wife and mother is dumb with an awful sorrow, for her heart is in the coffin by which she sits so still. He is gone who was dearer than life—gone to that bourn whence no traveler returns; and her empty arms shall find nothing in the world to fill them again; the roof seems lowering itself to smother her, and the hearthlight is dead, and the smiles of her children stifled. She, too, must die; there is nothing left but to die. And yet weeping about her are sons and daughters that she must live for—that she will live for by and by, when the shadow of this terrible affliction shall have lifted itself a little. Three little boys and two lovely girls are there, and about the eldest, whose sweet name is Mary, the others are gathered, and to her they seem looking for comfort. With a strong effort she silences her own anguish to soothe theirs; her arms are now about one and now about another, and her whispered words seem steady up their hearts, for they weep less wildly as she caresses and talks to them. "When will the morning come?" they say, again and again. Alas! it will bring only a new sorrow—the grave will then close over the face, which, though so hushed and white, they are still permitted to look upon; and no more then forever shall they see their father come home from the fields when the night closes—no more shall they tell by the evening fireside the little story of their daily life—no more rejoice in the bright promise of a new hat or gown—no more hail the full moon that illuminates all the woods—and no more look across years of toil and privation to some time in the distance, when the rude little house shall have given place to a pretty cottage, and the rough wild trees to a garden full of flowers: all plans, all prospects, all hopes, are swept into the impenetrable dark.

Poor little company of mourners! the sun that is down will come up again, the storm drives the ship into the haven sometimes, and the snow makes the wheat green in its time. The grass and the daisies creep over the grave-mound, and at length the peace of reconciliation comes over the heart.

But words are useless; grief must have its way, and time will do its work. You have still a Father in heaven, and he will not forget nor forsake you. Let us leave the mourners with their dead. We have seen how poor they are, and how hopeless they are—let us go.

SCENE FOURTH.

The sun shines across the level snow, and the thin shadows of the leafless trees look cold enough as they stretch eastward; the citizens are hurrying homeward, closely wrapped in muffs and cloaks, and the country people are not much abroad. Faces press to the windows of the houses that dot the roadside as the stage-coach is heard muffling through the snow. The face of the driver is as red as a rose, as it shines out from the gray cap tied close under the chin, and his thick woolen mittens seem not to keep his hands warm, for he thumps them together every little while, as he holds the reins between his knees. Gayly the four white horses toss their manes, and proudly they arch their necks, as over the hills and along the level way they dash forward—a great cloud of smoke precedes them, and their snorting may be heard a good deal farther than the noise of the coach-wheels.

The twilight seems to have fallen suddenly, and the passengers all look from the windows of the coach; but they have come into a thick woods, and that is all—nothing is to be seen but trees, high black trees, standing close along each side of the way, and between them lies the snow, white and unbroken. Yes, here is a rude little cabin by the wayside, and three little bareheaded boys are out in the cold, hailing the coach; a young girl stands in the door crying, and a middle-aged woman, wearing a black kerchief and a mourning ribbon on her plain cap, is holding the hand of the young woman, and apparently giving her some words of parting advice. By the gate stands a small trunk, which is lifted to the coach-top; and the young woman, who is clad simply, poorly indeed, turning from the little faces, pulls hurriedly the black veil over her eyes, and climbs up the steps of the coach unassisted; for who of the gentlemen inside will step down into the snow to help a poor girl like her?

She hesitates, for some one calls out, "There is no room." The driver throws down the reins, and says, authoritatively, "Make room on the back seat;" and the two elegant ladies seated there reluctantly gather up their ample skirts, looking their displeasure at the poor girl, who, timid and trembling, takes a scanty and comfortless seat.

Often she puts her coarse plain handkerchief to her eyes as she goes along; but the veil covers them, and if she weeps no one sees it.

Dim and red the sun stays among the tree-tops, but does not shine any longer. With ax on his shoulder, the chopper walks briskly home, and windows begin to show ruddy fires within. It is the time "the busy housewife plies her evening care." The reins are tightened at the gate of a large white house, which stands in a yard that is filled with trees and shrubberies. It has a silent and melancholy look in spite of the evident wealth of the proprietor. Two of the inside passengers find themselves on the ground the same moment to offer their hands to the two elegant ladies, whose journey is here ended. The coach is lightened of a quantity of baggage, and dashes forward again, while the ladies make their way up the snow-covered avenue. Need we say they are Mrs. Gordon and daughter, and that they are come to pass a month with cousin Victor?

On the neighboring hill, and partly screened by a clump of elm-trees, stands a small rustic school-house, which the young girl notices with much interest; and a little farther on, at an old-fashioned farm-house, she is set down. She is evidently expected, for two striplings come romping forward, and, carrying the trunk between them, lead the way to the house; and when they have reached the door, they wait a moment to say they don't think the young woman looks much like a school-mistress.

That she is the Mary we saw at midnight in the cabin, comforting her brothers and sisters; and that she has come now among strangers to earn something for them by school-teaching, is the supposition which the reader has doubtless made. We leave to their imagining her struggle and her sorrow, her homesickness and heart-sickness, till the evening of a mild February day is closing in, and she is seen following a troop of noisy boys and girls at a little distance, quietly, and reading as she walks. She does not see the two ladies and the gentleman who are cantering down the road, but keeps right forward, her eyes intent on the book before her. The younger of the ladies is well nigh upon her, yet she turns not her horse aside; suddenly she feels his breath in her face, and, hastily stepping back, lets fall the book; the horse tramples it beneath his feet, and the gay rider goes forward with a merry and derisive laugh. The other lady follows, wondering what little body could be so impudent as to remain in the middle of the road when they were coming up.

"But where is Victor?" asks the young lady, looking anxiously back. "Stupid fellow! I thought he would consider my spurring a challenge, and come after me."

But whether or not the gentleman understood the challenge, he was evidently indifferent to it; for he no sooner saw the accident than he was on the ground, and, taking up the soiled volume, offered such apologies as caused the young school-mistress not a little confusion. "No," he said, as she reached for the book, "you must allow me to replace it; and as for the carelessness of my guest, I can neither ask you to forgive it nor to excuse it;" and bowing low, he remounted, and rode forward at a pace which did not allow him to overtake the ladies till they reached the gate of home.

SCENE FIFTH.

Victor sits at the fireside, and his sister Jenny on a low stool at his feet—her head rests on his knee, and his hand is laid on her head. The shutters are closed, and the rain beats dismally against them; but the room is full of warm light, and all looks cheerful. Mrs. Gordon and her daughter Louise come in together—dressed and overdressed, especially the younger, who evidently supposes herself irresistible as she adjusts pins and flowers; that she will complete a conquest to-night she is resolved, and, by way of eliciting some attention and manifestation, she says, childishly and poutingly, which she fancies her most charming method, "Don't you think, mamma, that Victor is growing tired of us? He don't talk to me, and I believe he wants me to go home."

"What a darling you are!" replied the mamma; "just as if cousin Victor could ever be tired of you;" and seeing that cousin Victor said nothing, she went on, "Naughty cousin, why don't you tell Louise?"

"Tell her what?" asked the cousin, quietly.

"Whether you want her to go home. Now, honor bright."

"My house is quite at her service, certainly, so long as she is pleased to honor me;" and Victor lifted not his eyes from the fire as he spoke.

"Do you hear him, Louise?" whispered the mamma; "that is as much of a declaration as we can ever expect him to make."

"Pardon me," she resumed to Victor, after a brief silence, "but don't you think it would be a nice thing to send Jane away? It would be so much pleasanter, you know."

Jenny lifted her head as though the meaning of the words were perfectly clear to her, and, catching at her brother's hand, began to cry.

"Thank you for your kind intentions," replied Victor, and he said nothing more.

"I don't know, of course; it's all as you and Louise think," Mrs. Gordon said; for by boldly assuming the devotion of Victor to her daughter, she seemed to think would make it truth; and so quietly, and as though she were rather in the way of the sentiment, she withdrew, coaxing Jenny, with the promise of some pretty toy, to accompany her.

"Now, tell me true," said Louise, seating herself on the vacant stool at his feet, when they were left alone, "don't you want me to go away, so you can go and visit the school-mistress? Now, true, Victor. An't you half in love with her?"

"No, certainly not."

"But did you not go to see her last night, and carry her such a sweet, pretty book for the ugly, old one my bad horse trod on?"

"Yea."

"You did?"

"Certainly I did."

"Then I will go home, and you may go to see her, if you choose. I don't want to be in your way."

"I don't know," said Victor, "how you can suppose yourself in my way. I shall visit the school-mistress without such movement on your part, if she will permit me."

"You shall, shall you?"

"To be sure."

"And yet you pretend to tell me that you are not half in love with her?"

"I said so."

"Pray, then, how are you?"

"Altogether in love; may it please you."

Louise flew out of the room, crying, "I always thought you a fool, and now I know it," to seek comfort in the arms of her mother.

Till long after midnight they consoled with one another; often repeating the asseveration that never were woman so abused in all the world; and at daylight they took an unceremonious leave. If they were to appear in another scene, Louise would be venting her disappointment and petulance on the poor maid who plucked from her head the gray hairs preparatory to her re-entering society; and the mother would be discoursing on the excellent match which her daughter might have made but for one trifling circumstance, upon which she does not enlarge.

SCENE SIXTH.

The sweet, sweet May! God has made the world as it were new; the birds are flying wild with music, and the greenness on the hills and on the trees makes glad the heart. The silver moonlight of the April and the golden sunlight have been transmuted into flowers, and hill and valley are spotted with white and yellow.

About the many porches of the house we have talked of the jasmin grows starry, the lilacs are all purple, and the roses are beginning to show their crimson. The dewy clovers make all the air pleasant, and the young wheat gives a rich promise.

Sitting in an arbor, half in sunshine and half in shadow, is Victor and his young and excellent wife, the Mary of the cottage and the school-house. And like the light in which they sit, their hearts are touched with a mingled feeling of joy and sorrow. They are talking of Jenny, and Victor is making a troubled confession to the fair priestess of his heart. I need not repeat his words, but the substance of the story is this:

When he was young and careless, he was much in the habit of mingling with young persons more gay and careless than himself. Often it happened that he was away from his father's house the greater part of the night; but always, however late he returned, his good sister Jane was waiting for him. Often he resolved to amend, but the time of amendment came not.

At length, one dismal night, when their parents had gone to watch with the corpse of a neighbor who was dead by violence, and the house seemed lonesome, almost fearfully so, he went out, as usual, and notwithstanding the entreaties of his sister that he would remain with her. There was an engagement which he must keep, he said, but he would come back early, surely and surely, he would. But wine is a mocker, and he forgot his good intentions, and the clock had struck twice since the midnight when he found himself at home. Jenny was not waiting for him that night; he had wearied out even her patience; and he, with a mind sick with remorse, and a body sick with dissipation, went to his own room, and was soon lost in an insane dream. He would go and watch with his sister now to atone for all her watching. So gathering the sheet about him, he went softly to her room, and, without speaking or making any noise, sat down on her bedside. Poor Jenny, whose nerves had endured all they could with the excitement and prolonged watching of the night, awoke, and saw what she supposed to be her brother's ghost—such, at least, was the supposition, for from that night her reason was gone. Then, indeed, came the reformation and the life of atonement, or of all the atonement that was possible.

And Mary wept as she heard the story; but smiled again as her three little brothers burst laughing into the bower, and, training the jasmin, she saw Jenny talking the while with her own good mother, who was smiling at last.

WHO IS WISE?

I ASKED the statesman, "Who is wise?" He replied, "The man who best understands the fundamental principles of civil and political government."

The man of the sword responds, "He is wise who can vanquish an army more powerful than his own."

The miser thought, that every one knew that the wise man was he who gets much and spends nothing.

The man of letters informed me, that he was wise who felt himself perfectly at home in the whole circle of the arts and sciences.

The physician said, "He is wise who is successful in removing the diseases of the human system."

I heard these and various other replies, and being dissatisfied with all, I sought the Bible, and with augmented earnestness I repeated my inquiry, "Who is wise?" and I met this satisfactory answer, "He that winneth souls is wise."

DREAMS OF MY EARLY HOME.

BY MISS MARY M. ROBERTSON.

Loar in deepest meditation,
Through the land of dreams I roam,
And the wings of fancy bear me
To my early childhood's home.

Lost to all that now surrounds me,
Still on memory's page I gaze;
There portrayed in glowing colors
Are the scenes of other days.

O, it is a lovely picture!
Verdant plains before me lie;
Hills in beautiful confusion,
Ranged along the western sky.

Now a sound so sweet salutes me,
Sure to music 'tis allied—
'Tis the song of many streamlets
Wand'ring down the mountain-side.

Now from rock to rock they're falling,
Sparkling in the sunshine's glow;
Pure and sweet the crystal waters—
How I love to see them flow!

Now they're lost in cooling shadows
Of the thickly clustering trees;
Rippling on and gently murmur'ing,
Slightly ruffled by the breeze.

In yon green and shady corner
Children form a joyous ring;
Some are listening to the echoes,
While the others laugh and sing.

I'm among the gleeful prattlers,
Happy as in days of yore;
For the scene is all ideal,
And I am a child once more.

Beautiful the ivy flowers,
O'er the rocky cliffs they climb;
Sweetly in the woodland bowers
Blooms the sweet, wild jessamine.

Sweet the breath of gentle zephyrs
Wafted from the orchard-trees:
'Tis the early dawn of summer;
Fragrance floats on ev'ry breeze.

Happy children! we've been wand'ring
Through the vales and o'er the lawn;
Crown'd with flowers, we're returning,
For the hour of eve has come.

O'er the plains and in the valleys
Shades are deepening into night;
But on yonder lofty mountain
Still there linger beams of light.

O'er these lovely scenes of mem'ry
How delighted do I range!
But, when turning to the present,
O, how wondrous seems the change!

Still the mountains stand in grandeur;
Still the little streams are there;
Still the flow'rets bloom in beauty,
Filling with perfume the air;

But how broken is the number
Of those happy childish bands!
Some lie cold in death's deep slumber;
Others roam in foreign lands.

Yes, the dearest ties are severed
Ne'er to be united here;
But I trust we'll meet together
In a land more bright and fair.

There the scene is ever glowing;
There no gloom obscures the sky;
There in bright, immortal beauty
Flowers blossom ne'er to die.

A LAY OF LIFE.

BY MRS. H. BENTON.

FANCY sang in airy lightness
Siren songs of melody,
While she wove chameleon brightness
In the woof of life for me.

"List," she whispered, "Life's a river,
Gliding on 'twixt banks of flowers,
And the midnight shadeth never Round her bright Elysian bowers."

Surely, thought I, there's no sorrow
In a dream so passing fair,
But each bright returning morrow
Brings of joy a richer share.

To my lip she press'd a beaker,
Brimming o'er with nectar sweet;
Saw not I nor fear, nor breaker,
Where the flower and wavelet meet.

Then I launched out gayly, gladly,
O'er the wave my little bark;
But the waters dash now sadly,
And the clouds seem growing dark.

There are thousands round me sailing,
That my charmer hath beguill'd;
But their rosy dreams are paling
'Mid the tempest, dark and wild.

Now I in my bark am sitting,
'Mid the wrecks of Fancy's joy—
All her brightest hopes seem fleeting—
All her sweetest soonest cloy.

I am shrinking—yes, am shrinking—
From the fever-cup of care,
Which the busy throng seem drinking,
Chasing after bubbles fair.

O, they say the home of angels
Is so very, very bright,
Where the holy, pure evangel
Shed around their perfect light!

I am sighing—groaning, sighing—
For the land of glory there;
Where the spirit knows no cloying,
Knows no fever-cup of care.

RUSSIAN HOME-LIFE.

AN English lady who, for ten years, was domesticated among the Russians, and did not quit their country till some time after the commencement of the present war, has just published—under the title of "An Englishwoman in Russia"—three hundred and fifty pages of information upon the actual state of society in that empire. The book confirms ideas familiar to many people; but, inasmuch as it does this in the most satisfactory way, wholly by illustrations drawn from personal experience or information of a trustworthy kind, its value is equal to its interest. Having read it we lay it down, and here make note of some of the impressions it has left upon us.

The Czar of Russia practically stands before the greater number of his subjects as a little more than God. "The Czar is near—God is far off," is a common Russian saying. "God and the Czar knows it," is the Russian for our "Heaven knows!" A gentleman, describing one evening the Emperor's reception on the route to Moscow, said, "I assure you, it was gratifying in the extreme; for the peasants kneeled as he passed, just as if he were the Almighty himself." And who shall contradict this deity? Our countrywoman was once at the opera when the Emperor was graciously disposed to applaud Madame Castellan by the clapping of his hands. Immediately some one hissed. He repeated his applause; the hiss was repeated. His Majesty stood up—looked round the house with dignity—and, for the third time, solemnly clapped his hands. The hiss followed again. Then a tremendous scuffle overhead. The police had caught the impious offender. An example of another kind was made by a young lady whose brother was killed at Kalafat, and who, on receiving news of his death, smiled, and said, "She was rejoiced to hear it, as he had died for the Emperor." Imperial munificence rewarded her with a splendid dowry, and the assurance that her future fortune should be cared for.

There is need now to encourage a show of patriotism. The Englishwoman who, on her return, found London streets as full of peace as when she quitted them, had left St. Petersburg wearing a far different aspect. Long lines of cannon and ammunition wagons drawn up here and there; parks of artillery continually dragged about; outworks being constructed; regiments marching in and out; whole armies submitting to inspection and departing on their mission, told of the deadly struggle to which the Czar's ambition had committed him. There was no hour in which wretched recruits might not be seen tramping in wearily, by hundreds and by thousands, to receive the Emperor's approval. It is hard for us in this country to conceive the misery attending the terrible conscriptions which plague the subjects of the Russian empire. Except recruits, hardly a young man is to be seen in any of the villages; the post-roads are being all mended by women and girls. Men taken from their homes and families leave behind among the women broken ties and the foundation of a dreadful mass of vice and immorality. It is fearful enough under ordinary circumstances. "True communism," says a Russian noble, "is to be found only in Russia."

One morning a poor woman went crying bitterly to the Englishwoman, saying that her two nephews had just been forced from her house to go into the army. "I tried"—we leave the relator of these things to speak in her own impressive words—"I tried to console her, saying that they would return when the war was over; but this only made her more distressed. 'No, no!' exclaimed she, in the deepest sorrow, 'they will never come back again; the Russians are beaten in every place.' Till lately the lower classes were always convinced that the Emperor's troops were invincible; but it seems, by what she said, that even they have got to know something of the truth. A foreigner in St. Petersburg informed me that he had 'gone to see the recruits that morning, but there did not seem to be much patriotism among them: there was nothing but sobs and tears to be seen among those who were pronounced fit for service, while the rejected ones were frantic with delight, and bowed and crossed themselves with the greatest gratitude.' Reviews were being held almost daily when the Englishwoman left, and she was told that, on one occasion, when reviewing troops destined for the south, the Emperor was struck with the forlorn and dejected air of the poor sheep whom he was sending to the slaughter.

"Hold your heads up!" he exclaimed, angrily. "Why do you look so miserable? There is nothing to cause you to look so." There is something to cause him to be so, we are very much disposed to think.

But we did not mean to tell about the war. The vast empire over which the Czar has rule is in a half-civilized—it would be almost more correct to say—in an uncivilized state. Great navigable rivers roll useless through extensive wilds. Except the excellent roads that connect St. Petersburg with Moscow and with Warsaw, and a few fragments of road serving as drives in the immediate vicinity of these towns, there are no roads at all in Russia that are roads in any civilized sense. The post-roads of the empire are clearings through wood, with boughs of trees laid here and there, tracks over steppes and through morasses. There is every-where the grandeur of nature; but it is the grandeur of its solitudes. A few huts surround government post-stations, and small brick houses at intervals of fifteen or twenty miles along the routes are the halting-places of gangs destined for Siberia. A few log-huts, many of them no better than the wigwags of red Indians, some of them adorned with elegant wood tracery, a line of such dwellings, and commonly also a row of willows by the wayside, indicate a Russian village. A number of churches and monasteries with domes and cupolas, green, gilt, or dark blue, studded with golden stars, and surmounted each by a cross standing on a crescent; barracks, a government school, and a post-office; a few good houses and a great number of huts—constitute a Russian provincial town, and the surrounding wastes or forests shut it in. The rapid traveler who follows one of the two good lines of road, and sees only the show-places of Russian civilization, may be very much deceived. Yet even here he is deceived only by a show. The great buildings that appear so massive are of stuccoed brick, and even the massive grandeur of the quays, like that of infinitely greater works—the Pyramids—is allied closely to the barbarous. They were constructed at enormous sacrifice of life. The foundations of St. Petersburg were laid by levies of men who perished by hundreds of thousands in the work. One hundred thousand died of famine only.

The civilization of the Russian capital is not more than skin-deep. One may see this any day in the streets. The pavements are abominable. Only two or three streets are lighted with gas; in the rest oil glimmers. The oil lamps are the dimmer for being subject to the peculation of officials. Three wicks are charged for, and two only are burnt: the difference is pocketed by the police. All the best shops are kept by foreigners, the native Russian shops being mostly collected in a central bazar, Gostinoy Dwor. The shopkeepers appeal to the ignorance of a half-barbarous nation by putting pictures of their trades over their doors; and in his shop a Russian strives to cheat with oriental recklessness. Every shop in St. Petersburg contains a mirror for the use of customers. "Mirrors," says the Englishwoman, "hold the same position in Russia as clocks do in England. With us time is valuable; with them appearance. They care not though it be mainly false appearance." They even paint their faces. The lower classes of women use a great deal of white paint, and, as it contains mercury, it injures alike health and skin. A young man paying his court to a girl generally presents her with a box of red and white paint to improve her looks; and in the upper classes ladies are often to be seen by one another, as they arrive at a house, openly rouging their faces before entering the room.

These are small things, indicative of an extensive principle. Peter the Great undertook to civilize Russia by a coup-de-main. A walk is shown at St. Petersburg along which he made women march unveiled between files of soldiery to accustom them to go unveiled. But civilization is not to be introduced into a nation by imperial edict, and ever since Peter the Great's time the Russian empire has been laboring to stand for what it is not; namely, the equivalent to nations that have become civilized in the slow lapse of time. It can only support, or attempt to support, this reputation by deceit. It must hide, or attempt to hide—and it has hidden from many eyes with much success its mass of barbarism, while by clever and assiduous imitation, as well as by pretensions cunningly sustained, it must put forward a show of having what it only in some few directions even strives to get.

The Russian ladies have little to do but read dissolute French novels—which the censorship does not exclude—dress and undress, talk slander, and criticise the dresses of themselves and one another. Their slaves do all that might usefully occupy their hands, and they are left to idleness; which results in a horrible amount of immorality. The trading classes and officials talk almost exclusively of money. The enslaved peasants, bound to the soil, content when they are not much beaten, sing over the whole country their plaintive songs—they are all set in the minor key—and each carries an ax in his girdle; for which the day may come when he finds terrible use.

At present that day seems to be very distant. The ignorant house slaves, like the negroes holding the same rank elsewhere, are treated as children. A new footman, in a household which the Englishwoman visited—a man six feet two out of his shoes—was found to have an aptitude for breakage. He was told one day that when next he let any thing fall he would be punished. On the day following he dropped the fish-ladle in handing fish at the beginning of dinner. He looked dolefully at his master, expecting that blows would be ordered. His mistress—put him in the corner! Their ignorance is lamentable. A Russian gentleman returned from abroad, where he had seen better things, determined to devote his life and fortune to the enlightenment of his peasantry. Their priest taught them that he was destroying ancient customs, and that his design was to subvert the religion of their forefathers. "The consequence was that the slaves formed a conspiracy against him; and shot him one evening as he was reading a book in his own sitting-room."

Sometimes they take vengeance upon the oppressor; and terrible incidents of this kind came within the experience of our countrywoman. The heads of cruel masters are sometimes cleft with the hatchet of the serf. They are capable at the same time of strong feudal attachments. It should be understood that all the slaves in Russia are not poor. Some of the wealthiest traders in St. Petersburg are slaves to nobles who will not suffer them to buy their freedom, but enjoy the pride of owning men who themselves own in some cases hundreds of thousands of pounds capital. The inheritor of an estate in which there were many well-to-do serfs arrived at it for the first time one evening, and in the morning found his house, as he thought, besieged. His people had heard that he was in debt; and their pride being hurt at servitude to an embarrassed master, they brought with them a gift of money raised among themselves, not less than five-and-forty thousand pounds, their free-will offering, to make a man of him again. He did not need this help, but the illustration still remains of the great generosity of feeling possible among this class of Russians.

The slaves detached from their lords, and living in a comparatively independent state, acknowledge their subjection to the soil by the payment of a poll-tax. Oppressive owners often use this claim of poll-tax as a means of devouring all the earnings of a struggling slave. Our Englishwoman met with a poor cook, who had served a seven years' apprenticeship in a French house, and earned high wages in a family, besides being allowed to earn many fees by superintending public suppers and private parties. There was an upper servant under the same roof with him whom this poor fellow strove to marry; but much as he earned, he strove in vain to save. Year by year the abrock or poll-tax was raised in proportion to the progress that he made; and the last time the English lady saw him, he was sobbing bitterly over an open letter—a demand from his proprietor for more abrock, and an answer to a request from madame with whom he served that she might buy his freedom, naming an impossible sum that doomed him to continued slavery.

There was a poor man in Twer, a slave, born with a genius for painting that in any civilized country would have procured for him fame and fortune. His master, finding how he was gifted, doomed him to study under a common portrait-painter, and obliged him then to pay a poll-tax, which he could only raise from year to year by painting a great number of cheap portraits—he who had genius for higher and better things. "When we last saw him," writes our countrywoman, "he had pined into a decline; and doubtless ere this the village grave has closed over his griefs and sorrows, and buried his genius in the shades of its eternal oblivion."

The Englishwoman was present once when a bargain was struck for a dressmaker. A gentleman had dropped in to dine; the host mentioned that his wife wanted a good dressing-maid. The guest recommended one, skillful in dressmaking, with whom he thought his wife would part. "Well," the other said, "her price?" "Two hundred and fifty silver roubles." That was more than could be given; but the bargain finally was struck for a hundred roubles and an old piano.

Such a servant must be content to submit to much oppression. The mistress who parts with you in the drawing-room with a smile, may be met ten minutes afterward in the garden, her face inflamed with rage, beating a man before her, one of the serfs employed upon the grounds. A lady who lost much money at the gambling-table, being pressed to pay a debt of honor, remembered that she had not a few female servants who possessed the most beautiful hair. She ordered them all to be cropped and their hair sold for her benefit, regardless of the fact that together with their hair she robbed them of their reputations; cropped hair being one of the marks set on a criminal.

The boxing of the ears of maids is not below the dignity of any lady; but when the maid is not a Russian, there may be some danger in the practice. A princess whose hair was being dressed by a French waiting-maid, receiving some accidental scratch, turned round and slapped the face of her attendant. The Frenchwoman had the lady's back hair in her hands at the time, and, grasping it firmly, held her head fast, while she administered a sound correction on the cheeks and ears of her highness with the back of her hair-brush. It was an insult that could not be resented publicly. A lady of her highness's blood could not let it be said that a servant had given her a beating, and she, therefore, bribed the Frenchwoman by money and kind treatment to hold her tongue.

Yet blows do not count for much in Russia; from the highest to the lowest, all are liable to suffer them. A lady of the highest rank, using the lady's privilege of chattering in the ear of the Emperor at a masked ball, let fall some indiscreet suggestions. She was followed home by a spy; summoned next day to Count Orloff's office; pointed to a chair; amicably interrogated; presently let quietly down into a cellar, where she was birched by some person unseen. This lady, whose story we have heard before, the Englishwoman often met; her sister she knew well; and she had the anecdote from an intimate friend of the family.

The knout, the emblem of Russian barbarism, falls not only on the slave or the criminal. A poor student of more than ordinary talents had, by great perseverance, twice merited a prize; but he was regarded with jealous hostility by a certain professor, whom he was too poor to bribe. Twice cheated, the poor fellow made a third effort, though barely able to sustain himself in his humble lodging till the period of examination came. His future hung upon the result; for upon his passing the ordeal with credit depended his access to employment that would get him bread. He strained every nerve, and succeeded well. All the professors testified their approbation except one, whose voice was necessary to complete the votes. He rose, and withheld his suffrage upon false grounds, that cast dishonor on the young man's character. It was his old enemy; and the poor boy—a widow's son—with starvation before him, and his hopes all cast to the winds, rushed forward by a sudden impulse of despair, and struck his persecutor. He was arrested, tried, and condemned, by the Emperor himself, to receive a thousand lashes with the knout. All the students and professors were ordered to be present at the execution of the sentence. Long before it was complete, of course, the youth was dead; but the full number was completed. Many students who were made spectators of the scene lay on the ground in swoon. From another eye-witness, the Englishwoman heard of the presence of a line of carriages, filled with Russian ladies, at a similar scene, the victims being slaves who had rebelled, because a master introduced upon his ground a box in which to thrash them by machinery, and had seized him and given him a taste of his own instrument of torture. Need we say more to prove that the true Russian civilization is a thing to come?

Our countrywoman, visiting a monastery, was invited to eat ices in the garden. She saw how the spoons were cleaned behind the bushes—licked and wiped. Such ice-eating, with the spoon-licking in the background, is typical of the sort of elegance and polish Russia has.

One day the Englishwoman saw an officer boldly pocket some of his neighbor's money while playing at cards. Another slipped up his sleeves some concert tickets belonging to her friend. She and her friend both saw him do it. One day a young officer called while they were at dinner; was shown into one of the drawing-rooms, and departed with a lady's watch. Nothing was said to the police, out of respect to his uncle, who is of rank. Ladies going to a party will sometimes steal the papers of kid gloves and the hair-pins left on the toilet-tables to supply those who happen to come unprovided. Our countrywoman went to visit an old lady; and, as all the drawing-rooms were thrown open for the reception of visitors, thought it no sin to walk from one room to another for the purpose of examining some pictures. The old lady rose and followed her, watching her movements so closely that she returned to her seat greatly amazed. "You must not be surprised at it, my dear," said a friend, after she got home again; "for really you do not know how many things are lost in such parties from the too great admiration of the visitors."

The officers just mentioned were men holding employments under government. So much has been made notorious during the present war of the extent to which the Russian government suffers from the peculation and falsehood of officials in all grades that one illustration in this place will be sufficient, and we will choose one that illustrates at the same time another topic. The railway to Warsaw is dropped, because the money needed for it is absorbed by war; the only Russian railway line is that between the two capitals, St. Petersburg and Moscow. When it was nearly finished, the Czar ordered it to be ready for his own use on a certain day. It was not really finished; but over several miles of the road, since the Czar must be obeyed, rails were laid upon whatever contrivance could be patched up for the occasion. The Imperial neck was risked by the Russian system. While this railway was in course of construction, the fortunes made by engineers and government officials on the line of road was quite astonishing: men of straw rapidly acquired estates. Government suffered and—the serfs. Our countrywoman living once in a province through which the railway runs went by train to a picnic. At the station four hundred workmen were assembled, who asked eagerly whether the governor was of the party. No, they were told, but his wife was. Her, then, they begged to see. To her they pleaded with their miserable tale for interference in their behalf. For six weeks they had been paid no wages, their rations were bad, and a fever like a plague had broken out among them, of which their companions perished by scores, to be buried, like so many dogs, in morasses along the line. Their looks confirmed their tale. The criminal employers were upon the spot, and acted ignorance and sympathy, making at the same time humane speeches and promises, which the poor men received by exchanging looks of profound despair with each other. Of course, the poor fellows continued to suffer.

Then there is the system of espial. In addition to the secret police—the accredited spies—there is said to be a staff of eighty thousand paid agents, persons moving in society; generals, tradesmen, dressmakers, people of all ranks; who are secretly engaged in watching and betraying those with whom they live. The consequence is, that nobody dares speak his earnest thoughts, even to his familiar friend. Men say what they do not think, affect credit of government reports which they know to be audacious lies, and take pains to exhibit themselves as obedient subjects.

Of the Greek form of religion we say nothing. Let the Russians bow before the pictures of their saints. We will quote only an anecdote told in this book, of a poor wandering Samoyde, a fish-eating savage from the borders of the Arctic Ocean. He asked whether his visitor was Russian, and being answered no, lifted up some skins in his tent which covered pictures of saints, and pointing to them with disdain, said, "See! there are Russian gods, but ours," raising his hand heavenward, "is greater. He lives—up there!"—Household Words.

THE GOSPEL.

THE Gospel is the fulfillment of all hopes, the perfection of all philosophy, the interpretation of all revelations, the key to all the seeming contradictions of the physical and moral world. Since I have known the Savior every thing is clear.—Von Muller.

THE LAW STUDENT.

BY REV. CHARLES COLLINS, D. D.

"Whom the gods love, die young," was said of yore,
And many deaths do they escape in this;
The death of friends, and that which slays e'en more,
The death of Friendship, Love, Youth—all that is,
Except mere breath; and since the silent shore
Awaits at last even those who longest miss
The old Archer's shafts, perhaps the early grave,
Which men weep over, may be meant to save."

THE above strain from a noble harp, now, alas! silent forever, is poetical, albeit no sentiment of Christian piety breathes through the mellifluous lines. An early grave! What solemn interest, what associations of melancholy thought rush into the mind almost unbidden, and cluster around the narrow home where sleeps the dust of the early dead! The opening flower, nipped just when its partially unfolded petals gave promise of the brightness and beauty to come! The heart, glowing with life, and swelling with all the delightful anticipations of the future, stricken with the fatal arrow, just at the moment of seizing the promised enjoyment! The long-cherished expectation of usefulness and honor blighted and dissolved forever! The yearnings of the young heart after the prizes of manly toil, and the outgoings of affections, tender and vigorous, as yet unscathed by the scorching blasts of the world, sending forth their tendrils like the vine, and laying hold on all surrounding objects—all bitterly crushed, and crushed forever!

An early grave is dark and cheerless, indeed, if no light penetrates it but the flickering ray of a godless philosophy. We may, indeed, thus escape the trials and mortifications incident to mature life; but poor is the consolation if the youthful traveler on this long journey is not provided with a heavenly companion. The Christian's hope is a light—the only light which can enter the dark valley. Yet the vain philosophy of this world condemns it. It is not suited to the pride of human learning.

Perhaps there is truth in the heathen maxim, that an early death is evidence of the favor of Heaven. Yet the ways of Providence are dark and inscrutable. Sometimes the young may be taken away by death in order to remove them from the evil to come. Sometimes the cup of iniquity even of the young is filled. Sometimes it may be God's discipline for the salvation of the old. Who is wise to understand the counsels of the Almighty? It is Christian, however, to believe that Infinite Goodness always holds the rod. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son he receiveth." We rejoice in the Christian's hope. It is full of comfort, big with immortality, glorious. Its brightness penetrates the dark veil. It builds a bridge across the mighty chasm. It clothes all the attributes of the Godhead with the habiliments of mercy, and enlists them on the side of erring, penitent humanity. In the ear of the dying saint, when his frail bark first launches on the stormy wave of his final passage, it whispers, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." The distant shore it clothes with brightness and beauty, where happy spirits gather to give joyous welcome to the stranger just landed from his perilous voyage, and conduct him to the bright realms of his heavenly abode.

Reflections similar to these, with a sad admixture of pleasure and pain, passed through my mind, when, in company with a friend, I took a stroll through the village cemetery of Carlisle, in the autumn of 1852. We had then, after many years' separation, just come together in the providence of God to sustain official relations with each other. At times I love to visit such places, and indulge in the solemn and pious reflections which the dead and their memorials are calculated to awaken. To me there is always a holy influence which comes up from the grave. I never visit these places without feeling that I become thereby a better man. And, surely, if, as the poet says, there are "Sermons in stones, books in running brooks,

And God in every thing."

there are sermons—eloquent sermons—in the speaking marble and countless mounds of an ancient burial-ground—the city of the dead. It is the place to cure a worldly spirit and rebuke our pride. Here we approach nearer the spiritual world than any where else; and if our hearts are open to instruction, we shall find no difficulty in catching the voice that comes up from all these silent sleepers, telling us of God, and uttering in our ear lessons of duty, which it is the highest wisdom to know, as well as the highest virtue to practice. How little congenial these holy places may be to those who are absorbed in the world, or how much soever these feelings may be derided by the gay and thoughtless, I nevertheless love to cherish them. It is not sadness. It is not melancholy. It engenders no superstitious gloom. It leads me, for the time, away from the world, and opening the fountains of thought and feeling, I seem to be in another world, communing with God, and talking with the spirits around me. In such a place faith can scarcely fail to become purged of some of its worldliness, and to lay hold of the invisible with still stronger grasp. Hope and Joy—twin-spirits in the sisterhood of heavenly graces—chastened and purified by this contact with the spiritual and unseen, become more sweetly qualified to bear us company in our pilgrimage on earth. We feel, indeed, as did Peter, and James, and John, on a certain occasion, and cry out, "Lord, it is good for us to be here."

In the cemetery of Carlisle is something to excite more than ordinary interest. Here are sleeping in silence, which nothing shall disturb but the archangel's trumpet, many who in life enjoyed a name among men. They were found in the higher walks of professional and literary life. Their Country called them to her councils, and Education, Divinity, Medicine, and Law acknowledged the eminence of their virtues and the greatness of their attainments. But here they lie promiscuously mingled with the unlettered sons of toil, whose name, perhaps, never traveled beyond their native village, but whose hearts were the equal abode of love, and the equal centers of domestic affection. The great leveler hath leveled all. The artificial distinctions of life which kept them separate when above ground keep them separate no longer. The fulsome marble may tell its tale of flattery, but all are sleeping where

"Precedency's a jest, and vassal and lord, Grossly familiar, side by side consume."

As we wandered over these consecrated grounds, we at length came upon the object of our search. It was a plain obelisk of white marble, bearing this inscription:

CHARLES A. LEE
Born in Maryland,
Oct. 28, 1817.
Died
in Carlisle,
Dec. 13, 1837.

On the reverse side was the following:

He was
A Graduate of the Wesleyan University, and a Student of Law in Dickinson College.

It was the grave of a classmate and mutual friend, from whom we had parted many years before, in the heyday morning of life—when we had finished our studies at the Wesleyan University, and were about to take our places in the walks of life. We saw him for the last time on Commencement day. What melancholy interest gathered around that humble gravel! what thronging memories of the past! What anguish tore his widowed mother's heart as she flew from her distant home on the first intelligence of his sickness, but came, alas! too late! The melancholy satisfaction of laying her only son in his narrow home was all that remained of her lofty hopes. I see him now just as he was seventeen and eighteen years ago. No youth of twenty had a finer physical development or rejoiced in possession of a stronger constitution. With ample forehead attesting the capacity of his intellectual citadel, there was superadded a roundness and fullness of muscle, an arching of the foot, and a firmness in the knitting of his whole physique, that were quite extraordinary, and which made him the very soul of activity and motion. Surely, no one could then have predicted his untimely fall.

Successful in his studies, of honorable feelings and noble character, he left his Alma Mater flushed with high hopes of the future, a universal favorite with his class and these who knew him. Warm in his attachments to his friends, liberal in sentiment toward all, generous, ambitious, and high-spirited, there was just that combination in him of personal qualities which mark out the popular man of the world. Unhappily he was not religious. Though the son of a pious mother, the child of many prayers, and reared in the midst of the most enlightened Christian influences, his proud heart would never surrender to the invitations of God's Spirit. In college he passed through several gracious revivals, in which his classmates and fellow-students shared; but expostulation and entreaty were addressed to him in vain. As a man of the world life was opening before him with too flattering prospects of pleasure, fortune, and fame, and on these he had set his heart. His lofty ambition burned for the professional distinction acquired by Pinckney, Taney, and others of his native state. He could not think at present of giving his heart to God. But how easy for the Judge of all the earth to dash all human calculations, and bring the pride of man to the dust!

A brief period was all that he could spare for visiting his aged mother and family relatives, when we find him duly entered as a student of the Law Department in Dickinson College, under the instruction of the Hon. Judge Reed. Here his young ambition was pluming its wings for a lofty flight. But, alas! the spoiler was on his track. The fond visions of worldly ambition, in the counsels of God, were destined never to be realized. Not even a mother's love was permitted to soothe the terrible agonies of his dying pillow, or point his soul to the bleeding Sacrifice which in health he had neglected, if not despised. Sudden disease threw him on a sick bed; strangers ministered to his necessities, and satisfied every want except that which is beyond the reach of human skill; but amid the awful consciousness of neglected Christian instructions and warnings, and the paroxysms of agony, which in his violent disease scarcely knew abatement, his soul found poor opportunity to call upon God, and passed hence to its dread account. In four short months from the time of our separation on the classic banks of New England's noblest river, that manly, noble form had been consigned to earth, and that noble heart, distinguished by qualities which men love to honor, had ceased to beat forever.

Though many years have since passed away, and the recollection of the stranger law student has faded from the memory of nearly all who knew him in Carlisle, there is one who still cherishes the memory of his manly virtues, and who ministered to him with a sister's love in his dying hours. There are others also, aside from his immediate family, who will read this sketch with melancholy interest, and, while it recalls the fading memory of one they loved and honored, will pay his virtues and untimely fate the honest tribute of a heart-felt sigh.

COME IN THE BRIGHT SUNSHINE AND WHEN THE BIRDS SING.

UNDER the tuition of Professor Caldwell we passed our early academic years. He was not only a faithful and successful teacher, but a pure-minded and devoted Christian—a man of strong faith, and in his last years especially of large experience in "the deep things of God." He was, as the world would say, cut down prematurely, and in the midst of a high and honorable career of usefulness. But he died in the full and confiding faith of Christ. We have rarely seen any thing more beautiful than the language addressed to his wife when in the near prospect of dissolution:

"You will not, I am sure, lie down upon your bed and weep when I am gone. And when you visit the spot where I lie, do not choose a sad and mournful time—do not go in the shade of evening or in the dark of night! These are no times to visit the grave of one who hopes and trusts in a risen Redeemer. Come, dear wife, in the bright sunshine, and when the birds are singing!"

THE FIRST OF APRIL.

BY HARRIET N. BABB.

"O GOOD! to-morrow is the first of April; see if I don't fool somebody nicely!" said one of a group of bright-eyed children, as they sat around the fire in the early twilight.

"O, so will I!" cried another. "I'll tell you what I mean to do, only you mustn't tell any one else;" and the two heads were placed close together while a whispered communication took place. This was succeeded by a hearty laugh, and an exclamation of "Wen't that be capital!"

I did not try to overhear any of their little plot, for the words already uttered had carried me back in imagination to the time when I was glad to have the first of April come, because there was always so much fun afloat every-where, even in our prison-like school-room; especially since we had been so fortunate as to hear that our prim teacher had remarked to one of her friends, "There was no use in trying to keep us in order on that day, for we were so full of the spirit of mischief that it would break out in spite of all her efforts."

As one and another of the school friends with whom I had played off little practical jokes rose up before my mind, I found myself dwelling with peculiar interest upon one who had always been foremost in every thing of this kind. Dear Allie Thane, with her mirth-loving nature, how much she contrived to enliven the monotony of a boarding-school life! We all loved her, and yet we all had to be constantly on our guard, for she would be sure to play off some trick upon us just when we least expected it.

A kinder heart than hers never beat; and yet her excessive love of mischief often gave annoyance, and even positive pain, to those dearest to her. Poor Allie! she still wears a scar upon her heart from the last joke she ever played. Had it afflicted herself alone, she would have recovered from it long ago; but while she sees in the feebleness of her friend a memento of that one thoughtless yet cruel act, she can never cease to reproach herself for it.

Before I open that one dark page of her life to our young readers, and show them how dangerous it is to imbibe a taste for practical jokes, because it may lead them to do what they might afterward earnestly wish undone, I will tell them of one prank she played from which no great harm arose. Nevertheless, I would not advise any of them to do the same.

Allie had an aunt living in the same town in which she had been placed at school, who was,

she declared, "as rich and as stingy as she could be." "She might give us a nice little entertainment every week and not feel it, if she only thought so," she used to say; "but, never mind, I'll make her give us a party yet—that I will—see if I don't!"

And accordingly we one day received cards inviting us to pass the next evening at the house of Mrs. K. That the next day would be the first of April never entered our minds; and Allie seemed so delighted at the realization of her predictions, saying, "Didn't I tell you she would have to do it?" that we could only admire her for the eloquence with which she must have won over the old lady.

Great consultations were there in our own rooms over sundry silk dresses and muslin ones, laces, and articles of jewelry; and when we set out in full dress, right happy were we in expectation of the brilliant rooms, handsome beaux, and good cheer awaiting us at Mrs. K.'s. Though our teachers always insisted upon our going at what we considered an unfashionably early hour, we were surprised at seeing no unusual lights, and no signs of festivity about the dwelling.

"Where is aunt?" asked Allie of the female servant who opened the door.

"In the sitting-room," was the answer.

"Well, show these young ladies up stairs to take off their things while I go in and see her. I suppose we are very early."

The girl had to keep us standing in the hall while she went for a lamp to carry us up stairs, for it was, she declared, "all as dark as tar up there;" and while thus waiting, we could not avoid peering in at the door which Allie opened in search of her aunt. There sat our hostess in a calico wrapper, beside a large basket of stockings, while her manner seemed to say her morrow's bread depended upon their being darned that night. I do not know what passed between the aunt and niece; but Allie soon called us down, and presented us to our hostess, who greeted us with, "This is quite an unexpected pleasure, young ladies. Had I known of your coming, I would have had the parlors warmed." We drew around the fire; the basket of stockings had been put aside, but not the old calico wrapper, which formed a striking contrast to our elaborate toilets. Just then there was another ring at the door, and more than one pair of feet were heard ascending the stairs, while manly voices said, "It is early yet; I'll be back in half an hour."

Mrs. K. looked at Allie, who exclaimed, "Girls, do tell me what day of the month it is?"

"There is the morning paper, child," said the aunt.

Taking it up and glancing at it, she exclaimed, "Why, aunt, it is the first of April! Somebody has fooled us. Who can it be? Come, girls, let us go home again. But how we shall be laughed at! Pshaw! I'm provoked. Come!" and she moved toward the door.

"No, no, you shall stay, now you are here, and I will try to entertain you, since you have been fooled into coming and I into receiving you."

"No, we had better go, aunt. I'm so vexed to think how we have all been April fooled," said Allie, with such apparent sincerity that no one questioned it.

"I tell you that you shall not go; so make yourself easy, and try and amuse these young ladies while I see about the fires."

Other guests poured in, and the parlors, which were dreadfully cold to our bare arms, in spite of the large fires that were hastily lighted in them, were soon filled. The servants were sent out to purchase refreshments; and before the evening was half over, no one who looked in could have believed the party an impromptu, though he might have wondered at the singular taste the hostess had displayed in dressing for the occasion, for she was too busy to change either wrapper or cap.

From what we saw of her kind-hearted though rather homely hospitality that night, we did not believe what Allie had said about her stinginess. And when we returned home, and Allie told us, as a good joke, that she had been the one to April fool her aunt and us, we felt really vexed with her, and told her that she ought to be ashamed of herself for playing off such jokes upon her venerable relative.

But now I must tell you of the joke which proved too serious. We had often had our hopes excited by letters handed us, apparently from our homes, which, on breaking them open, were found to contain only the words, "First of April!" A merry laugh at our elbow caused us to force back the tears of vexation ready to spring to our eyes; but when a letter sealed with black was brought to Ada Brown, we never thought of any "hoax," and our own cheeks grew pale with apprehension for the sorrow about to fall upon the heart of our gentle and already too much subdued friend. The letter was very brief, announcing the sudden death of her father, and ending with a request for her to prepare to return home that night with a friend, who would call for her in a few hours. She rose up calmly after reading it, and went to prepare for her journey. Allie said afterward that had she burst into a violent fit of weeping, she would have instantly confessed the truth; but her quiet manner deceived her, and made her fancy she had detected its want of genuineness. We all wondered at her calmness, for we knew nothing then of the stunning, crushing effects of real sorrow.

Ada had gone to her own room. After permitting her to be alone a little while, we went to her, and found her still quiet, but busily engaged in packing. So long as there was any necessity for exertion she bore up; but when all was arranged, and the traveling dress put on, then her thoughts reverted to what had taken place, her fortitude gave way, and, before Allie could make her understand that it was not true, she had fallen on the bed in a fainting fit. O, how long she was in coming out of it, and how the wretched Allie wept and reproached herself for having killed her friend!

Even after Ada had been told that it was only a cruel joke played off upon her because it was "all-fools'-day," she was unable to rally from the shock her feeble frame had sustained. A nervous fever set in, and for weeks she lay at the point of death. Poor Allie, as she watched beside her—for no persuasions of ours, and not even the commands of her teachers, could induce her to quit the spot either day or night—had abundant opportunity to repent of her thoughtlessness; and as Ada would in her delirium clasp her hands, and repeat the words of that letter, which seemed burned in upon her brain, how bitterly did she deplore her fault, and earnestly resolve that this should be her last attempt at playing practical jokes!

Ada rose at last from her sick bed, so pale and thin that it made our hearts ache to look at her; and though we all congratulated her upon her recovery, we could not conceal it from ourselves that she was never the same either in health or spirits after that cruel shock.

Though Ada freely forgave Allie, and begged her to think no more of it, Allie has never been able to forgive herself; and I dare say if she were to overhear little people planning out tricks for the first of April, she would say, "Take warning by me, and do not cultivate a taste for any sport which may tempt you to trifle with the feelings of your friends, or you may thus darken what should be the brightest season of your life!"

AFFLICTIONS are the same to the soul as the plow to the fallow ground, the pruning-knife to the vine, and the furnace to the gold.

THE CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE.

THE BODY WE CHERISH.

THERE are few greater marvels; indeed, than the changes which are perpetually transpiring in the human body. It is constantly undergoing dissolution; parts of it are dying every instant. The whole fabric is probably dissipated in the course of a few weeks—certainly in the course of a few years. In the range of a long lifetime each individual wears out several suits of bodies, as he does several suits of clothes. The successive structures we have occupied may bear the same name, and exhibit the same external aspect, but, anatomically considered, our present frames are no more identical with the frames of our early youth than we are with our progenitors, who came over with William the Conqueror. By what subtle mechanism our food is so dexterously deposited upon a certain inward and invisible form—if we may so speak—that it shall constantly reproduce a given individuality, with all its original peculiarities, is a mystery which science, perhaps, will never fathom. The houses we inhabit are pulled down, stone by stone, and yet rebuilt as fast as they are destroyed; all their furniture and fixtures are severally removed, particle by particle. The whole of each edifice is reconstructed in the course, we will say, of a single year, and yet no eye can follow the process, or detect any organic change in the architecture of the pile. Though the vital artificers are constantly at work, their operations are wholly unfelt; we are never conscious of the separation of particles, or the substitution of others. The masons and carpenters are never off our premises for an hour, and yet the chink of their chisels, or the grating of their saws, is entirely unheard by man. And still more striking is the fact, that the very organs which are kept in constant activity are themselves silently renewed without interrupting their functions for an instant. The heart is reproduced out of our food without losing a single beat, and without spilling a solitary drop of blood. The eye is taken to pieces, time after time, and the windows of vision reglazed, without disturbing our sight for a day; and new stomachs are repeatedly inserted in our bodies without our ever being compelled to close up the mouth of the alimentary canal, and abstain from digestion, till the apparatus can be properly replaced. That house after house should thus be rebuilt on the same site, in the same form, and with the same furniture, is surely as strange as if St. Paul's Cathedral were renewed from top to bottom, year by year, without attracting observation; and its organ, its clock, and bells, could all be remodeled while it kept in unremitting play.

But as the body is composed of a certain set of elements, united in certain proportions, the food we consume must contain the precise ingredients required. Here is another marvelous arrangement to be observed. How comes it that men who have been dining for thousands of years in ignorance of their own chemical constitution, as well as of the exact composition of their viands, should yet have hit upon substances which comprehend all the raw material needed for the restoration of the frame? Solomon, with all his sagacity, knew nothing of fibrin, albumen, or casein; nor was Apicius, with all his recherche experience in cookery, aware that his fine dishes must resolve themselves into certain undistinguished elements, if they were to prove in the slightest degree nutritious. It is only a small part of creation that the stomach will digest. A Frenchman, of the name of Mercier, expressed an opinion that chemistry would one day be able to extract a nutritive principle from all bodies, and that then it would be as easy for people to obtain food as it is now to draw water from rivers. Dr. Armstrong, in his "Art of Preserving Health," says, "Nothing so foreign but the athletic hind can labor into blood." But this is poetry. In prose, our bill of fare is confined to comparatively few out of the fifty or sixty terrestrial elements with which we are acquainted; and it would be just as idle to attempt to feast on the others as it was for Midas to sit down to a banquet of gold. The difficulty of the question is also enhanced by various circumstances, of which we need only mention that the ingredients required for our frames are not supplied in a separate and uncombined condition—that is to say, as so much carbon, so much lime, so much oxygen, etc.; but they are presented in our victuals in such a disguised and complicated form that neither cook nor chemist, reasoning a priori, could predict what would be their destiny when subjected to analysis by the stomach, or brought under the influence of the organs of assimilation. Practically considered, therefore, the repair of the bodily house seems to be the most random work imaginable. We take pains to procure a dinner daily, but nobody ever asks whether it contains—as it were—bricks for the walls, timber for the floor, glass for the windows, metal for the grate, or marble for the mantle-piece. We must, in some way or other, contrive to procure iron for the blood, sulphur for the hair, and phosphorus for the brain; but at no table in the kingdom do we ever find these indispensable articles appearing in the salt-cellars or cruet-stands.

How then explain the fact that so many millions of human bodies have been repaired without difficulty and without mistake, though errors might so easily have been committed, and though men appear to have been perpetually banqueting in the dark? We can only ascribe this remarkable result to a kindly Providence, which has not merely spread a splendid table for man "in the wilderness," and furnished it with a varied array of viands, but has also implanted a subtle instinct in the human system which, when it is discreetly indulged, attracts us to what is chemically congenial, but repels us from what is useless or injurious.

THE BREAD WE EAT.

In order, however, to exhibit this happy adaptation of food to the feeder, let us glance for awhile at the "bread we eat." It is the staff of life. It is also a key to the composition of all our vegetable fare. Now, if an ignorant miller were told that his flour would some day be converted into human blood, he would laugh at the notion just as much as if told that any part of his body could be made available—as it can—in the manufacture of lucifer matches. There is no external resemblance between the fine white powder which fills his sacks and the crimson fluid which streams from his heart. There is still less similarity between that powder and the brawny muscles that render him a terror to the whole village. Yet, if the man were to sentence himself to live exclusively on the produce of his mill—and he might do so without forfeiting his prowess, provided he retained the bran, wherein the most nutritive principle largely exists—it is plain that his flour must resolve into blood, and this blood must again become consolidated into flesh. At the first glance, indeed, an analysis of bread would only seem to render the mystery more perplexing still. The chief ingredient, in point of quantity, is found to be water. Nearly one-half of every wheaten loaf is composed of this mild and unpretending fluid. But it so happens that water is also the preponderating element in the constitution of solid men and women. Any gentleman who weighs one hundred and fifty-four pounds, will be surprised to learn that he has only thirty-eight pounds of dry matter in the whole of his body. Upward of one hundred weight of his humanity is literally identical in nature with the liquid which drops from the clouds or is pumped from the soil, after filtering itself perhaps through the nearest church-yard. If the water in our frames were not associated with more consistent materials, we should have to live in buckets or barrels, and people would subside into liquid masses charged with a few soluble salts; and depositing a small quantity of matter by way of sediment. Strange, therefore, as it may appear, that our frames should be so succulent in their composition, it is necessary that our diet should correspond. Hence the natural fitness of a commodity which like flour possesses, and is capable of taking up, so large a proportion of water. A dry crust is in truth a tank of moisture. We drink bread as well as eat it. After the lapse of a few days bread loses its softness and becomes apparently dry. Most persons, if asked the cause of this change, would ascribe it to the loss of moisture. But the fact is, that stale bread contains exactly the same quantity of water as new. The alteration is supposed to be due to some internal action among the atoms; for if a stale loaf is exposed in a closely covered tin to a heat not exceeding that of boiling water for a period of half an hour or an hour, and then allowed to cool, it will be found to have recovered its youth, and will be restored in appearance and properties to the condition of new bread. In like manner, out of one hundred parts of lean beef, seventy-eight are nothing more than water mixed with blood. Apples, gooseberries, mushrooms, and many other articles of food, yield eighty per cent. of this catholic fluid. Three-quarters of every potato are simple moisture. Carrots are extravagantly humid, eighty-three parts being composed of the same liquid. Turnips should be sipped; they contain only ten parts of solid food to ninety of water. It is among the gourd tribe, however, that we find the most striking examples of succulence. In the watermelon, ninety-four parts of every mouthful consist of mere moisture; and in the cucumber you get only three morsels of substantial matter to ninety-seven of condensed vapor. Well might the old pasha, Mehemet Ali, consume a forty pound melon at a single sitting, and even treat it as an easy appendix to an excellent repast!

The second noticeable ingredient in bread will surprise the non-chemical reader almost as much as the first. He will find it difficult to believe that animal fiber may be extracted from muffins or biscuits, and though he admits figuratively that all flesh is grass, he may object to regard it literally as flour. Wheaten bread, however, contains six per cent. of a substance called gluten, which, when analyzed, is found to exhibit the same ultimate elements as the fibrin of muscle.

But besides the materials demanded for the repair or enlargement of the tissues, and which may, therefore, be called the body-building principles, others are needed for the purpose of providing a constant supply of animal heat. Our food must contain a quantity of fuel, and not a little either, for as the temperature of the body is considerably higher than that of the atmosphere, averaging, in fact, about ninety-eight degrees Fahrenheit, we are plundered of our caloric continually. Now, every grain of wheat includes, if we may so speak, its own little stock of oil and coke; that is to say, it is equipped with a quantity of fat, starch, gum, and other substances, which, by combining with the oxygen inspired, are burnt within the body on the same principle, but not with the same fiery manifestations, as tallow or coal are burned without it. The proportion of fat contained in wheaten bread is indeed very small, not amounting to much more than one per cent.; but the starch, sugar, and gum exist in comparative abundance.

It would be impossible for us to refer particularly to the mineral matters, which bread, like all other perfect food, must include. Still less would it be practicable to follow the author while analyzing one substance after another, and indicating the properties wherein they excel. He concludes that our food should contain a due admixture of vegetable and animal substances in which the proportions of the three most important constituents, fat, starch or sugar, and fibrin or gluten, are properly adjusted. It is here that the wonderful instinct already mentioned, which leads mankind to mingle various articles of diet, so as to obtain all the necessary elements, comes into conspicuous play. Without possessing any chemical knowledge whatever, the stomach appears from time to time to have given strong hints to its owner, which have led to combinations as subtle and efficient as if they had been prescribed by the profoundest science. Why, for instance, should bread or potatoes form an indispensable accompaniment to beef? On analyzing the latter substance, it is found to consist of seventy-eight parts of water, nineteen of fibrin, and three of fat. These principles appear, as we have seen, in bread; gluten there being equivalent to fibrin here. But there is no starch in your steak, while there is much in your loaf. The fat, it is true, may to some extent represent this combustible material, but it will not supply as much fuel as is needed to keep your corporeal furnace in adequate action. Hence, by a natural impulse we resort to bread when attacking beef, or take the latter in flank with a dish of potatoes, these tubers—subtracting the water—containing almost ninety-two per cent. of starch. So, again, when the quantity of fat in any animal substance is insignificant, it is astonishing what tricks we employ to obtain a sufficient supplement from other sources. Thus, we eat along with those varieties in which it is small, some other food richer in fat. Thus, we eat bacon with veal, with liver, and with fowl, or we capon the latter, and thus increase its natural fat. We use melted butter with our white fish, or we fry them with fat; while the herring, the salmon, and the eels are usually both dressed and eaten in their own oil. If the reader will take the trouble of consulting any popular cookery book, he will find that sausage and other rich mixed meats are made in general with one part of fat and two of lean; the proportion in which they exist in a piece of good marbled beef. Art thus unconsciously again imitating nature.

CORN BEER.

Chica, or maize beer, is a drink which is excessively popular among the mountain Indians on the western coast of South America. The mode of manufacturing it, however, would surprise us if prescribed in any civilized manual of cookery. The receipt is this. Assemble all the members of the family, and, if you like, catch a few strangers to assist at the operation. Let them seat themselves on the floor in a circle, and place a large dish in the center. Around it deposit a quantity of dried maize. Then let each individual take up a handful of the grain and chew it thoroughly. Spit the maize into the dish. Proceed till the entire mass has passed through the jaws of the company, and thus been reduced to a mass of pulp. Let it then be mashed in hot water and allowed to ferment. In a little time the abomination will be fit for use. So highly is it esteemed, that a polite native could offer no higher compliment to a traveler than a draught of the liquor thus villainously brewed. Strangely enough, the same process is employed in the Pacific, in the extraction of an intoxicating liquor from the ava root. Captain Wilkes gives an amusing account of the formalities with which the disgusting potion is prepared, the masticators, however, being required to possess clean, undecayed teeth, and prohibited from swallowing any of the juice under pain of chastisement. But it is highly interesting to note the chemical principles involved in these nauseous operations. Corn, as we have seen, and other grains contain a large quantity of starch. In order that fermentation may occur, this starch must be converted into sugar. Commonly the change is effected through the instrumentality of a substance called diastase, which is developed during the process of malting. It happens, however, that the saliva possesses a similar power of transforming starch into sugar. Of course, neither the Indian nor the man of Feejee has the slightest conception of the chemical influences which are at work in his jaws, but, that people living at such a distance from each other, and acting in complete ignorance of the scientific bearings of their processes, should have adopted the same practice in order to obtain the same results, is one of the many curious and remarkable facts which the volumes of Professor Johnston on the "Chemistry of Common Life" have brought prominently into view.

OPIMUM.

The effect of opium varies, to a great extent, according to the temperament and race of the individual. Its influence upon a man of obtuse faculties or inferior susceptibilities, is simply to remove sluggishness, and make him "active and conversable." Upon excitable people, like the Javanese, the Negro, the Malay, it exerts a terrible power, sometimes rendering them perfectly frantic. The well-known phrase, "running a muck," is derived from the Javanese practice of sallying out, when inebriated with opium, and killing any body who comes to hand. De Quincey speaks of the "abyss of divine enjoyment" which was suddenly laid open to him when he quaffed his first dose of laudanum. He thought he had discovered a panacea for all human woes. Happiness might thenceforth be bought at the druggist's shop, and bliss to any amount kept in an apothecary's vial. But terrible was the retribution exacted. The dose must not only be repeated, but increased, to keep down the giant craving which was continually acquiring strength. At one period the English Opium-Eater took three hundred and twenty grains of opium a day. Coleridge says Cottle has been known to swallow a whole quart of laudanum in twenty-four hours! And the result? "Conceive," says the latter, "whatever is most wretched, helpless, and hopeless, and you will form as tolerable a notion of my state as it is possible for a good man to have. . . . You have no conception of the dreadful hell of my mind, and conscience, and body!" "Think of me," says De Quincey, "even when four months had passed—after renouncing opium—as of one still agitated, throbbing, palpitating, shattered, and much in the situation of him who has been racked." Verily, if the Turkish traveler carries with him opium lozenges, stamped on one side with the words, "Mash Allah," the gift of God, the obverse might bear with equal truth the inscription—gift of the devil.

COCA.

There is another narcotic, and it is but one out of many described by the author, to which a passing glance may be allowed. This is the coca of the Andes. Rarely is a native of these regions to be seen without his little pouch of leather to hold the leaves of this remarkable plant, and a small bottle of vegetable ashes or unslacked lime. The purpose of the latter material is to excite a flow of saliva, and bring out the taste of the leaf in all its pungency. Repose being essential to the full enjoyment of the process, the consumer lies stretched in the shade, deaf alike to the commands of his master, to the roar of the predatory beasts, or even to the approaches of the flames which may have been kindled in his vicinity. Taken in moderation it produces a gentle excitement, induces cheerfulness, and seems by no means unfavorable to health and longevity. Taken in excess, however, it soon weakens the digestion, occasions biliary affections, destroys the appetite for natural food and creates a craving for animal excrement, disorders the intellectual faculties, and drives the patient to brandy—if he can procure it—to assuage his bodily pangs. Fortunately the use of coca is principally confined to the natives, whose gloomy and monotonous existence is undoubtedly relieved by its perilous juice; but occasionally a resident European is tempted into the vice, and becomes as pliant a victim as the Indians themselves.

"Young men of the best families in Peru become sometimes addicted to this extreme degree of excess, and are then considered as lost. Forsaking cities and the company of civilized men, and living chiefly in woods or in Indian villages, they give themselves up to a savage and solitary life. Hence the term, a whito coquero—the epithet applied to a confirmed chewer of coca—has there something of the same evil sense as 'irreclaimable drunkard' has with us."

Coca is remarkable for two properties which are not known to coexist in any other substance. First, it enables the consumer to dispense with food to a marvelous extent, by retarding, as is probable, the waste of the tissues; and, second, it obviates the difficulty of breathing which is usually felt in ascending acclivities, so that a traveler, duly primed with coca, may climb heights and follow swift-footed animals, as Von Tschudi observes, without experiencing any greater inconvenience than if engaged on the level coast. Hence its value in mountainous districts.

ARSENIC.

Arsenic—the arsenious acid of the chemist—is known in this country as a tonic and alterative when administered in very minute doses, but, when swallowed in larger quantities, as a rank poison, and, therefore, a particular enemy to rats and men. But what will the reader say when he learns that there are localities where this virulent material is employed as an article of diet, and that its effect is to produce plumpness of form, sleekness of skin, beauty of complexion, and a general improvement in appearance? Yet such is the fact. In some parts of Lower Austria, and in Styria in particular, the old stories of philters and love-potions seem to be more than realized. When a peasant maiden has fixed her affections upon a youth who may be insensible to her natural charms, she often proceeds to heighten them by the use of arsenic. If the poison is used with caution, never exceeding half a grain at a time, and gradually accustoming the system to its action, the effect is perfectly magical. It adds “to the natural graces of her filling and rounding form, paints with brighter hues her blushing cheeks and tempting lips, and imparts a new and winning luster to her sparkling eye.” Occasionally, however, the damsel may be in too great a hurry to extract beauty from the drug, and by augmenting the dose immoderately, she may fall a sacrifice to her passion or her vanity. Its use, however, is by no means confined to maidens. Though incapable of exciting the mental pleasure which opium and certain other narcotics produce, it is consumed very largely among the peasant population without occasioning any evil results, provided the doses are adapted to the constitution of the individual. But if the practice should be abandoned, symptoms of disease such as would ordinarily follow the reception of arsenic by uninitiated persons, immediately appear, and the patient is compelled to renew the habit in order to obtain relief from the ailments which spring up to torment him. It is the same with horses. Arsenic is given to these animals to secure a plumpness of body and a sleek, glossy skin; but if they pass into the hands of masters who do not patronize the practice, they lose flesh and spirits and gradually decline, unless the custom is resumed, when a few pinches in their food will render them perfectly convalescent. Like coca, too, this substance possesses astonishing powers in enabling persons to ascend hills without suffering from want of breath—a small fragment placed in the mouth before the attempt, and allowed to dissolve slowly, being sufficient to qualify a man for very elaborate undertakings in this line. Is it not marvelous to find that a deadly material like this should yet be a strengthener of respiration, an exciter of love, and a restorer of health? Mithridates is famous for the facility with which he digested his poisons, but we never understood that he took them to improve his body, and work himself up into a handsome, fascinating gentleman.

SMELLS.

There is a possibility of compounding smells infinitely more terrific than any which nature produces, and of employing them in warfare either for purposes of defense or annoyance. Some substances are sufficiently atrocious in themselves. Swallow a small pellet of powdered sulphur, and it will diffuse a noisome atmosphere around the individual for many days. Take a quarter of a grain of a preparation of tellurium, and, though in itself inodorous, it will impart such a disgusting fetor to the breath and perspiration, that the dearest friend of the victim will be ready to indite him as a public nuisance. If a single bubble of seleniureted hydrogen gas be permitted to escape into a room, it will attack the company with symptoms of severe colds and bronchial affections, which will last many days. Indeed, it is only necessary to read what is said about a ferocious compound, known as the cyanide of kakodyle, to obtain some idea of the resources of the chemist in the elaboration of detestable smells. The vapor of this terrible substance is decomposed on coming in contact with air and moisture; and two of the most deadly poisons known to exist—white arsenic and prussic acid—are instantly engendered and dispersed through the atmosphere.—Review of Professor Johnston's Chemistry of Common Life, in British Quarterly Review.

MAKING A GOOD IMPRESSION.

Nothing is more steadily pursued, or more adroitly managed, than the artful policy of making a good impression. We hide the worst and show the best, even before friends. But it is not by public displays that we are truly to be judged. If the public gaze could but penetrate the privacy of domestic life, it would perceive little to admire in those who are most ambitious of showing off. The shrew, the despot, and the hypocrite, divested of disguise, would then be seen in their true colors, with none of those attributes and graces which belong to the real gentleman or lady, who are always such, whether in the presence of company or alone by themselves.

THE FOUNT OF LOVE.

BY ELVIRA PARKER.

UNREGARDED—unrevealed,
Mystic, hidden, as if sealed;
In the heart forever flowing,
Though no trace of outward showing
Tells how fraught with gentle healing,
Is the tide and ebb of feeling.

Even I, although immortal,
Still a dreamer at life's portal—
Lured, perchance, from paths of duty,
By each fleeting gleam of beauty—
Feel, when'er this bliss is slighted,
Weary, mournful, and benighted.

O, my soul! misguided sadly,
By each impulse swayed so madly—
Turning, as if with affright,
From these waters of delight—
Where, O where, in Time's dominions,
Wouldst thou lave thy dusty pinions?
For when passion, sin-defiled,
Hath Love's purity reviled;
When the erring soul, once blameless,
Quaffs from founts no longer stainless—
Then we turn from God's creation,
Sorrowing in our tribulation.

Yet, amid this heart-life dreary,
We may find, when worn and weary,
'Mid sweet hopes forever blushing,
In their purity outgushing,
Founts of love, with richest blessing,
All our cares and woes redressing.
As the bird, with tired wing roaming,
Hastens back at twilight's gloaming,
So, my spirit, to the fountain
Flowing from the sacred mountain,
Haste, that, when earth's ties are riven,
Joys celestial may be given!

THE WORLD ABOVE.

BY REV. C. HARTLEY.

THE world above is not like this,
So dark, so sad, and drear;
O, no, for there the years of bliss
Roll on without a tear!
No gloom, no night, nor cloud of grief,
Can ever cast a shade
Across those sunny plains of peace,
In light and love array'd!

The world above is not like this—
Here death's dread power is seen,
And serpents 'round our pathway hiss,
And poison many a scene;
But death's dark form is not reveal'd
Amidst the ranks on high—
No hissing serpent lies concealed
In bowers beyond the sky.

The world above is not like this—
No parting tears are shed,
Nor sweet affection's lingering kiss
Bestow'd upon the dead;
There sever'd hearts unite again
In love around the throne,
And far beyond this world of pain
Take up their crown and home!

The world above is not like this—
There, 'mid unfading flowers,
The buds of hope destroy'd in this
Expand in heavenly bowers;
There blending perfumes from the fields
And landscapes of the blest,
Ungingled joy and pleasure yields,
With love's ecstatic zest.

O, for a harp in that bright world,
Far from the tears of this!
Here death's black banners are unfurl'd
To shade each hour of bliss;
But there each spirit-harp will thrill
With music's endless tones,
And Jesus' smile forever fill
With light our angel homes.

THE SNOW-FLAKE.

BY MRS. S. K. FURMAN.

BEAUTIFUL snow-flakes, so pearly and white!
Silently dropping on earth's cheerless breast;
Fairy-like jewels, of radiant light,
Nature arraying in pure robes of rest;
Wreathing a crown for the dark wintry night—
Beautiful snow-flakes, so pearly and white!

From your cloud-home, with a velvety tread,
Swiftly ye come with the deep moaning breeze;
Garlands ye've wrought for the rock's hoary head;
Downy plumes hang from the dark forest-trees;
All things are clad with a soft, peerless spread,
From your cloud-home, with a velvety tread.

Brightly ye flit over garden and lane,
Draping with festoons the bare vine and bowers;
Tracing anon on my low window pane
Delicate prints of your beautiful showers;
Mystical forms on the upland and plain,
Say ye have cloth'd them with winter again.

Light be your footfalls at penury's door;
Softly, pass softly each lowly cot by;
Seek not to enter the homes of the poor;
Lo, in your path is the mendicant's cry;
Smiles they have none, but in tears evermore,
Oft ye may find the lone, penniless poor.

But the pale moon, through her snow-vail to-night,
Lights my sad vision to yon little mound;
When last ye lay on the earth's dreary blight,
Safe on our bosom her sweet rest she found;
But ye are weaving a shroud, cold and white,
O'er the chill'd breast of our lov'd one to-night.

CHARACTERISTICS OF MODERN FRENCH LITERATURE.

A BRIDGMENTS are notoriously profitless, meager and jejune; the attempt to sketch in a few pages the characteristics of a whole century of intellectual production must always be unsuccessful and unsatisfactory, and the more fertile the age the more inadequate must generally be the portraiture. Yet it can not be doubted that generations and epochs have for the most part certain distinctive features, at once salient and pervading, which, as they belong to the political circumstances or the social condition of the period—to those influences, that is, which most powerfully modify the intellect of the time and country—are traceable in all departments in which that intellect exerts itself, and give a peculiar cast and coloring alike to the poetry, the fiction, the oratory, the philosophy, and the controversy to which that age gives birth. More powerful still, perhaps, are they in deciding on what departments the intellect of the time shall be most active; determining its bent sometimes toward religion, sometimes toward speculation, at one period toward the realms of fancy, at another toward those of practical life.

The seventeenth century was one of vast mental activity and vigor. Few eras present such a galaxy of great names in nearly every walk of literature—great preachers, great poets, great dramatists, great moralists—Bossuet and Massillon, Pascal and Fenelon, La Bruyere and La Rochefoucauld, Corneille and Racine, Moliere and Descartes. These were men of various genius, of discrepant opinions, of irreconcilable tastes. Still, certain qualities and certain negations characterize all their productions. Their age was pre-eminently the age of settled, though not of earnest convictions, of unquestioning but scarcely of stirring faith. It was an age of obedience—when the yoke of authority weighed upon every channel of intellectual pursuit, but was not yet felt to be a yoke. The literary world then embraced but a narrow circle, and on that circle the influence of the court rested with a pervading pressure that was scarcely recognized as pressure, because never resisted. Philosophers speculated energetically, but always with submission, under correction, and within the limits which the Church prescribed. Literary talent was never more active, but it expatiated under the overshadowing authority of the ancients, and according to the conventional rules of polished society. All the productions of the times bore the classic stamp. They were “correct” above every thing. It is impossible to call them shallow, yet they were scarcely profound. They did not stir the secret depths of the inner man. They contain no aspirations after the Infinite, no pictures of a soul in conflict with the primary mysteries of its being, no subtle questionings and gropings about the roots of the Tree of Knowledge, no “thoughts that wander through eternity and find no resting-place.” On the other hand, there is nothing wild, nothing morbid, nothing extravagant. The age has all the characteristics of a classic, as distinguished from a romantic epoch.

Other features, too, distinguish it notably from the age which followed. The subjects selected by men of letters were different, their interests ran in a different channel, their ambition was directed to a different aim. They were more purely literary than their successors. They were immeasurably more exclusive in their social sympathies. They wrote for court circles, and spoke of citizens only in the way of ridicule. Of THE PEOPLE, their wants, their pleasures, their interests, their sorrows, they knew little and cared less. The problems of social life, dark, sad, and disturbing, never troubled them. They never perceived that the world was out of joint, or fancied they were born to set it right. They aspired to no political influence; the only politics with which they had any concern were those of court intrigue—the miserable strifes of personal ambition; the government of the country was the business of the monarch—they did not aspire to share either his labors or his prerogative; practically to influence society, to modify or meddle with the destiny of nations, to put forth thoughts which should agitate, convulse, or reorganize the world, was a presumption which never visited them even in dreams. Their highest aim was to instruct, to amuse, to interest, to melt, to sway, the cultivated, and the great.

The seventeenth century threw its shadows so far over the eighteenth, that it is not till about 1746 that the peculiar features which we are accustomed to consider as characteristic of the latter epoch began to be prominently developed. The change which then became manifest, and grew more and more marked till the outbreak of the Revolution, had, however, been gradually preparing. Its seeds were sown before the seventeenth century was ended. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes had operated as a narcotic on the religious spirit and religious literature of France. All the vitality which had of late so distinguished it died out. The Gallican Church had gained a triumph as ruinous as the victories of Pyrrhus. She had silenced or exiled all her enemies and critics. But what was the result? "Where after this period," says Robert Hall, "are we to look for her Fenelons and her Pascals, where for those bright monuments of piety and learning which were the glory of her better days? As for piety, she perceived that she had no occasion for it, when there was no luster of Christian holiness surrounding her; nor for learning, when there were no longer any opponents to confute, nor any controversies to maintain. She felt herself at liberty to become as ignorant, as secular, as irreligious as she pleased; and amid the silence and darkness she had created around her, she drew the curtains and retired to rest." She became more exclusive, more narrow, more oppressive, as she became more unenlightened and unintelligent, till shrewd and reflecting minds could tolerate her irrationalities no longer; and Thought, thrust out from her gates with suspicion and dislike, inevitably took service with her rival. Philosophy, finding that religion would not own her or converse with her, became irreligious, naturally, and in self-defense. Nor was this all. The writings of the exiled Protestants, now free from any terror or restraint, penetrated, though partially, into literary circles; and among the refugees was one whose wit and learning secured him a partial and attentive audience, and had a vast influence in stimulating the skepticism of the coming age. This was Bayle, the very incarnation of the spirit of placid, relentless Doubt; to whom nothing was sacred, for whom nothing was certain; essentially a critic and a questioner; probably the only one who ever breathed freely in an absolute vacuum of faith.

Another cause operated simultaneously to liberate men's minds from the trammels of authority. The respect, the enthusiasm, the sincere but servile loyalty with which the monarch had been long regarded, melted away under the disasters, the follies, and the scandals of his later years. The great image which the nation had set up and worshiped so devoutly was at length discovered to be made of clay—and scarcely of finer clay than ordinary men. While young, gracious, imposing in demeanor, royal in his tastes, victorious in his wars, endowed and surrounded with every thing that looked like greatness, it was easy for courtiers to fancy him omnipotent and infallible, and to transmit their fancy to the nation. But when success abroad, and wise policy at home, began alike to fail him; when he endeavored to atone for the criminal and shameful license of his life by puerile austerities at least as shameful, and barbarous persecutions incalculably more criminal; when he exacted from those around him, who felt none of his compunction, his own rigid penances and his own formal asceticism, and prescribed a hypocritical and gloomy puritanism as the sole path to court favor among a keen-witted, laughing, mocking, pleasure-loving tribe—the overstrained cord gave way; the sacred prestige of royalty was gone; and power, ceasing to be venerated, soon ceased to be feared.

At the same time, a long reign of lavish luxury and splendor had done its work in other directions. Abuses of all descriptions crept into every branch of the administration, and were rife and riotous in every hole and corner of the land. The state of matters became too scandalous and too notorious to be endured in silence by any in whom patriotism and a sense of justice were not utterly extinct; the prodigality, both political and personal, of the Regency was such as to place the whole weight of public sympathy on the side of frondeurs, investigators, and reformers; and the same circumstances which stimulated assaults on the excesses and vices of authority rendered such assaults comparatively safe.

All these causes combined to render the eighteenth century as nearly as possible the intellectual opposite of its predecessor. It was essentially an era of reaction, of doubt, of inquiry, of antagonism. Literary activity took a wider range; literary men addressed a wider audience; the circle of readers extended, till something like "a public" began to be formed, and it became both the fashion and the interest of writers to address the public instead of the court. The wit and epigrammatic taste of the French aided this change. Royalty and religion, as they then exhibited themselves, offered too tempting subjects for stinging sarcasms and conversational brilliancy, to be spared even by men belonging to the government or the Church; those who profited by the malversations and administrative iniquities of the period were yet among the first to hold them up to ridicule; statesmen, generals, and nobles preferred to be considered men of wit and letters rather than men of quality; and, for the first time, literature became a puissance in France. Intoxicated with power and adulation; excited more and more by the indefensible abuses and the grotesque anomalies which every fresh investigation brought to light; surprised, too, and delighted to find how easily what had once been so powerful yielded to their onslaught, and how astoundingly what had once been so sacred grumbled beneath their logic; goaded also by compassion for a down-trodden people and a zeal for the public good which, in some, was pure and sincere, in others, mingled with much alloy of baser sentiments—they became daily more daring, aggressive, and indiscriminate; they aspired not only to govern society, but to reorganize it.

Hence, the literary spirit of this age is in a most marked degree practical, utilitarian, and analytic. Hasty pamphlets took the place of elaborated works, and poetry was discarded for philosophy. It is remarkable that the eighteenth century produced no poet of eminence except Voltaire; and poetry was neither his especial forte, nor his principal title to renown; and much even of his poetry was didactic and polemical. The philosophy which prevailed was coarse, materialistic, and destructive—made for the special occasion—devoted to a special purpose. The reaction against despotism, which showed itself in literature as much as in life, was rather a hatred of restraint than a pure love of freedom: it cleared away many noxious and entangling weeds; but it grew no matured or wholesome fruit. It was the inspiration alike of Voltaire, of Montesquieu, of Rousseau; but in Montesquieu alone is it genuine, rational, and sober.

Literature itself, too, in becoming a means and not an end, lost its purity and completeness. It ceased to be an art, and was degraded into a weapon; and, as a natural consequence, style was far less regarded than of yore, for men do not sedulously polish swords which are needed for the rough, prompt use of actual warfare. The Encyclopedists it was who, with inferior weapons, and in a rougher, harsher, colder style, completed the work which their three far greater precursors had begun, and gave to the century its peculiar reputation as an atheistic and destructive era.

“They made themselves a fearful monument—
The wreck of old opinions—things which grew,
Breathed from the birth of time.”

Assuredly it was not an era on the intellectual phenomena of which the human mind can look back with either pride or gratification. Its philosophy was shallow; its insight was partial; its temper was cynical, bitter, and ungenial. Even in its most beautiful productions, there was a pervading tone of the meretricious and unsimple.

We are yet too close to the era we would judge, too much involved in its partialities, too agitated still by its wild storms and crowded catastrophes, to be able fully or fairly to paint its intellectual portrait. A few of the more marked and abiding features are all that we can hope successfully to catch and delineate. And, first, we must observe that when we speak of the literature of the nineteenth century in France, we mean, with scarcely an exception, the second portion of that century—the interval from 1815 to 1848. During the iron but skillful despotism of Napoleon, there was scanty literary achievement, because there was no mental freedom; the whole period of the Empire produced only two celebrities in the arena of letters; and though these were unquestionably about the most brilliant and influential geniuses of the whole country, yet both wrote under persecution and in exile. They were in the age, but not of it. Of the thirty or forty authors belonging to Napoleon's reign, two only in no degree bore its features or submitted to its impress; and these two alone have survived—Madame de Staël and Chateaubriand.

It was otherwise with science, especially with the exact sciences. These flourished under the Empire. Researches into nature occupied spirits that might otherwise have been turbulent and dangerous; they mooted no menacing or disturbing questions; the knowledge which they brought to light might even be made profitable to the purposes of conquest and oppression. Scientific men, therefore, were honored, and science was pursued in a more laborious temper, in a more conscientious spirit, and with far severer exactitude than heretofore. There was less of brilliant description, less of mere poetic speculation, but far more of patient inquiry, of minute observation, of close logic, of comprehensive study. Buffon came to be read no longer as a naturalist, but as a consummate master of a fascinating and seductive style; and the contrast between him and Cuvier, Le Placé, Fourcroy, Arago, and Lapeyrolle, marks a notable change and a vast advance in the intellectual development of the nation.

A second peculiarity of the epoch is the revival of historical literature. In this respect the present century is greatly distinguished from the past. The whole of the eighteenth century produced only three French historians—Rollin, Voltaire, and Raynal; and none of these either are or deserve to be read now.

The historians of the present era have been far more numerous, and of a far higher stamp. It could scarcely have been otherwise. The circumstances of the age are sufficient to explain the strong tendency of its literature in the direction of history. Times so thronged with astonishing events and startling convulsions; so fertile in great deeds and great men; so rich in harvests to be traced back to their seeds; so rife in characters to be analyzed and in problems to be solved; so palpitating with every intensest human interest—offered irresistible temptations to every reflecting and artistic spirit. Grand models for the portrait-painter; stirring strifes and agonizing catastrophes for the scene-painter; profound and subtle questions of a character to task the utmost sagacity of the philosopher; hopes, illusions, vicissitudes, and ruins to furnish the saddest and sublimest texts that ever moralist had to preach from—all these were scattered in the most lavish and bewildering confusion over the annals of a single generation. The only difficulty lay in the embarras des richesses. The wonderful wealth of materials was like that which Clive described in the treasure-vaults of the Indian prince. Those who loved to flatter national vanity and to depict national triumphs saw wherewithal to satiate the most ravenous appetite for glory. Those who looked with a cynical eye on human enthusiasm, on dreams of perfectibility and schemes for a regenerated universe, never had a scene of such awful disenchantment to gloat over. Those who believed in a supreme Governor of this earthly chaos, and who loved to trace the finger of retributive justice in the vicissitudes of history, could be at no loss for examples of the most righteous chastisement for the most terrific crimes. Those whose mental ambition took a wider range, and who aspired to construct a philosophy of cause and effect out of the chronicles of states, might not unreasonably flatter themselves that now at length they had a basis of fact wide, varied, and complete enough to enable them to build their edifice without the charge of rashness and presumption. While polemic writers of every predilection—the conservative and the progressive—those who believed in a realizing future as well as those whose faith was rooted in an irrecoverable past—might alike fancy that history could be made to speak their language and to combat for their creed, according as they fixed their partial gaze on the undeniable advances made, or on the fearful price at which every step forward had been purchased.

A period in which history was enacted on a scale of such unparalleled magnificence could scarcely fail to create a strong bias toward historical pursuits. Accordingly, among a cloud of lesser names, we find the eminent ones of Michelet, Mignet, Thierry, Guizot, Thiers, and Lamartine, as having produced, in this department of literature, works which after times will not willingly let die. The last three of these historians, if not the most intrinsically valuable, are unquestionably the most renowned, though the fame of one of them may possibly be only transient. Each is distinguished by certain strongly marked characteristics. Guizot, a perfect model of profound and conscientious erudition—never taking his facts at second-hand, but preparing himself for every enterprise by the most laborious research into original and cotemporary documents—masterly in his resumes, comprehensive in his speculations, and unrivaled for the luminous ease and consummate skill with which he collects and arranges all the premises out of which his conclusions are to flow—is yet singularly wanting in one of the first qualifications for his noble calling: he is unreadable except by students as laborious and conscientious as himself. He is, in truth, less a historian than a professor of history—less of a narrator or painter than of a disquisitionist. His dramatis persone do not live; he understands them to the core; he analyzes them with an instrument of singular subtilty and finesse; but he can not make them exhibit and expound themselves. His penetration and sagacity are those of a superior, not of a sympathizing creature; his impartiality has in it something of repellent coldness; with great dignity of style and a sustained moral elevation, he manifests no emotion, and can, therefore, excite no enthusiasm. Nevertheless, his account of the English Revolution, or what we term the Great Rebellion, will always maintain its place—but a place, we fear, rather on our shelves than in our hands; and his two Histories of Civilization, in France and in Europe, are works of such surpassing and enduring merit that every one ought not only to read but to study them: it is a pity that any defects of style should have been suffered to make so instructive and indispensable a perusal a task and not a pleasure.

These defects are of a kind rather to be felt during a perusal of his writings than to be pointed out by the critic or illustrated by special examples; and we can scarcely avoid a constant self-reproach for feeling them so strongly when engaged in the study of such masterly and luminous productions.

The "Histoire de la Revolution Francaise," and the "Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire," of M. Thiers—the one the production of his early youth, the other of his mature manhood—are both brilliant performances. M. Thiers is as free as it is possible to be alike from the peculiar merits and the peculiar defects of his great countryman and rival. His worst enemy can not deny the singular fascination of his flowing, incisive, and pictorial style. His blindest admirer could scarcely venture to claim for him the praise of impartiality or scrupulous exactitude. He writes often like a statesman, oftener like a partisan; rarely like a grave and far-seeing philosopher, never like a frigid or honorable judge. He has, indeed, and pretends to have, nothing of the cosmopolite about him. He is emphatically and before all things a Frenchman. He sees every thing from a French point of view; he relies on French authorities; he draws almost exclusively from French sources; he overflows with French prejudices; he writes to immortalize French achievements and to exhibit French trophies. But his personages live and move; he sheds his own overflowing vivacity both over events and over scenes; he knows admirably how to narrate, to paint, and to discuss; and though no philosopher, he is a sagacious, acute, and thoughtful politician. His reflections, his speculations, his analyses of influences, his tracings-out of causes, are among the most interesting portions of his work. The interest of the narrative never flags for a moment, and even the disquisitions which he frequently introduces are so brief, so much to the purpose, and so admirably interwoven with the events out of which they spring, that they are never felt as interruptions. His summaries are wonderfully lucid; and his political science, though often shallow and fallacious, is so pointedly, brilliantly, and epigrammatically worded, that we are dazzled and delighted too much to demur and doubt as often as we ought. There is a precision, a sparkling vigor about his periods that scarcely ever fails to enlist us on his side. Macaulay himself is not easier reading. He possesses, in fact, nearly every qualification for a historian—except the chief of all—fidelity. No writer of our day, has been more resolutely willful in seeing every thing through the colored and distorting medium of his own personal and patriotic predilections. As he would trample upon every principle of right rather than that France should be baffled or eclipsed, so he would distort every fact, and repudiate every authority, rather than admit any thing that records her humiliation or dishonor. In his moral code, the love of country reigns paramount alike over the love of justice and the love of truth.

M. de Lamartine, by his "Histoire des Girondins," achieved a vast reputation, which has not been increased certainly, if even it has been confirmed, by his more recent work, "L'Histoire de la Restauration." Few works at their first appearance produced a more instantaneous or remarkable sensation; but it is more than doubtful whether the next generation will ratify the verdict of the present. In any case it is not from the Muse of History that M. de Lamartine will receive his laurel crown. His writings, though dealing with historical characters and times, are not histories, in any accurate or fitting signification of that word. The first is a gallery of portraits; the second is a series of episodes. The portraits are magnificent specimens of word-painting, it is true; but the coloring is gaudy, excessive, and sometimes even coarse. The episodes are narrated, and their scenes described, with an eloquence at once imposing and seductive; but wearying from its monotonous and meretricious splendor, and paining from its frequent inflation and bad taste. An imagination so vivid and a vocabulary so rich as M. de Lamartine's are dangerous gifts, and need the especial control of the strictest moral and æsthetic rules. Unhappily this discipline has been signally wanting. M. de Lamartine is as unscrupulous as M. Thiers, and far more inaccurate. He evidently considers facts as of so little consequence that he gives himself no pains to ascertain them. Thiers distorts them under the temptation of a false patriotism, Lamartine under the temptation of a false passion for effect. In the delineation of his characters, in the selection of his scenes, in the concoction of his maxims and reflections, he has one object and only one in view—to produce a telling impression, to create an effective picture. Under his pen the Girondins and their adversaries assume colossal dimensions, both as to their talents, their virtues, and their crimes; when he approaches Brissot, Murat, Robespierre, or Danton, his thought is not, "What was the real character or career of these men?" but, "what sort of heroes of romance can I most successfully make out of them?" When he comes to the history of the Restoration, the case is still worse. He does not scruple to revive the old practice—long since condemned by our severer standard and abandoned by every writer with the slightest pretensions to fidelity or taste—of putting speeches into the mouths of his heroes, and even goes so far as to give verbatim the magniloquent conversations between royal personages at interviews which were strictly secret and toto-a-toto. Puerilities like these are unworthy alike of the gravity of history and of a genius like M. de Lamartine's; and we scarcely know which is the most surprising, that he should stoop to them, or that his readers should tolerate and applaud them.

Beautiful images, delicious fancies, fond languishing emotions, brilliant and exquisite expressions, are not scattered through his poetry—it is crowded with them in overflowing and cloying abundance; they form its substance. An imagination so rich, a sensibility so keen, a lyre so sweet, has seldom been seen in any land; never, we think, in France. But his undefined and evanescent mistiness is even more remarkable. There is a nebulous haze about his verses which, beautiful as it is, is often disappointing; it is sentiment and thought not yet condensed into ideas. In reading him we feel a sort of somnolent delight, as if we were basking in soft sunshine, floating over smooth waters, and cradled by the gentlest of all rippling waves.

If want of masculine vigor and a healthy tone characterizes nearly all Lamartine's poetry, it is not so with Beranger. He is always lively and charming, alike whether his topic is patriotic, amatory, or bacchantic. Generally simple, nearly always gay, sometimes bitterly sarcastic, he is always plain, easy, and manly; we wish we could say that he was always decent. He is only a chansonnier, but a chansonnier of unrivaled merit. Unhappily, there are many of Beranger's chansons which are neither quotable nor readable.

Beranger has two or three characteristics which distinguish him from every other writer of his age and nation. One of these is the peculiar tone of his amatory verses. He treats and understands love as it was treated and understood in France before the publication of the "Nouvelle Heloise." It is with him not a passion, scarcely a fancy, but a pleasure. He is never sentimental: all is gay, lively, piquant, pretty. Nothing is morbid, but, on the other hand, nothing is serious, in his representation of human tenderness. Again, patriotism, not passion, is the source of his inspiration. He is essentially, like Burns, the poet of the people; he speaks their language—he shares their feelings—he gives utterance to their ideas and emotions. His style is wonderfully concise; every word is well chosen, every word is clear, and there never is a word too much. He owes, probably, much both of his popularity and his merit to the circumstance that he is an unlearned man, and knows no language or literature but his own. Certainly of all the French poets, he is the only one of whom we never tire, and whom it is never an effort to read.

In no particular of its literary life does the period we are considering present a greater contrast with its predecessor than in the astonishing number and still more startling quality of its romance writers and novelists. Of prose writers of fiction the eighteenth century produced only four who survive or deserved to survive—Le

Sage, the Abbe Prevost, Rousseau, and Bernardin de St. Pierre; and each of these was satisfied with giving birth to one, or at most two works. "Gil Blas," "Manon Lescaut," "La Nouvelle Heloise," and "Paul et Virginie," are all that they have really bequeathed to us. The nineteenth century, on the contrary, counts its novelists by the score, and their productions by the hundred. Not to mention Madame Cotin, Mlle. Sophia Gay, Alfred de Vigny, and others, who were moderate both as to quantity and quality, there is Madame de Stael, whose Delphine will live long, and whose Corinne can never die. There is Chateaubriand, whose fictions, however, are rather poems than romances. There is Victor Hugo, whose power of harassing delineation is almost as unequalled as his flagrant and exuberant abuse of it. There is Eugene Sue, whose "Atar-Guill," "Les Mysteres de Paris," and "Mysteres du Peuple," have unhappily become notorious even here; whose conceptions and descriptions, powerful as they are, are regarded even among his own countrymen as having often transgressed the limits of permissible monstrosity. There are Balzac and Paul de Koch, Jules Janin, and others, whose numerous romances are strange exhibitions of genius wallowing in the mire—

"Of talents made
Haply for high and pure designs,
But oft, like Israel's incense, laid Upon unholy, earthly shrines."

There is Alexander Dumas, with all his insane extravagance, perhaps the most readable of them all, whose marvelous fecundity resembles that of the rabbit or the Cochinchina fowl; a manufacturer rather than an artist; the stream of whose inspiration, though exhausted by the production of at least fifty volumes, dribbles on, still—a pump, no longer a fountain. Lastly, there is far the greatest of all since the author of "Corinne"—the lady who writes under the pseudonyme of George Sand—one of the most prolific authors of the day; the sterling stamp of whose genius is attested not by the number or the beauty of her tales, their deep thought, their still deeper tenderness, or their polished and perfect style; but by that characteristic which seems to be the exclusive prerogative of the highest order of intellect, by the fact that the current of her thought has become purer, profounder, serenest, as it has flowed on; that she has gradually worked herself free from much of the turbid and unlicensed sensuality which disfigured her earlier productions, and that a manlier tone, a better taste, and a higher morality have grown upon her year by year. There is yet a wide gulf which separates her from what we should wish to see her, and what she might yet become; but the woman who has traversed the space which separates "Consuelo" and "La petite Fadette," from "Leone Leoni" or "Indiana," need despair of no other progress.

But the fictitious literature of the age in France is marked by another feature far more distressing than its exuberance. It is diseased to its very core. Never before was so much talent perverted to such base uses. It is not only that the tone of sexual morality which it preaches is lax and low; that it expatiates with such complacency in equivocal positions and voluptuous delineations; that its whole tendency is to deaden the sense of duty and impair the vigor of the will; that every-where sentiment is extolled and brought prominently forward while principle is ignored or thrust ignominiously into the background: of all this we have had examples before in literature far less morbid and less dangerous. It is that it addresses itself consciously and glaringly to palled appetites and distorted imaginations; that it proceeds on the assumption—which, of course, it thereby helps to realize—that all relish for what is chaste, simple, and serene is extinct in the hearts of its readers; and that recognising a demand for what is unnatural, extravagant, and bad, it sets to work to provide a supply without compunction and without stint. It is a banquet consisting solely of unwholesome stimulants and more unwholesome sweets. Each writer strives to surpass himself and to eclipse his rivals in the novelty and extravagance of the incidents which he heaps together; in his daring violations of every rule of taste, art, and morals; in his delineations of whatever can most startle, horrify, and shock. No situation is too grotesque, no combination too improbable, no picture too revolting, to be admitted. "Cela émeut: cela fait éprouver une sensation," is the language of praise, by which such writers are rewarded. Now, it is some inconceivable monster of iniquity, who passes in the world's eye as a saint, and receives the "prize of virtue," as in "Atar-Grull." Now, it is some character utterly and desperately vicious, made interesting by some single virtue or some redeeming human affection, as in "Le Roi l'amuse," and "Lucrecia Borgia," which, however, are not novels, but dramas. Now, it is some angel of purity brought up in a brothel and a cabaret, as in "Les Mysteres de Paris." Now, it is some scene of prolonged and minutely pictured agony, as that of the priest hanging by the leaden spout from the turret of Notre Dame, which slowly bends under him for many pages. And so on through a catalogue of monstrous, harrowing, unnatural conceptions, fitted for nothing, designed for nothing, but to rouse an exhausted fancy or feed a jaded sensuality.

In one most important and significant respect the tone of French literature in the present century has undergone even a greater modification than its form and direction—in all, we mean, that relates to the religious sentiment. The prevalent spirit of the last age was that not of simple skepticism, but of hard, cold, aggressive infidelity. The unbelief of the men of that time was something more than a negation: it may be said to have amounted not only to a positive creed, but to an inspiring faith. Now, all this is changed; and without any close analysis of the difference, no one can pass from the study of Voltaire, Raynal, Diderot, Helvétius, and their collaborateurs, to the perusal of Madame de Staël, Chateaubriand, Guizot, Lamartine, or even of George Sand, and not be conscious that they are breathing an altogether different atmosphere. It is not that skepticism has become extinct or unfashionable. It is not that these writers or their imitators are believers, in our sense of the word: scarcely one of them belongs to any sect, or would be owned by any Church; but though a creed may be wanting, the religious sentiment is there. The poet felt it stirring in his soul; his muse was arid and cold without it; the historian read indications of its undying vitality in every page of the world's annals; the thinker, now that strife and passion had passed away, discerned how shallow, barren, and incomplete was the philosophy which sought to banish or deny it. But with the great majority of these same writers, even those whose tone is reverential and devout, religion scarcely reaches a more definite form, or a firmer foundation, than a vague instinct, or a strong emotion; it is poetical, not theological; it is the result of impression, not of reflection or research. "J'ai pleuré, et j'ai cru," says Chateaubriand. "J'aime: il faut que j'espère," says Lamartine. The religion of this last great poet is a sort of type of that which pervades the better portion of the literary life in France. It is an emotion of the heart—not the guide of life.

The improvement, as compared with the last age, is unquestionable. The feelings and convictions of rational devotion are not outraged as before at every turn: if there is not much more to satisfy, there is infinitely less to shock; and the gain that has been made good may be a step to further progress.

We must conclude this rapid enumeration of the principal distinctive features of the French literature of our day, by calling attention to one of the most obvious and striking—its exuberant, and, what Burke would call, its quadrumane activity. For one writer of the last century we have a score now. The pen is the sword of the age, which every one considers himself entitled to wear and to wield—often, no doubt, feebly enough; often clumsily; often in a bad cause.

Perhaps, of all the characteristics of the time this tendency is not the least sad or sinister. A restlessness of spirit that knows not what it wants; an ignorance of self that knows not what it can do; a rebellion against wholesome restraints that shrinks alike from mental toil and mental discipline; a boyish vanity, that burns to gain the ear and influence the feelings of the public without preparation and without capacity—these are ill auguries for the peace and progress of the nation. Whence help and rescue are to come we confess we do not see. It is hopeful to know that there still exist many Frenchmen keenly alive to the dangers and defects of their intellectual position, and courageous enough to analyze and stigmatize them.—Edinburgh Review.

DEATH.

BY F. W. TARKER.

A WILD bird by a streamlet sung,
And on the wilds its warblings flung;
And as in echoes died away
Its deeply wild, impassioned lay,
It shrieked, and, fluttering from its rest
Its life-blood stained its downy breast.
The quivering wing, the glaring eye,
The heaving breast, the gasping sigh,
The look that spoke imploringly,
Were past, and lone the wild bird lay,
And noiseless as the silent spray,
That wreathes the waves upon the stream
That sparkles in the sunset's beam.
No more, sweet warbler, shalt thou sing,
Or greet the sun with upward wing!
No more shalt cleave the ambient air
Or woo thy mate from deep despair!
No more! no more! thy race is run!
Thy song, thy spirit-song, is done!
And still I gazed, and wondered where
The gushing life which struggled there,
And where the spirit that had been
The living principle within.

I saw a child—a fairy boy:
His look was love—his smile was joy.
The curl that nestled on his cheek
Seemed fondly, lovingly, to seek

Communion nearer with the soul,
That lit with most seraphic grace
The heavenly beauty of his face,
And yet had known no ill control.
Again I saw the child—he lay,
As sunset tints departing day;
The breath of summer gently moved
The flowing curls his mother loved;
His breath came quick, his eye was wild—
The mother bent upon her child.

When man is sealed in youthful bloom
An early victim for the tomb,
While fond, vain dreams of future fame,
An honored and undying name,
And ere requited love's sweet flame
May lance afresh the bleeding heart,
But comfort none can more impart;
The flashing eye can scarce restrain
The gushing tear's unbidden flow,
Which speaks of hopeless, silent woe,
In signs that pride forbids, in vain,
From others' ken should all remain.

The maiden kneeling by the grave
That holds whom deep love could not save,
Hath tasted well the bitterness,
The lonely heart's deep wretchedness,
Which, soon or late, is known to all
Who wear life's ever-deepening pall.
But who shall paint the mother's pain,
While kneeling by her dying child?
She marks his eye grow strange and wild,
And feels she never more shall strain
Her treasure to her heart again.
And thus the fondly loved was lying;
Thus watched the mother o'er the dying:
O death! thou dread and holy thing,
Which prophets preach and poets sing—
Thou deep and dark inanity,
Strange guide to immortality—
What eye can know thee, who can trace
The mystery of thy dwelling-place?
Thou silent messenger between
Two worlds which own thee still unseen,
Say, is thy mission here of pain?
Shall mortals still the goblet drain?
And shall the bitter tear flow ever?
And shall the wounded heart rest never?
Say, art thou not of mercy sent,
To bring the soul from banishment—
To purify from earthiness,
And guide it to ethereal bliss?
And when, with intuition wise,
It joyous treads the upper skies,
Will it not love to linger still
Where mortals strive with human ill?
And will the child not come again
To soothe the mother in her pain?

MAN may dismiss compassion from his heart,
But God will never. COWPER.

THE SHEPHERDESS.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CLOVERNOOK."

THERE lived once, in a valley all fenced round with green hills, and beautiful with fountains and flowers, a maiden whose name was Myrtala. She was exceedingly beautiful, and rich in gold and silver, and precious stones, and gorgeous apparel, but she was not rich in wisdom. But Myrtala was a princess, and was held in great esteem by the people of the country in which she lived. Some, alas! were so dazzled by the splendor in which she dwelt, as to fancy whatever she said and did was perfect. To have been permitted to carry her train as she walked abroad would have been esteemed a great privilege by maids as fair as she and much wiser. But though she was a princess, and wore gowns with borders heavy with golden flowers, and had looks of admiration following her wherever she went, she was perhaps as far from happiness as the humblest child in the beautiful valley where she reigned, for in all things she had her will; so that it might be truly said she reigned, though the government was nominally in the hands of another. Nevertheless, Myrtala was sad, discontented, positively wretched sometimes. From all those who fall down and worshiped her, her eyes wandered dissatisfiedly away—the desire of her heart was toward the king's son, but he staid in his own dominion contentedly enough, never so much as sending a message to the beautiful Myrtala.

At last her cheek grew pale, and she feigned an importunate errand into the country of the prince, that she might be assured for herself whether the stories of his wit and wisdom were based in truth. "If I can but see him," she said, "I will bring him home captive;" for she believed herself unrivaled, both for beauty and wisdom; "for who would dare measure herself with a princess?" she said.

There were great preparations in the house of the princess, and after a long time, and the expenditure of more gold than would have bought all the poor of that country a house and an acre of ground, she set forth, accompanied by many attendants and maids of honor to serve as a background to her brilliancy.

All went well: the journey was safe and prosperous, and to crown her expectancy, the young prince, whose name was Salathiel, no sooner heard of the presence of Myrtala in his dominions than he went forth to meet her, and proffer entertainment befitting her condition. The civility might have grown out of self-respect and propriety; it might have been a ceremonious show of the highest regard for the princess. For the first days of her entertainment Myrtala could not but repeat, "I came, and saw, and conquered," but the feeling of triumph subdued itself by degrees; for though Salathiel was in all things respectful, he was far from yielding her the homage she desired. When he plucked a flower for her she felt that his heart was not in its bright cup, and vexation gave harshness to her voice and a color to her cheek that was like angry fire, and, speaking as the foolish women speak, she said, "He shall not escape from the net I have spread for him; he shall see what authority I have in my own land, and that shall make him love me;" for she was devoid of that simple wisdom which knoweth that love can not be bought nor sold; that it must be won—not compelled. She never once thought, "I will strive to appear more lovely and more excellent in his eyes, and by continual kindness secure his regard." She never thought there was any thing for a princess to do except to receive admiration and flattery.

So the time of her departure came near without the accomplishment of that for which the journey had been undertaken. The prince had said many pleasant things, but he had not once said he could not exist without her; they had walked in the moonlight gardens and conversed in the glittering palace; they had listened to music and joined in dances together; yet Salathiel sighed not that the day of the fair one's departure drew near.

"I have had a dream," said Myrtala, "and I dare not return to my own country alone;" for she thought if Salathiel could see her at home, where she was courted as a queen rather than princess, he would fall down with the rest and worship.

"Five hundred strong men and five hundred armed men shall go with you, the half preceding and the half following," said the prince, but it would not do; the dream of Myrtala was a strange dream, and ten thousand warriors could not guard her so well as the prince alone.

Salathiel was a courteous prince, and when he saw that she would not be otherwise content, he made ready and himself attended her, as her strange dream required. Even yet the princess was not satisfied, for Salathiel talked, now of the beast eating grass by the wayside, and now of the bramble-flower leaning out into the sun; sometimes of his own land, and sometimes of the unseen land—the country from which no traveler returns—a clime Myrtala had thought but little about. In short, though the princess was carrying Salathiel home with her, she was not carrying him captive, as she had designed to do. She tried to persuade herself, however, that when he should see what power she exercised in her own country, he would be desirous of forming an alliance with her.

The beautiful valley in which she lived was reached at last, and for a few moments the princess experienced something of the rapture of "a conqueror's mood." With proud satisfaction she pointed to the different locations of beauty as they went along, now close beside a winding river, now beneath trees coming out in the tenderest foliage, and now through a meadow where the grass was speckled with daisies.

The prince was delighted with the valley, for it was like a garden whichever way he looked; but when they turned aside, and, by the margin of a soft, full brook, went noiselessly on, he grew silent, too, and, locking his hands together, gazed earnestly, almost reverently, upon the glorious summer prophesies April was making; for it was April, and all the air was fragrance and melody.

Suddenly there came into the cheek of the prince a color brighter than the redness of a June rose, and the smile on his lip was as if a beam of the sunshine lay there. Sitting in the faint shadow of a tree that grew on the bank of the brook, her straw hat beside her, her bare feet in the water, and her shining hair dropping in half curls down her cheeks and neck, was a young girl minding a small flock of sheep. Among them, and nearest the girl, was a ewe with three lambs, two of which were white as snow, lively and bright-eyed as lambs may be, but the third was black with a white speckle in its face, altogether inferior to its fellows, both in size and beauty.

Myrtala was vexed, for such light had not once come into the prince's face as he gazed upon her. "I will spoil her pretty pastime," thought she, and directing her postillion to stop, she called to the girl and in harsh tones inquired her name and occupation. The girl replied that her name was Mary, that her mother was a widow who lived hard by, and that her only wealth was the sheep she was tending.

"Give me the two white lambs," commanded the princess, "and go straightway to your home, and should I ever see you sitting immodestly by the highway again, I will punish you with the loss of your silken curls and your head into the bargain."

Pale and trembling with fright the watcher of the lambs took the two white ones up in her arms, and as they lifted their meek faces toward hers in trustful fondness, the tears fell upon them thick and fast. She dared not delay, however, and averting her face gave the pretty lambs into the keeping of the princess. So the little black one was left with the mother sheep alone.

The prince frowned, and watched the young girl as she went lonesomely home mourning for the innocent pets she had tended each day of their life till now. He frowned, but said nothing, and the face of Myrtala grew black with anger.

"He shall not escape me for all his frowning," said the willful princess. "I will show him that my wealth is as unbounded as my personal power." Then in her heart she formed a plan about the lambs. She would cause one of them to be fed on pearls and rubies, and the other should live in a garden and eat lilies and all flowers that were dainty and fair, and in her foolishness she thought that by such keeping the wool of the one would grow soft as silk and white as snow, and that the other would have its common lamb's fleece changed to a fleece of gold. She said nothing of this silly device, for she wished to surprise all her household with the metamorphosis of the lambs, and more especially did she wish to surprise the prince.

Accordingly she gave orders that the one should be fed upon pearls and rubies, and all precious stones and gems, and that one of the most beautiful of all the gardens should be set apart as pasture for the other; and after three or four days were gone she invited the prince to walk with her in the garden, that he might see and be pleased with the silky softness of the lamb's fleece. Past beds of tulips they went, and by roses hanging down their red cheeks, through neighborhoods of white lilies, and along walks bordered with flowers more than I can name or know, and at last near a fountain on a little patch of green grass they found a lamb, not with a silken fleece and cropping daisies, but lying stiff and dead. When Myrtala saw it she passed it hastily by and beckoned Salathiel to follow, but he stooped down and softly smoothed the wool of the lamb, and looked upon its dead beauty with a tender pity. Then to excuse herself the princess was fain to explain the royal manner in which the lamb had been fed and kept, and that the little brute owed its death to its own stupidity, and that never a princess in the world gave lamb such excellent and bountiful pasture as she had done. And when she beckoned him a second time he followed her, but with downcast eyes and a thoughtful brow.

Next they entered a chamber with a floor of marble, and ceilings and walls rich with elaborate paintings, and with tall arched windows of so many dyes that they were like rainbows set in the walls. A golden basin full of wine was in one place, and silver plates were in others, on which shone nectarines and apples, mixed with diamonds and pearls; and, besides the golden bowl of wine and the dishes of fruits and gems, there was a bed of white satin spread softly and sweetly as if for a royal infant, and far away from the bed, lying on the marble floor, was the mate of the dead lamb—another dead lamb.

It needed not that the princess should, a second time, speak her foolishness. Salathiel understood the meaning of the rubies and the wine, and turning to the maiden he said, "Know you not that milk is for babes and meat for strong men, and that for the lamb of the field God provideth? There is no knowledge and no device that will change a dove to a raven, or make the crow cease his crying, or the wren complain like the owl. Learn of the dead lambs that you can not go before nature and say to the beast that looketh down, forego your instincts and gaze at the stars.

"Even men, who are made a little lower than the angels, are not able to let go the natures God gave them at first; for to one he hath given the capacity to handle nimbly the stringed instrument, and to another the power to search, and to reason, and to know. As one field brings forth grapes and another thorns, one flowers and another thistles, so are our souls, and only beneath the showery miracle of grace are their barren soils turned to fruitfulness."

Myrtala—being greatly displeased, first, that her lambs had not flourished upon her royal feeding, and next, that they had not yielded fleeces of silk and gold, and last and most, that Salathiel had spoken to her as though he talked to a child and not to a princess—turned away, saying secretly to her heart, "Thou shalt not be thus thwarted and vexed forever."

It was near the sunset that the prince heard, as he walked alone in the beautiful valley, a low lullaby song that wooed him like the voice of love—an untaught melody, but passing sweet. It was not like his dreaming of fairy or angel, but exceedingly human as well as sweet. He thought of the voices heard by Milton's benighted lady, but the song linked itself to good and not to evil. So he went forward forgetting the beautiful valley, and walking in a vision of poetry. At length he found himself close by the same brook-side where he had seen the maiden, whose name was Mary, tending sheep, and looking up he saw the ewe with her one black lamb, and close by the pretty shepherdess singing, and, like a rose, blushing at her own beauty. When she saw Salathiel she was afraid, for she had seen him with the princess, and knew that he was like her in power. As she retired fearfully and modestly the flowers seemed scarcely to bend under her step, and the black lamb played round her gently and lovingly, and they both looked like a picture in a green ground. The princess, with her two white lambs seemed like an ugly shadow compared with her, having only one black lamb beside her, and being dressed with natural grace and modesty.

When she was quite out of sight the prince sat down on the bank by the full flowing brook, and mused till the roseate shadows of twilight grew purple and then black, but the valley was not beautiful any longer after the maiden was gone. The following day at the same hour he sought the brook-side again, and this time learned that the wisdom of the shepherdess equaled her modesty and beauty. There were gossips in that valley as well as in countries less lovely, and the knowledge of the prince's admiration for the shepherdess was soon brought to Myrtala's ears.

Then it was that her vexation was kindled to wrath, and working secretly as before, she caused the young girl to be seized as she tended her one black lamb, and directed that all her golden curls should be clipped off, and that she should wash and bleach the linen of her royal household. "We will see how the prince will like the seeming of his lady's hands and head," said Myrtala, and as much as she might in her anger, she pleased herself with the thought of his disenchantment.

Sure enough, as she had thought, he went forth on the morrow and found the poor maiden spreading down linen by the brook-side to bleach. To conceal the loss of her curls she had wound a wreath of lilies about her head, her pretty arms were bare, and the blush that came into her cheek when she saw the prince, made her appear even more lovely to him than she had ever appeared till then. But when he knew why it was that she was bleaching linen, and why she wore the crown of lilies, his pity grew to a tenderness that was not pity at all; and taking both her hands in his he told her that she who could be meek, and good, and beautiful in spite of all, deserved a queenly crown in place of a lily wreath, and, despite all the fretting and fuming of the foolish Myrtala, he carried her away to his own country, and after awhile, when he was himself king, she sat by his side dressed in royal robes, as she was with wisdom and modesty while tending the sheep.

We may not all be rewarded as was Mary, the shepherdess, but her story encourages us to persevere in the path of duty in spite of obstacles that stand in our way. In her natural gracefulness, tending her one black lamb, and after that bleaching linen, and her pretty curls all gone, she appeared more lovely to the wise Salathiel than did Myrtala in the midst of all her splendor. Ah me! one living black lamb, that has eaten only clover, is better than a thousand dead white ones starved on pearls and lilies.

LINES SUGGESTED BY THE DEATH OF A FRIEND.

BY G. M. KELLOGG, M. D.

Out among the starry islands—
Out into a shoreless sea,
Thou my friend art floating forward—
Floating to eternity.

Hast a signal? See yon land there?
Show it to us if there be.

Are the islands pearly stranded?
Are they lit with song like ours?
Flow the rivers there to music?
Are there golden-fruited bowers?
Are there silvery falling fountains
Sheening through the vernal hours?

Hand in hand we've trod together
Nature's devious winding maze;
Thou wert quick to find her meaning;
Thou wert first the clew to raise;
Tranced wert thou to follow thither!
What new wonders fix thy gaze?

We have bent together over
Rare old books with words so wise;
Meet you there such unfleashed raptures
In the library of the skies?
Are there lofty, solemn meanings,
Boaring fancies, ecstasies?

O how idle every question
Asked by mortals of the skies;
Earthward never stoops the spirit
When its seraph wings it tries!
Are the silly questions answered,
Asked by worms of butterflies?

O thy mind was purest crystal
Can I half its trueness tell!
Like the magic of the diamond,
Cutting sharply, truly, well;
Or into the depths of knowledge,
Cleaving like a diving-bell.

Few of earth's best joys hadst tasted,
Ere away thou'rt quickly borne.
All too fair the spirit's mantle,
Which on earth by thee was worn—
Like the tway-leaf's snowy blossom,
Falling midst the dews of morn.

SITTING MUSING BY MY WINDOW

BY MRS. E. O. SAMPSON HOTT.

Sitting stitching by my window,
Half the clouded, wintry day;
Sitting shivering by my window,
From the cheerful fire away;
Sitting musing—half complaining,
Long I noted not the sight
Of the beauteous snow descending,
Of the brown earth robed in white.

O'er the dimly outlined hill-tops,
Streets, valleys, woodlands wide;
Far as faded out the vision,
Far as stretched from side to side;
From the zenith heights above me
To the meanest nook below,
Swiftly as a bannered army
Swept the white-winged muffled snow.

Soon the winter's spoils were hidden;
Craggs and scars were folded up;
Blighted nature meekly drinking
From her crystal-cruised cup.
On the new baptized creation
Such a sense of beauty fell;
On the new baptized creation
Seemed a hush of peace to dwell:

Sitting musing by my window,
Long I noted then the sight
Of the beauteous snow descending,
Of the brown earth robed in white;
Then my thoughts were lifted higher;
Then I left the world within;
Then from off my spirit's lyre
Swept the clouds had gathered in:

Mused upon the bright revealings
Of the earth so brown and bare,
While I murmured, all unheeding,
The without—so passing fair!
O'er the dimly outlined future,
Real half and half in dreams,
Far as faded out the omen—
All that is and all that seems—

From the zenith heights above me;
From the world of better things,
Armed with strength and crowned with beauty
Came the love-infolding wings.
Soon the soil of life was hidden;
Cares and sorrows folded up;
Musing murmurer meekly drinking
From her heaven-appointed cup.

On the newly baptized spirit
Such a sense of beauty fell;
On the newly baptized spirit
Seemed a hush of peace to dwell.
Sitting musing by my window,
Now the night infoldeth all;
Still the white-winged beauteous snow-flakes,
Falling, falling, still they fall.

THE ROCK THAT IS HIGHER THAN I.—"From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."—Psalms lxi, 2.

A few years since some travelers were journeying in the vicinity of the Pyrenees. Terrific storms are common to that region; and these travelers were alarmed by the sudden appearance of huge masses of clouds in the angry sky, betokening the approach of no ordinary tempest. While viewing these omens with sensations of terror, a sharp voice broke upon their ears, shouting, "To the rock! to the rock!" Looking round, they saw the speaker, a French peasant, pointing to a mass of rock near by, which overhung the road, and offered them a place of shelter. They hastened to this friendly cave. Just as they reached it, the thunder boomed athwart the sky, the rain poured down in torrents, and the storm came rushing from the hills, sweeping every thing from their path. Securely placed beneath the shelter of their friendly rock, our travelers, though trembling at what they saw and heard, escaped the danger. When the storm was overpast, they renewed their journey with hearts swelling with gratitude for their preservation.

In this incident we see how the presence of danger impressed those travelers with so profound a sense of their own weakness, as to qualify them to fully appreciate the value of the sheltering rock to which the peasant directed them. In like manner it would seem that the royal Psalmist, beset with difficulties, threatened by storms, and circumvented by the malicious schemes of bad men, felt himself unspeakably impotent. He had no confidence in the adequacy of his own power to overcome the dangers frowning upon him. Hence, casting aside all self-dependence, he lifted his beseeching eyes to God. Gazing on the divine Omnipotence, he beheld Jehovah under the image of a vast rock, whose foundations and summits were alike lost in the Infinite, and within whose shelter he would be absolutely and eternally safe. The idea met his soul's aspiration, and he poured forth his prayer, "From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the Rock that is higher than I." God heard his prayer. He became conscious of the all-surrounding presence of the Infinite. His fears subsided; his heart grew quiet; and, confident of safety, he poured forth a tide of triumphant song, in anticipation of eternal participation in the joys of the Lord.

And what David did we may also do. When we are threatened by storms too terrible for our puny strength to brave; when disaster rolls like a mountain-flood upon our path; when fierce lightnings gleam angrily from our social sky; when adversity stripes us of property; when unfeeling malice shoots poisonous darts at our reputation; when enemies misrepresent and friends misunderstand us; when death lays the darlings of our affection low; when we are left desolate and unfriended in the wastes of life—then, O, then should our eyes be uplifted, and our voices heard, crying, "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I!" For, in such hours, all strength of mind, all human confidences, are vain. The mightiest minds can not stand erect amidst the desolations of life, if unsheltered by the Rock of ages. Even Napoleon, though intellectually a giant, reeled and staggered like a tottering infant when he saw the hand of Providence uplifted against him—when he heard the storms of retribution howling around him. Then, though his will had always been like iron, he became weak and infirm of purpose; he hesitated, resolved, hesitated again, and finally fled—a melancholy spectacle of the helplessness of man when he dares the perils of life unprotected by the Rock that is higher than himself. His example is a lesson to all ages. It teaches every man to shun his proud habit of self-dependence; to learn the way to the shelter of the eternal Rock; to cry, with David, "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I!"—The Harp of David.

A LESSON FROM THE FLY.—"Eat thou found honey? Eat so much as is sufficient for thee."—Proverbs xxx, 16.

The fly, too greedy to be wary, sometimes falls into a dish of sweets, and crawls out, drooping, dispirited, and unable to use his wings. Long and industriously he plies his brushy legs, before his pinions are again fit for flight. Be sparing and cautious, Christian, in thine earthly enjoyments, lest thou clog the wings of thy soul. One incautious plunge into carnal delights may leave thee crawling in the dust, unable to rise into the atmosphere of spirituality, full of self-reproach, and loathing the mess of pottage for which thou hast degraded thyself, and diminished thy happiness here and hereafter. A single act of immoderate self-indulgence may render necessary long and diligent seeking for spiritual cleansing, before thou canst be free, and use thy wings, and again soar heavenward.

THE AGED CHRISTIAN.—It is a rare and precious privilege to sit down and listen to the language of a Christian pilgrim who has walked with Christ many years, struggling through trials and temptations, sometimes almost despairing, sometimes rejoicing in hope, always trembling lest he should not be among the number who endure to the end, but at length brought safely forward to the threshold of the heavenly kingdom. With what calm, deep-toned gratitude does he survey the past! It stretches away dim and distant to the retrospective view, but it is far from being a trackless waste.

Here and there, through all the course, Ebenezers arise and greet the sight, "like stars on the breast of the ocean," awaking fresh gratitude, and hope, and trust, and enabling the spirit to say, "Thou wilt guide me unto death, and afterward receive me to glory." Glory! ah, what does it mean? An endless existence at the right hand of God. Fullness of joy. The pilgrim in the early and the midway path obtains but few and faint glimpses of his future inheritance. His "Father's house on high" seems far away; he has yet much to do with earth and its inhabitants; he must still be girded for the conflict, and ever on the standing watch.

To the privileged one who is surely near the goal, the noise and turmoil of life have passed away. The hopes it once inspired have long since departed. He looks on infancy and childhood with a placid smile, and says, "I shall soon know what the childhood of a new existence is;" on youth, and says, "I shall soon put on immortal youth;" on manhood, and says, "I shall soon attain to the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus. O, to Him who hath loved me, and hath given himself for me, to him be glory now and evermore!"

"Only waiting till the angels
Open wide the mystic gate,
At whose foot I long have lingered,
Weary, poor, and desolate.
Even now I hear the footsteps,
And their voices far away;
If they call me I am waiting,
Only waiting to obey."

THE WORD "SELAH."—The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew word Selah, which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and, of course, the English reader often asks his minister or some learned friend what it means. And the minister or learned friend has most often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums and most of the Jewish commentators give to the word the meaning eternally, forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence! Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play and the singers stop." Wocheer regards it as equivalent to sursum corda—up, my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not in the imperative, 'Hear, Jehovah!' or 'Awake, Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that he would remember and hear," etc. The word itself he regards as indicating a blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah itself he thinks an abridged expression used for Higgaion Selah; Higgaion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets.—Bibliotheca Sacra.

THE TREE IN WINTER.—The roots of a tree are never stronger than in winter, when it bears no fruit, when it is clothed with no leaves; the sap then runs down into the roots, instead of being wasted in leaves. If it was always summer with the Church of God—if she had no trials to encounter, no troubles to endure—the hearts of its members would grow luxuriant and proud, and run much into showy leaves and specious fruit; but when the winter of adversity nips and pinches them, when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall, then is there a clinging close to God, then is there a fleeing for refuge to him "who hath been" and still is "a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in his distress, a covert from the storm, and a shadow from the heat."

CARNAL ENMITY STIRRED UP.—"The carnal mind is enmity against God!"—Romans viii, 7.

We read of a viper which hides its teeth in its gums, requiring good sight to detect them. Simplicity might conclude them harmless. Provokes the viper: the teeth are instantly seen, protruding in battle array! It is thus with the carnal mind not only in some special instance, but the world over.

This enmity is not apt to slumber in a revival. It is like the American snake, seldom caught napping in hot weather. In cold weather, when the thermometer is below zero, there is no danger from snakes; bring them to the fire, however, and life and enmity will soon appear. It is like fire smoldering under a heap of ashes—that is, carnal enmity; stir it up, and it shows red life sufficient to kindle a conflagration that many waters could not quench.—Earnest Christianity.

THE CHRISTIAN'S PEACE.—"The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect thereof quietness and assurance forever."—Isaiah xxxiii, 17.

You can not touch the deep foundations of the Christian's peace. When the winds are up and raving loudly, you see the trees torn up by the roots, the waves of the sea boiling, and ships dashed to pieces upon their surges. You are, perhaps, inclined to say, How tempestuous it must be a thousand fathoms down! Ah! the winds have never reached those waves—there all is peace. There is a large mass of waters the wind can not reach—it is all on the surface. And so let wealth depart, let political influence decline, death come—let all the winds from hell be unloosed—you can not touch the deep foundations of the Christian's peace. You have only seen the surface; in the deep within all is peace, peace.—Dr. Beaumont.

THE CROWN OF THORNS.—"And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head."—Matthew xxvii, 29.

Those who have seen them tell us that the thorns of Judea are much larger and much stronger than those of our own country. Does not this impress our minds with a fuller idea of the intensity of Christ's sufferings? The crown of thorns affords the Christian much instructive matter for contemplation. Throughout Scripture, thorns are symbolical of the corruption of the human heart. Our sins were all left at the Savior's door, and he was crowned with thorns, to teach us that we can alone be delivered from the awful penalty due to our transgressions in consequence of our sins being heaped upon him. He wore the crown of thorns upon his head, to take the thorns of natural corruption out of our hearts—"He bare the sins of many," that by his stripes we might be healed—"He was made a curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse"—"He was a man of sorrows," that those who believe in him should become heirs of joy. It was the custom at Rome to bring criminals to the top of the Tarpelan rock, and to hurl them down headlong: thus does Divine justice bring sin to the summit of the Rock of ages, and then cast it down into the abyss of infinity!—Dr. Howe.

THE SAND ON THE MOUNTAIN.—While the sand is lying on the mountain-side, it is a vile and refuse thing, trodden under foot of man and beast. It is carried to the laboratory, submitted to the fire of the furnace, molded into form, polished by the hand of the workman, and becomes a noble mirror, the most splendid ornament in the palaces of kings. Thus it is with the sinner—God raises him from the rubbish of the fall, vitrifies him by the power of his word, polishes him by the graces of his Spirit, and places him in the zenith of glory, the noblest mirror, in which are reflected all the perfections of God.

PHYSICAL CAUSE OF THE DEATH OF CHRIST.

Dr. SMOUD, an eminent English physician, has published a treatise upon the physical cause of the death of Christ. The work is full of interest as to its matter, and especially valuable for its physiological details. To use his own language, he proposes first "to demonstrate an important physical fact connected with the death of Christ," and, secondly, "to point out its relation to the principles and practice of Christianity." When we read the work some years since, then newly from the press, it struck us as embodying important facts in relation to the death of Christ, and also as elucidating points that had been not very clearly defined. Under this impression our views of the work were then given in extenso through another medium.^o In the present article we propose to discuss, in a popular form, one single principle in relation to the death of Christ; namely, its physical cause.

In the very prime and vigor of life, and in the full possession of all his faculties, the Savior entered upon the scene of his last sufferings. The last supper, the departure of Judas, the discourse of the Savior, the agony of the garden—are so many striking acts in the drama. His mortal agony upon the cross was of six hours' duration. The Divine presence, restored to him after his agony in the garden, was again withdrawn upon the cross, and the anguish of his spirit led him to exclaim, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" His death was sudden. Nor was his strength exhausted, for he had just cried with a "loud voice." The centurion could hardly believe that he had so soon died; and yet the fact was so evident that his legs were not broken, as were those of the two thieves. But a soldier pierced his side with a spear, whereupon, says St. John, who was an eyewitness, "immediately there came forth blood and water." Here was evidently a combination of mental and physical causes attendant upon, if not producing, his death.

Having assumed, then, the death of Christ upon the cross, the question arises, whether his death was superinduced by the agony and exhaustion of crucifixion. In order to the determination of this question, a brief inquiry into that mode of punishment and its effects will be necessary.

Crucifixion, as a mode of punishment, prevailed among many nations from the remotest antiquity. The first instance of it on record, probably, is that of the chief baker of Pharaoh, who, Josephus says, was crucified; which by no means contradicts our authorized English version of the Bible, which says simply that he was "hanged," the two words being interchangeable in the Scriptures. The Greeks and Romans were accustomed to inflict this punishment upon criminals, especially upon slaves. It was not, as many have supposed, a Jewish mode of execution. The only instances of crucifixion allowed among them was that of the dead bodies of those who had been stoned for blasphemy; hence it was that the "nailing to the tree" was regarded by them as so peculiarly "accursed." And even in that case the Mosaic law required that the body should be taken down before sunset of the day on which the criminal had been slain. The instigators of the death of Christ were indeed Jews, but he was condemned by a Roman tribunal, and executed by a Roman law. His death was, therefore, most ignominious. Under sentence for alleged sedition against Cesar, he suffered the death the Romans were accustomed to inflict upon their slaves and the vilest of malefactors; and then, also, being "nailed to the tree," in the eyes of the Jews he suffered the most execrable of deaths—the punishment for blasphemy.

By the Emperor Constantine, punishment by crucifixion was abolished throughout the Roman empire, because he deemed it indecent and irreligious to punish upon the cross the vilest criminals, while at the same time it was used to symbolize that religion which was the hope of the world. From that time forward, a period of fifteen centuries, crucifixion has been rarely witnessed in Europe; and the prevalent ideas of it were derived from painters, poets, or devotional writers, who followed imagination or tradition rather than the evidence of facts. For correct notions upon this subject, the Christian world is greatly indebted to Salmasius and Lipsius, two eminent scholars of the seventeenth century, who, with great industry and perseverance, collected and brought together the authentic records of antiquity upon the subject. From their researches, we learn that the cross consisted, in addition to the upright and transverse bars, of a short bar projecting from the upright post, on which the crucified person was seated. "The structure of the cross," says Irenæus, "has five ends or summits, two in length, two in breadth, and one in the middle, on which the crucified person rests." Justin Martyr also speaks of the "end projecting from the middle like a horn, on which crucified persons are seated." Tertullian, a still later authority, speaks of the "projecting bar which serves as a seat." This important part of the cross has been almost entirely overlooked, and the crucified individual described as having his whole weight suspended on the nails which pierced his hands and his feet.

The process of crucifixion is thus described: "The criminal condemned to this dreadful mode of death, having first been scourged, was compelled to carry the cross to the place of execution—a circumstance which implies that the scourging was not excessively severe; and that the dimensions of the gibbet did not much exceed those of the human body. On arriving at the spot he was stripped of his clothes, and, after a cup of wine—sometimes medicated, with a view to impart firmness, or to alleviate pain—was speedily nailed to the cross, either before or after its erection. In either case he was made to sit astride on the middle bar; and his limbs, having been extended and bound with cords, were finally secured by large iron spikes driven through their extremities, the hands to the transverse beam, and the feet to the upright post."

In this condition, intense and generally protracted suffering was endured, before death came to the relief of the victim. Indeed, crucifixion was a very lingering punishment, producing death generally by the slow process of nervous irritation and exhaustion. The duration of its agonies would, of course, be more or less protracted according to the age, sex, constitution of the individual, and other circumstances connected with the case. "In many cases death was partly induced by hunger and thirst, the vicissitudes of heat and cold, or the attack of ravenous birds and beasts; and in others, was designedly accelerated by burning, stoning, suffocation, breaking the bones, or piercing the vital organs." Instances have occurred in which individuals, after being for some time upon the cross, were taken down, and, by careful medical treatment, restored to health. The usual duration of life under the torture inflicted by crucifixion may be set down as from two to three days; and cases are on record where life was protracted to five, and even nine days.

Jacobus Bosius, in his "Cruz Triumphans et Gloriosa," says that Victor, Bishop of Amiterna, though crucified with his head downward, survived two days. He also gives an account of a married pair, crucified in the Diocletian persecution in 286, who hung alive upon the cross nine days and nights, mutually exhorting and encouraging each other, and both expiring on the tenth day. In the year 297, under the Emperor Maximian, seven individuals, after being subjected to protracted and cruel tortures, were crucified at Samosata. Of these "Hipparcus," a venerable old man, "died on the cross in a short time. James, Romanus, and Lollianus expired the next day, being stabbed by the soldiers while they hung on their crosses. Philotheus, Habibus, and Paragrus were taken down from their crosses while they were still living. The emperor, being informed that they were yet alive, commanded that huge nails be driven into their heads, and by them they were at length dispatched." These are horrible details, but they give us light upon the real nature of crucifixion, and the amount of suffering, as well as the length of time it was endured before death came to the relief of the unhappy victim.

The following instances are of modern date, and have been selected from a number of cases fully authenticated. Captain Clapperton, writing in 1824, says, "The capital punishments inflicted in Soudan, are beheading, impaling, and crucifixion; the first being reserved for Mohammedans, and the other two practiced on Pagans. I was told, as a matter of curiosity, that wretches on the cross generally linger three days before death puts an end to their sufferings." The Rev. Mr. Ellis, when describing the punishments inflicted in Madagascar, says, "In a few cases of great enormity, a sort of crucifixion has been resorted to; and, in addition to this, burning or roasting at a slow fire, kept at some distance from the sufferer, has completed the horrors of this miserable death." Bishop Wiseman gives an account of the execution of a young Mameluke, who was crucified under the walls of Damascus for the murder of his master. His hands, arms, and feet having been nailed to the cross, he remained alive from midday on Friday to the same hour on Sunday, when he died. From these instances it will be perceived that death, by crucifixion, was a slow process, protracted in ordinary cases to two or three days, and in some instances to many more.

Jesus died within six hours after he was nailed to the cross. We are, therefore, compelled, in view of the facts above developed, to conclude that, in whatever degree the ordinary sufferings of crucifixion contributed to his death, they were not its immediate cause. The bystanders and those engaged in the dreadful tragedy were evidently surprised at the suddenness of his death; and even Pilate, when applied to for his body, "marveled if he were already dead." The fact also that he "cried with a loud voice" at the very moment when life departed, plainly shows that his death could not have been occasioned by exhaustion, as is the case with those who die from crucifixion. Commentators have always felt the force of this, as being "utterly irreconcilable with the idea that life was at its last ebb, from the extinction of vital energy." Matthew Henry says, "Now this was a sign that his life was whole in Him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails. With a panting breath and faltering tongue, a few broken words are hardly spoken, and more hardly heard; but Christ, just before he expired, spoke like one in his full strength." We are compelled, then, to seek elsewhere the cause or causes of his sudden death.

After putting the various theories that have been devised to account for the suddenness of his dissolution, into the crucible of careful analysis, we find that all which require our serious attention are reducible to two; namely, that the Savior, "by an act of his own divine will, yielded up his life;" or that "some mortal lesion of a vital organ of his human frame suddenly supervened, and was the immediate and, so to speak, the physical cause of his death."

The former of these two opinions has probably been most generally received; but on that account we are by no means to remit our examination of phenomena of such transcending importance. The question is, which will best accord with the teachings of the Bible and the physiological facts in the case?

The hypothesis that Christ "yielded up his life," that is, dismissed his spirit from the body by a voluntary act, is probably derived mainly from that remarkable passage in the Gospel of John, where Jesus says of himself, "I lay down my life that I may take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself." Now, if we collate this passage with those which positively declare that Christ was slain by his enemies, that he died "the death of the cross," "became obedient unto death," that the Jews were his "betrayers and murderers," that they "crucified and slew" him by the hands of wicked men, etc., we shall hardly fall of reaching the conclusion that the meaning of this expression is simply, "that in fulfillment of the divine plan of human redemption, Christ voluntarily submitted to a violent death, which he had it in his power to avoid." How perfectly in accordance with this conclusion is the discourse of the Savior to his disciples in his last journey to Jerusalem, when he took them aside and began to say, "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles; and they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall crucify him; and the third day he shall rise again." Christ, then, voluntarily submitted to a violent death; he was led as a lamb to the slaughter. This, then, is the sense in which "Christ laid down his life for us." To place this matter beyond a doubt, the same apostle who made this record of Christ's saying, declares that as "Christ laid down his life for us, we ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren;" not, of course, by committing suicide, but by submitting to persecution, and even death, if called to make the sacrifice for the cause of Christ, which sacrifice the apostle Paul often declared himself willing to make. And further, in all the Scriptural allusions to the death of Christ, it is not represented as self-inflicted, but as penal and vicarious.

It has also been argued, that the words employed by St. Matthew, ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, rendered, "yielded up the ghost," and those employed by St. John, παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, translated, "gave up the ghost," imply a voluntary dis-mission of his spirit, as the actuating cause of his death. To this it would be sufficient to reply, that the other two evangelists employ the word ἀπέθανον, literally, died—closed, however, in both of them, “gave up the ghost.” But, aside from this fact, there is no force in the argument; for we might draw the same conclusion concerning the patriarchs, because it is also said of them that they “gave up the ghost.” Bishop Pearson, in his “Exposition of the Creed,” employs the following forcible language, having a relation to the point at issue: “Should we imagine Christ to anticipate the time of death, and to subtract his soul from future torments necessary to cause an expiration, we might rationally say that the Jews and Gentiles were guilty of his death, but we could not properly say they slew him. Guilty they must be, because they inflicted those torments which, in time, death must follow; but slay him actually they did not, if his death proceeded from any other cause, and not from the wounds they inflicted.”

That it was in the power of Christ to avoid the death of the cross, had he chosen to give up the object of his mission—the redemption of the world—is perfectly obvious from the fact that he was very God as well as very man. What could all the powers of earth or hell avail against the “legions of angels” he might have summoned to his aid? He says even to Pilate, “Thou wouldst not have had any authority against me had it not been given thee from above.” In all this we see voluntary submission to an inferior power, but nothing more. And it is remarkable that in all the Scriptural allusions to the Savior’s death, although represented as being voluntary, it is never represented as being self-inflicted, but as penal and vicarious.

These arguments, we think, clearly evince one point; namely, that the death of Jesus was voluntary, only in the sense of having willingly submitted himself into the hands of his betrayers and murderers, that the great dispensation of mercy might be revealed and man be redeemed.

But if the shortness of the time he was upon the cross precludes the idea that his death could have resulted from the crucifixion alone; and if we may fairly question the soundness of the doctrine that the Savior released himself from suffering by dismissing his spirit before his physical nature had reached the last point of human endurance, to what are we to attribute his sudden and seemingly premature death? Without employing oracular language, or speaking with dogmatic authority, we say there is good reason to believe that there must have been some immediate and physical cause of his sudden death.

We have already seen that our Savior was undergoing extreme mental as well as bodily agony. After his agony in the garden, in which his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death, he seems to have had a short respite from overwhelming agony. But what can more fully evidence its return upon his soul than the bitter wail that gushed forth from his riven heart? “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” This burst of agony immediately preceded his sudden and unexpected death. Now, it is not a little remarkable that the prophecies which speak most plainly of the Savior’s agony upon the cross, and the scorn with which he was treated, connect these events with the very manner of his death. While in the 22d Psalm we have our Savior personified, giving utterance to his sorrows, making complaint that his hands and his feet were pierced, specifying the very language with which his foes would tantalize him while upon the cross,* and also the disposition that should actually be made of his garments and his vesture; how closely connected with all is the complaint, “I am poured out like water; my heart is like wax; it is melted in my bowels!” Also in the 69th Psalm, where the Savior is again personified and is giving utterance to his anguish, in close connection with the gall given him for meat and the vinegar for drink it is said, “Reproach hath broken MY HEART;” and if we turn to the evangelist again, we find that it was just after the vinegar had been touched to his lips that he gave up the ghost.†

Again: the Savior is represented as enduring the extreme agony of death; he trod the wine-press alone; “he poured out his soul [or, as Michaelis and other distinguished Hebraists render it, his life’s blood] unto death.” Then, too, it gives us a more exalted idea of the grandeur of the Savior’s suffering and the completeness with which he bore our sins, to know that he shrunk not from the burden till his humanity, unable longer to endure it, was crushed beneath its load. No other idea, we think, can so fully convey this grand impression as that which has been suggested; namely, that our Savior actually died of a broken heart.

Physiological facts, as well as Scriptural prophecies, figures, and types, all point to this conclusion. Let us look at the physiological question. Two facts here are worthy of our attention, and if we mistake not they strongly corroborate the general idea that the immediate physical cause of the Savior’s death was rupture of the heart. The first is the natural tendency of great grief to produce this result; the second is the phenomenon of the “blood and water,” which can be rationally accounted for on no other supposition.

Let us note, then, the tendency of great sorrow to produce this result; that is, rupture of the heart. Dr. Crichton says that “the general corporeal effect of all the modifications of grief and sorrow is a torpor in every irritable part, especially in the circulating and absorbent system; hence the paleness of the countenance, the coldness of the extremities, the contraction and shrinking of the skin and general surface of the body, the smallness and slowness of the pulse, the want of appetite, the deficiency of muscular force, and the sense of languor which overspreads the whole frame. As the action of the extreme branches of the arterial system is greatly diminished, the heart and aorta, and its larger vessels, and the whole system of the pulmonary artery, become loaded and distended with blood. The painful sense of fullness which this occasions gives rise to the common expression, which is in some degree descriptive of what really exists. In sorrow the heart is said to be full, and in deep sorrow it is said to be like to burst. A sense of oppression and anxiety, a laborious and slow respiration, and the remarkable phenomena of sobbing and sighing, naturally arise from this state of torpor and retarded circulation.”

We have not space now to describe the heart, further than to say it consists of two principal sacs, the right and the left, which lie side by side, and adhere firmly together so as to form a strong middle wall, but have no internal communication. Each of these is subdivided into two connected chambers, termed auricle and ventricle, and the whole heart is inclosed in a loose bag or membrane, called the pericardium. Returning from all parts of the body, except the lungs, blood of nearly a black color, and unfit for the purposes of life, is poured into the right auricle, whence, after a momentary delay, it is transferred to the corresponding ventricle, its reflux being prevented by a membranous valve interposed between them. By the powerful contraction of the ventricle it is transmitted through the pulmonary artery to the lungs, where, by minute subdivision and contact with atmospheric air, with which the lungs are inflated with each breath, it is purified and acquires a bright crimson color. Returning from the lungs by the pulmonary veins, the renovated blood passes into the left auricle, and thence in a similar manner, and at the same time, as on the right side, into the left ventricle, by the contraction of which it is distributed with great force through the aorta to the remaining parts of the body.

Dr. Stroud says that the immediate cause of rupture of the heart is "a sudden and violent contraction of one of the ventricles, usually the left, on the column of blood thrown into it by a similar contraction of the corresponding auricle. Prevented from returning backward by the intervening valve, and not finding a sufficient outlet forward in the connected artery, the blood reacts against the ventricle itself, which is consequently torn open at the point of greatest distension, or least resistance, by the influence of its own reflected force. A quantity of blood is hereby discharged into the pericardium, and, having no means of escape from that capsule, stops the circulation by compressing the heart from without, and induces almost instantaneous death. In young and vigorous subjects, the blood thus collected in the pericardium soon divides into its constituent parts; namely, a pale, watery liquid called serum, and a soft clotted substance of a deep red color, called crassamentum; but except under similar circumstances of extravasation, this distinct separation of the blood is seldom witnessed in the dead body."

The physiological truth developed here has been recognized by all people, and every language has its terms to express it. For, "although the term broken heart is not always used literally, it was no doubt originally derived from the literal fact."

From the description we have given of the heart, the reader will at once perceive, that in case of rupture, the contents of the vessel ruptured would be poured into the pericardium, or sac surrounding the heart. Its condition here, and whether it actually separates into the serum and crassamentum, must be ascertained by facts. The reader will perceive the important bearing of these facts on the question now before us; for if this be so we have a natural solution of the phenomena of "blood and water" that flowed from the pierced side of the Redeemer, and one that amply vindicates it alike from the foolish traditions that have been connected with it, and the unfounded cavils that have been heaped upon it.

We can only cull a few from the multitude of facts that are directly to the point. Bonet gives an account of a soldier who died suddenly after long-continued grief. While all the other viscera were healthy, the pericardium was found to contain, not only water, but also much coagulated blood. And this water was only the serum of the blood separated from the coagulated part. Dr. Thurnam mentions a case of rupture of the heart, in which the pericardium was found to contain several ounces of serum and coagulated blood. Dr. Townsend, of New York, mentions the case of an unfortunate female in that city who "literally and truly died of a broken heart, as was found on dissection. . . . The sac of the pericardium was found filled with about ten ounces of coagulated blood, and two of serum." A case is furnished by Dr. Williams, of Southampton, in which an individual, after suffering ten years of great despondency of mind, died also of a broken heart. In the post-mortem examination, the pericardium being penetrated by the knife, "a pint at least of transparent serum issued out, leaving the crassamentum firmly attached to the anterior surface of the heart." At the coroner's inquest on the body of James Brown, who died suddenly of rupture of the heart in Manchester, in 1834, the surgeon who performed the post-mortem examination stated that "the pericardium contained about a quart of blood and water." A large number of cases like the above are found in the medical journals, but these are sufficient for our purpose.

We must now note another fact, and that is that the separation of blood into serum and crassamentum seldom if ever takes place so long as it remains in its natural vessels. This conclusion is based upon the statements of Mr. Paget, after an examination of one hundred and sixty-four cases; and of Dr. John Davy, who furnished a tabular statement of thirty-five cases of post-mortem examination, made in the general hospital of Fort Pitt, Chatham, from January to September, 1838—in only one of which the phenomena of "transparent serum" was discovered; and also upon the general observation of surgeons. Two conditions, then, only seem to admit of the transformation of the blood into its solid and fluid constituent parts. The first is when the heart and the vessels are radically affected in their conformation, as in cases of aneurismatic enlargement, etc. The second, and more general case, is when by rupture or lesion the blood is poured out of its natural receptacles; then it seems very generally to be speedily changed into serum and crassamentum, or, to use popular language, into blood and water.

In the case of our Savior we can not suppose, for a moment, that any disease of the heart, or of any of the vital organs, existed. The only possible physiological solution of the issue of blood and water from the wound made by the soldier's spear, is that rupture of the heart had taken place; and this would be a full and satisfactory physiological solution of the phenomenon. For, as we have already seen, if a rupture of the heart had taken place, the blood would naturally be emptied into the pericardium, and there its separation in "blood and water," or serum and crassamentum, would take place. Then if the pericardium was pierced, "blood and water" would literally flow from the wound.

Now, let us apply these facts and reasonings to the phenomena connected with the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The sufferings here experienced by Christ, in his mortal agony, were less bodily than mental—his soul was exceeding sorrowful—nor were they inflicted either by men or devils; but he then received "the cup which the Father had given him," and then was fulfilled the declaration, "It pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief." The agony upon the cross was identical in nature with that in the garden, only more intense, and longer protracted. This is evident from the affecting exclamation, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me!" The first agony lasted one hour, and terminated with the bloody sweat; the other lasted three hours, and terminated his mortal life. The suddenness, as well as all the circumstances under which that life was terminated, abundantly show that his death was the result, not of exhaustion, but of some latent and destructive agency. The bloody sweat was a natural promontion, and precursor of that more mortal result—the weakening of the heart. Dr. Streed thus reasons upon this point: "The death of Christ can not be ascribed to the ordinary sufferings of crucifixion, because, far from destroying life in six hours, they often allowed it to be protracted to three or four days; nor to miraculous interposition, because he was slain by his enemies, and died the death of the cross; nor to original feebleness of constitution, because, as the priest and victim of an atoning sacrifice, he was perfect in body and mind; nor to temporary weakness, resulting from his recent agony, because his strength was sustained by angelic agency. That his mental sufferings were, on the contrary, adequate to the effect, is evident from their influence in Gethsemane, where, had he not received supernatural aid, they would apparently have proved fatal without the addition of any others; and if in a lower degree they excited palpitation of the heart so violent as to occasion bloody sweat, it is equally evident that, when aggravated and longer continued, they were capable of producing rupture of the heart. That the sufferings endured in both instances, arose from a sense of the Divine malediction, is proved by his referring them in both to the immediate hand of God, by his allusion in the garden to the cup given him by his heavenly Father, and to the ancient prophecy, 'I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock will be scattered,' and by his final exclamation on the cross, 'My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me!'" It would seem, from these views, that the conclusion that the immediate physical cause of the Savior's death was the rupture of his heart, is not only warranted, but absolutely demanded by the phenomena attendant upon his death.

The quantity of blood and water must have been considerable, to have attracted such distinct notice, and thus been made a distinct matter of record. And this, we find, accords with the observation of physicians in cases of severe rupture and sudden death. Mr. Watson mentions a case in which the rupture was nearly three-fourths of an inch in length, and where a quantity of coagulum and serum was found in the pericardium, amounting to about five pounds. In the case of Sir David Barry, who died suddenly, the quantity of serum and clotted blood amounted "to full five pints." This, then, only tends to confirm the general view we have taken of the subject.

Another question arises here—had sufficient time elapsed after the death of our Savior for this separation of the blood to take place? The death of our Savior occurred about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. In less than three hours from this time, that is, before the evening sacrifice, at 6 o'clock, the bodies were taken down from the cross, according to the Jewish law. When the soldiers came to discharge this duty, the thieves were evidently still alive, and were, therefore, dispatched by breaking their legs, according to the Roman custom; "but on coming to Christ, as they perceived that he was already dead, they did not break his legs; one of the soldiers, however, pierced his side with a spear, and immediately there came forth blood and water." Now, here had elapsed a period of nearly three hours, while Hewson, Paget, and other eminent physicians assure us that "the process of separation will often commence in a very few minutes after death, and the complete separation of the serum and crassamentum will occur in an hour."

We have now dwelt upon the phenomena connected with the death of Christ as fully as our limited space would admit. These phenomena, we think, can be harmonized with the facts and the Scripture on no other hypothesis so well as that we have suggested; namely, that the immediate physical cause of the death of Christ was a broken heart, produced mainly, at least, by the agony of his soul.

To us there is something grand and impressive in the idea that our Savior actually suffered to the extreme point his humanity could endure. The Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all, and so fearful was the burden of that iniquity, that not only was his soul agonized, but humanity was crushed beneath its intolerable weight. Well may we tremble to think what our condition would have been had the full weight of our own iniquities rested upon us. Here, then, is absolute demonstration that the sacrifice of Christ was not a mere show—a mere form for effect, but a real vicarious sacrifice; and if a real vicarious sacrifice, then is the atonement real. He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; His soul was made an offering for sin; He bore our sins in his own body upon the tree; and we are truly redeemed by his precious blood.

IS ITALY WAKING UP?—A work is now going on, sanctioned by the Neapolitan government in 1853, as important in some respects as the drainage of the Lake of Haarlem. About half way between Rome and Naples, in a basin of the Apennines, lies a large expanse of water, known as Lake Fucino. The soil around it is extremely fertile, but liable to be flooded—the differences of level varying, according to season, from twenty to forty feet. Besides swamp and drowned land, there are the ruins of three ancient cities somewhere beneath the waves; and antiquaries, not less than agriculturists, are watching for the result of the scheme for the drainage of the lake. The works are taken in hand by a company who are to have them completed in eight years, when 33,000 acres of the most fertile land in Italy will be laid dry, and the whole of a large district ameliorated. The undertaking was first talked about in the days of Julius Cæsar; next Claudius attempted it, and employed 30,000 men for eleven years in driving a tunnel through the mountains, which answered its purpose for a time, but subsequently became choked by neglect. This tunnel is now to be greatly enlarged, and provided with sluices to regulate the flow of the water.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES OF FRANCE.—The French Minister of Public Instruction has issued a work on the public libraries of France and Algiers, from which it appears that, excluding Paris, there are in all the libraries 8,733,439 printed works, and 44,070 manuscripts. Bordeaux has 123,000; Lyons, 130,000; Romen, 110,000; Strasbourg, 180,000; Troyes, 100,000; Avignon, 80,000; Dijon, 80,000; Versailles, 56,000; Tours, 57,500; Grenoble, 80,000; Marseilles, 51,000; Nantes, 45,000; Amiens, 53,000; Toulouse, 50,000. In 1852-3 there were expended for all these libraries 407,781 francs, of which sum only 184,227 francs were for the purchase of books and binding. There are 238 public libraries.

CHRISTIAN CHARACTER OF STUDENTS IN COLLEGES.—The Society of Inquiry, of Amherst College, Massachusetts, thus classifies the students in the various colleges enumerated below:

The total number mentioned as preparing for missionary work is 40. The number of conversions during the year is 45.

BUSINESS OF THE NEW YORK BOOK CONCERN.—The sales of books for the year 1854 amounted to $295,298.85; periodicals, $96,956.19; total, $392,255.04. Being an increase of $48,050.11 upon the sales of 1853, and of nearly $130,000 upon the sales of 1852. The business of the Concern is rapidly outgrowing the capacity of the building; additional accommodations must soon be provided. The tract enterprise, to a large extent, deserves the credit for the increased sale of books. This new organization has infused new life into our great publishing establishment, and is rapidly modifying its character, and adapting it to the exigencies of this stirring age.

DENOMINATIONAL WEALTH.—The number of the principal religious denominations in the United States is 20. The whole number of edifices of worship is about 36,000, capable of accommodating 14,000,000 of people. The total value of Church property is $86,416,639. The average value of each church and its appurtenances is $2,400. The most numerous denomination is the Methodist. The Baptist comes second, Presbyterian third, Congregationalist fourth, Episcopalian fifth, Roman Catholic sixth. The property of the Methodists is estimated at $14,636,671; that of the Presbyterians at $14,369,880; Episcopalians, $11,261,970; Baptists, $10,931,382; Roman Catholics, $8,973,838; Congregationalists, $7,973,962.

MINISTRY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The number of members and probationers in the Methodist Episcopal Church, at the close of 1854, was 783,358. The number of effective traveling preachers was 4,814. These figures show that the Church has an average of one effective traveling preacher to every 163 members. Besides this goodly array of itinerant ministers, however, we have a body of local preachers numbering 6,189. Not a few of them constantly supply appointments of considerable importance, and nearly all of them, it may be safely presumed, do more or less valuable service. Add them to the effective traveling ministry, and we have an aggregate of 10,963 preachers to preach the Gospel to our 783,358 communicants. Average these numbers, and it appears that we have one minister to about every seventy-one members of our Church. The Minutes for 1854 show that 579 preachers were admitted on trial in the annual conferences last year. The number of deaths and locations amounted to 130, leaving a net increase of 449. Comparing this with the increase in the membership, which was 30,782, we find that for every 68 persons added to the Church, one new preacher was added to the traveling ministry. The ratio of increase in the membership was 4 per cent; in the ministry it was about 10 per cent.

HERVEY, THE POET.—J. K. Hervey, of England, recently deceased, was possessed of poetical talents altogether above mediocrity. His poem, entitled "To One Departed," in ten four-line stanzas, is exquisite in its conception and versification. We give three verses:

"I know thou art gone to the home of thy rest;
Then why should my soul be so sad?
I know thou art gone where the weary are blest,
And the mourner looks up and is glad;
Where Love has put off in the land of its birth
The stains it had gathered in this;
And Hope, the sweet singer that gladdened the earth,
Lies asleep on the bosom of Bliss.
In the hush of the night, on the waste of the sea,
Or alone with the breeze on the hill,
I have ever a presence that whispers of thee,
And my spirit lies down and is still."

Beautiful, indeed, to our view, is the conception in the two lines:

"And Hope, the sweet singer that gladdened the earth,
Lies asleep on the bosom of Bliss."

Can any professor of English literature furnish us with any thing more exquisite?

MONTGOMERY AND SOUTHEY.—A life of James Montgomery, the poet, has appeared in England from the pens of Revs. J. Holland and James Everett. It is spoken of as finely gotten up. Mr. Montgomery was born at Irvine, a seaport of Ayrshire, Eng., November 4, 1771, and died in 1854. His father was a preacher of the United Brethren or Moravian connection, and, in company with his wife, left England in the year 1783, when James was only twelve years old, for the West India Moravian missions. Mrs. Montgomery died in the year 1790, and her husband in June, 1791; but young James never saw either of them after bidding them farewell in 1783. Mr. Montgomery never married, but for what reason we can not say. He amassed in his long life a fortune by his own individual exertions, amounting to about $45,000. Robert Southey and the poet Montgomery were intimate friends, and the latter part of the second volume of his life has several letters of decided interest from Southey's pen. In early life Southey was a Deist, but subsequently became a Socinian. He was peculiarly a domestic man. This passage concludes one of his letters: "The keenest sorrow which I ever endured was for the loss of an only child twelve months old. Since that event I have had five children, most of whom have been taken from me. Of all sorrows these are the most poignant; but I am the better for them, and never pour out my soul in prayer without acknowledging that these dispensations have drawn me nearer to God."

THE MORAVIANS AND THEIR OPERATIONS.—It was in the year 1731 that Dober and Neitschman, Moravian missionaries, embarked for Germany to preach Christ to the poor negroes of St. Thomas's, while Stach and Bornisch set out for the icebergs of Greenland. According to their last report, they have at present 69 missionary stations in 13 different countries. On these stations there are 297 missionaries, male and female, and 70,612 heathens, either converted or under the religious instruction of the missionaries. These stations are thus distributed: Greenland, 4 stations, 24 missionaries, 2,101 hearers; Labrador, 4 stations, 29 missionaries, 1,390 hearers; North America, 5 stations, 15 missionaries, 491 hearers; Danish India, 8 stations, 27 missionaries, 10,224 hearers; Jamaica, 18 stations, 34 missionaries, 12,800 hearers; Antigua, 7 stations, 22 missionaries, 8,008 hearers; St. Kitt's, 4 stations, 10 missionaries, 3,743 hearers; Barbadoes, 4 stations, 10 missionaries, 3,690 hearers; Tobago, 2 stations, 6 missionaries, 2,128 hearers; Mosquito Coast, 1 station, 6 missionaries, 53 hearers; Surinam, 8 stations, 55 missionaries, 19,519 hearers; South Africa, 8 stations, 54 missionaries, 6,595 hearers. All these stations were founded successively, from 1733 to 1853; that is to say, in a space of 120 years, during which this little Moravian Church has never allowed the missionary spirit to abate within her. The last station was established in 1853 among the Chinese of Mongolia; two missionaries set apart for this work are now staying on the Himalaya Mountains, with other of their brethren, so as to learn the language of the country. A large number of these 69 stations completely defray their own expenses, either by the labors of the missionaries, or by the contributions of the new Churches themselves. This immense machinery, it will be seen, is kept in motion with an expenditure of 9,000 thalers a year. It is not this world's riches that accomplishes these labors; the love of Jesus Christ suffices to inspire them.

DIFFERENT DAYS FOR WORSHIP.—By different nations, every day in the week is set apart for public worship; namely, Sunday by the Christians, Monday by the Grecians, Tuesday by the Persians, Wednesday by the Assyrians, Thursday by the Egyptians, Friday by the Turks, and Saturday by the Jews.

PERPETUAL SNOW IN THE ALPS.—The height of perpetual snow in the regions of the Alps, as deduced by observations made by M. Roret in the years 1851, 1853, and 1854, is thirty-four hundred meters, or seven hundred meters above the height stated in many works on physics and meteorology. A meter is thirty-nine and thirty-seven-hundredths inches, and thirty-four hundred meters make about ten thousand, five hundred feet.

TOMBS OF THE BRITISH POETS.—The burial-places of the most celebrated British poets are these: Chaucer, at Westminster Abbey; where also are the remains of Spenser, Cowley, Beaumont, Drayton, Dryden, Rowe, Addison, Prior, Congreve, Gay, Dr. Johnson, Sheridan, and Campbell. Shakspeare, it is well known, was buried at Stratford-upon-Avon; Shirley, at St. Giles's-in-the-Fields; Marlowe, at the Church of St. Paul, Deptford; Massinger and Fletcher, at St. Saviour's, Southwark; Dr. Donne, at Old St. Paul's; Edmund Waller, at Beaconsfield; Milton, in the church-yard of St. Giles, Cripplegate; Butler, at St. Paul's, Covent Garden; Pope, in Twickenham church-yard; Swift, in St. Patrick's, Dublin; Savage, at St. Peter's, Bristol; Farnell, at Chester; Dr. Young, at Welwyn, Herts; Thomson, at Richmond, Surrey; Gray, at Stoke Pogis; Collins, at St. Andrew's Church, at Chichester; Goldsmith, in the church-yard of the Temple Church; Churchill, in the church-yard of St. Martin's, Dover; Kirke White, at All-Saints, Cambridge; Cowper, at Dereham; Chatterton, in a church-yard belonging to St. Andrew's, Holborn; Burns, at St. Michael's, Dumfries; Byron, in the church-yard of Hucknall, near Newstead; Crabbe, at Trowbridge; Coleridge, in the church at Highgate; Sir Walter Scott, at Dryburg Abbey; Southey, in Crosshwaite church, in Keswick; and Shelly and Keats, side by side, near the tomb of Cestius, at Rome.

PULSE-RECORDING MACHINE.—A German professor by the name of Bierordt, and residing at Frankfurt, has recently invented a machine to record the beatings of the human pulse. The arm of the patient is placed in a longitudinal cradle, and screwed down sufficiently to keep it steady. A small erection on one side holds a sort of lever worked on a hinge, at the end of which a pencil is inserted, the point of which has been dipped in Indian ink. This goes into a cylinder upon which paper has been stretched. The lever rests upon the pulse, and at every movement records the action upon the paper. If the pulse is steady a regular zigzag line is drawn on the paper; but in cases where the pulse is rapid and jerking, the line goes up and down, making long and uneven marks.

JAPANESE INTELLIGENCE.—In a recent sitting of the Natural History Society of Bonn, M. Von Siebold, an eminent naturalist, read an interesting paper "on the state of the natural sciences among the Japanese." Their knowledge of these sciences is much more extensive and profound than is supposed in Western Europe. They possess a great many learned treatises thereupon, and an admirable geological map of their island by Buntajo. They are well acquainted with the systems of European naturalists, and have translations of the more important of their works. They have a botanical dictionary, in which an account is given of not fewer than 5,300 objects, and it is embellished with a vast number of well-executed engravings. The flora of Japan is described in a work by the imperial physician Pasuragawa.

LIGHT UNDER WATER.—Want of light, often a detriment to diving operations, is now likely to be remedied by a happy application of the electric light. The apparatus, for use under water, consists of a glass cylinder, fitted with a lens emitting parallel rays, and inside with the requisite appliances; the whole hermetically closed, and of sufficient strength to bear the pressure at a depth of two hundred feet. It is not heavy, and can be easily carried in the hand from place to place, without disturbing its connection by wires with the battery. When it is to be lighted, the diver turns a fine screw, which brings the coke points near each other; they immediately become incandescent, and give out for two hours a steady light, powerful enough to illuminate a circle of forty feet radius. One of the public baths on the Seine, France, is illuminated by a light fixed thirty feet above the water, in connection with Deleuil's apparatus—a Fresnel lens; and the effect is such, that a swimmer can be seen ten feet below the surface.

THE NEW YORK PRESS.—Of 119 newspapers published in New York city, only 24, or one-fifth, are professedly religious; while of the remainder, 7 desecrate the Sabbath by appearing on that day, 7 are the organs of German infidelity and Rationalism, and 8 of Popery. Of 24 periodicals and magazines issued, only 26 are religious.

NEW BOOKS.

HARPER'S STATISTICAL GAZETTEER. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1855. Royal 8vo. Pp. 1,932.—We have not space to notice this magnificent work as we could wish. A Gazetteer is indispensable in every family library; and this is unquestionably the most complete and authentic work of the kind to be had in the country. The Harpers are beginning to develop their old energy. Success to them. For sale by H. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

ORATORS AND STATESMEN. By D. A. Harsha. New York: Charles Scribner. 1855. 8vo. 517 pp.—This work contains sketches of the lives, specimens of the eloquence, and estimates of the genius of Demosthenes, Cicero, Chatham, Burke, Grattan, Fox, Erskine, Curran, Sheridan, Pitt, Canning, Brougham, Henry, Ames, Clay, Calhoun, Webster, and Everett. Mr. Harsha is quite appreciative of his subjects; but having selected such subjects as are found in his noble list, how could he be otherwise? Adulation becomes a virtue; panegyric a necessity. In reading these sketches, one would be impressed with the effort of the author to find terms that might fitly express the merit of his oratoric heroes. Yet the sketches are life-portraits, drawn with much discrimination and life; and the interspersing of illustrative anecdotes and specimens of eloquence is admirably done. On the whole, the volume is one of rare interest. Moore, Wiltach & Co., Cincinnati.

THE HARF OF DAVID is a charming little miniature volume, from the prolific pen of Rev. Daniel Wise; a most appropriate "present to my Christian friend." For sale in the Methodist bookstores generally.

THE MIND OF JESUS is an excellent production by the author of "Morning and Night Watches." The series produced by this anonymous author ranks among the choicest sentimental and instructive religious productions of the age. They are republished by Carter & Brothers, of New York; and on sale by Moore, Wiltach & Co., Cincinnati.

PRACTICAL LANDSCAPE GARDENING, with reference to the Improvement of Rural Residences, giving the General Principles of the Art; with full directions for planting shade-trees, shrubbery, and flowers, and laying out grounds.—The above is the full title of a work issued in splendid style from the press of Moore, Wiltach & Co., of Cincinnati. Its author—Mr. G. M. Kern—is a practical gardener of high scientific acquirements, so far as relates to his peculiar department, and also of much experience. We thank God that the love of the beautiful in nature is so rapidly developing among us; and that shade and fruit-trees, as well as shrubbery and flowers, are beginning to be considered as things indispensable to a country home. The excellent manual before us will not only promote a fuller development of that feeling, but will be an indispensable guide to the attainment of the object. It should be in the hands of every intelligent farmer in the country.

In quite a sturdy square 16mo., the Harpers have issued Volume I of their new series of story-books. It embraces a series of narratives, dialogues, biographies, and tales for the instruction and treatment of the young. This volume contains: "Bruno, or Lessons of Fidelity, Patience, and Self-Denial taught by a Dog;" "Willie and the Mortgage, showing how much may be accomplished by a boy;" and "The Strait Gate, or the Rule of Exclusion from Heaven." The work is finely got up and illustrated. It is worthy of an immense circulation, and we think will hardly fail to attain it. For sale by M. W. Derby, Cincinnati.

THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL. By the Author of "Morning and Night Watches." New York: Carter & Brothers. Cincinnati: Moore, Wiltach & Co. 1855. 12mo. 416 pp.—The Christian will find food for the soul, and the Bible student instruction in this volume. It is no mean compliment to say, that the author has added fresh interest to this well-worn subject. Though much had been said before, he proves that something was still left for him to say.

THE MINISTER'S FAMILY. By Rev. W. M. Hetherington, LL. D. New York: Carter & Brothers. 1855. 12mo. 304

PERIODICALS AND PAMPHLETS.

THE TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH makes an octavo pamphlet of one hundred and eighty-eight pages. Receipts for the year 1854, $277,077.23; disbursements, $241,794.06. The missions shared in the disbursements as follows: the African, $37,000; foreign German, $28,000; Oregon and California, $3,776; China, $3,000; New Mexico, $1,000; Buenos Ayres, $2,900; home work, including missions to the foreign population, $143,800. In the domestic work there are 600 missionaries and 54,218 members; in the Indian, 10 missionaries and 871 members; in the missions to seamen, 6 missionaries and 861 members; among the foreign population in this country, 220 missionaries and 13,373 members; in foreign stations, 81 missionaries and 1,995 members. In addition to this, there are 145 local preachers, 35 teachers, 17 assistants, 6 interpreters, and 825 scholars.

THE PROMPTER is the title of a new serial commenced by the enterprising editor of the Sunday School Union, and of which numbers one and three have been received. It is designed to encourage, stimulate, and direct efforts at self-improvement. Success to it!

Notes and Queries.

WHY NOT THE SALTNESS OF SEA-WATER?—"Can you tell me, Mr. Editor, why it is that the water of the great oceans and of some seas is salt? and, also, why some lakes are not salt? I have asked sundry individuals, but am in the dark somewhat yet."

Answer.—In his "Physical Geography of the Sea," recently published, Lieutenant Maury has the following: "Rivers which are constantly flowing into the ocean contain salts, varying from ten to fifty, and even one hundred grains per gallon. They are chiefly common salt, sulphate and carbonate of lime, magnesia, soda, potash, and iron; and these are found to constitute the distinguishing characteristics of sea-water. The water which evaporates from the sea is nearly pure, containing but very minute traces of salts. Falling as rain upon the land, it washes the soil, percolates through the rocky layers, and becomes charged with saline substances, which are borne seaward by the returning currents. The ocean, therefore, is the great depository of every thing that water can dissolve, and carry down from the surface of the continents; and as there is no channel for their escape, they, of course, accumulate. Lakes without any outlet, except evaporation, are invariably salt lakes; and it is curious to observe that this condition or saltiness disappears when an artificial outlet is produced for the waters."

A CURIOUS EPIGRAPH.—This epigraph is said to have been taken from a tombstone in Germany, and was published, some years ago, in the London Times:

O quid tua te be bis bla abit ra ra ra et in ram ram ram
Mox eris quod ego nunc

A lady correspondent of the New York Observer gives the following solution and translation of it:

SOLUTION.

O superbe, quid superbis! tua superbia, te superabit.
Ter-ra es, et in ter-ram i-bis
Mox eris quod ego nunc.

TRANSLATION.

O man of pride! why dost thou boast?
Thy pride will surely vanquish thee:
For thou art dust—shalt go to dust,
And what I'm now, thou soon shalt be.

The English reader will observe that the word super means above, ter thrice, and bis twice. The O is above the word be, quid above bis, tua above bla, and te above abit; ra is repeated thrice, ram thrice, and i twice. "O superbe" signifies, O proud man; "superbis," why do you vaunt or boast; "superbia," pride; and "superabit," will overcome, subdue, or vanquish; "terra" means earth or dust; "in terram," into dust; and "tibi" signifies you will go.

HALCYON DAYS—WHAT ARE THEY?—The halcyon was the ancient name of the kingfisher, which was falsely said to lay its eggs in the sea during the calm weather, about the winter solstice. Hence came the proverbial expression "halcyon days," denoting the seven days before and as many after the winter solstice, when the weather was calm. Sir Thomas Brown, in his "Vulgar Errors," volume two, page 433, makes the following remark: "All creatures know not only the means, but the times of their preservation; and, therefore, the halcyon, knowing that at winter solstice there is such a calm, chooses that time to hatch his young, as the crows did in 1652, when the mildness of January was such that they, supposing the spring was coming on, did build their nests, and, as I was credibly informed, some did hatch their brood."

BEAVER HATS.—"Can you tell me, Mr. Editor, the origin of the word beaver as applied to hats? Is it derived from the animal of the same name, the fur of which is used in the manufacture of them? CRITICUS."

Answer.—Etymologists tell us that beaver is derived from the Italian word bevere, to drink; and the appellation is said to have had its origin in the practice followed by the knights formerly of converting the helmet into a drinking vessel, when more suitable cups were not at hand. Our English word beverage is also said to be from the same Italian root. We will not, however, vouch for the correctness of the views of the etymologists in this case.

QUERY.—"If we pronounce been as though it was spelled bin, why not pronounce seen as though it was spelled sin? Please answer, or request some of your literary correspondents to do so." [Will some of our critics relieve us of this job?—EDITOR.]

WINDFALL.—The origin of this term is said to be the following: Some of the nobility of England, by the tenure of their estates, were forbidden felling any of the trees in the forests upon them, the timber being reserved for the use of the royal navy. Such trees as fell without cutting were the property of the occupant. A tornado was, therefore, a perfect godsend, in every sense of the term, to those who had occupancy of extensive forests; and the wind/fall was sometimes of very great value.

Mirror of Apothegm, Wit, Repartee, and Anecdote.

A D. D. UPSET.—When Dr. Beecher was President of Lane Seminary, he had a carriage and a white horse, and could be seen very frequently making his journeys from Walnut Hills to Cincinnati and back again. One dark night, as he was driving home with his wife and daughter—Mrs. H. B. Stowe—in the carriage, the party were upset over a bank about fifteen feet high. They had no sooner extricated themselves from the wreck than Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Stowe, who were unhurt, returned thanks for their providential escape. "Speak for yourselves," said the Doctor, who was feeling his bruises; "I have had a good many bumps any how."

PARTICULAR AND GENERAL SINS.—James Russell Lowell, who was a short time since elected to a professorship in Harvard University, enjoys a reputation for satire as well as solemnity in verse. Here is a capital hit from him at a certain class of men altogether too abundant in community:

"I'm willin' a man should go tollable strong
Agin wrong in the abstract, for that kind of wrong
Is allers unpoplar an' never gets pitied,
Because it's a crime no one ever committed;
But he mustn't be hard on partiklar sins,
Cos then he'll be kickin' the people's own shins."

THE BOY WHAT GOD MADE.—An instructor of some extremely ignorant children was desirous that they should make a good appearance before visitors who were expected. She, therefore, placed them in a row, and taught them by rote the answers to a few questions, so assorting them that each one could answer correctly only the interrogatory that was addressed to himself. Time did not admit of any thing more, and she supposed them sufficiently drilled for the occasion. The questions were simple and direct, beginning with "Who made you?" "Of what were you made?" etc.

The company arrived. The class was marshaled. The first question was put, and the reply given at the top of the voice:

"Out of the dust of the earth."

Observing the teacher's disconcerted look, the boy hastened to explain.

"Ma'am! ma'am! I'm the second boy, and was to say, 'Out of the dust of the earth.' The boy what God made an't here. He warn't well, he said, and so run'd home."

GOOD-NIGHT, MOTHER.—Death came for a fair, little one. He struggled with pain, and then grew still. He noticed little that passed around him, and his lisping voice seemed hushed forever. At length, opening his large eyes for the last time, and probably receiving no light, he said, in the sweetest cadence:

"Good-night, mother!"

Once more—when pulsation had ceased, and it would seem as if the pure spirit were gone—there was a faint murmur, scarcely stirring the white lips:

"Mother! mother! good-night."

Will not their next greeting be the "good-morning" of heaven?

TWO MOTHERS IN HEAVEN.—A second mother was introduced to her new home. Earnest desires to fill wisely this responsible station, especially as regarded the one little child committed to her care, inspired her heart, and gave life to her prayers. He was an intelligent boy, full of thought and love. He drew near to the new friend who sought his welfare, for there was none to sow prejudice in his innocent mind.

She was once speaking to him of that happy world, where the good are gathered. He had been accustomed to hear it mentioned as the home of his departed mother.

"What will we do when we get up there?" said the sweet disciple. "I shall want to be with that ma some, and with you some."

Then musing a moment, he seemed to find a happy thought as a solution of the difficulty, and asked, with a radiant smile:

"Can't we all sit up close together?"

AN ARITHMETICAL OPERATION.—In "Smith's Federal Calculator" an amusing anecdote is given, to the following purport: A first-rate class was undergoing a close examination in mental arithmetic, and in reply to a question concerning the number of men required to perform a certain piece of work in a specified time, the class responded, "Twelve men and two-thirds." But one bright fellow, more discerning than the others, instantly added, "Twelve men and a boy fourteen years old," fourteen being the two-thirds of twenty-one, the legal age of manhood. A student of decided "parts," that!

A DIFFERENCE.—In ancient days the celebrated precept was, "Know thyself;" in modern times it has been supplanted by the far more fashionable maxim, "Know thy neighbor, and every thing about him."

THE TEACHER STUMPED.—It happened in a school-room one day, while a class of boys and girls were reciting a lesson in arithmetic. It was about their first lesson.

"Five from five leaves how many?" asked the teacher of a little girl of some six years of age.

After a moment's reflection, she answered, "Five."

"How do you make that out?" said the teacher.

Holding her two hands out to him, she said, "Here are five fingers on my right hand, and five on my other. Now, if I take the fingers on my right hand away from the fingers on my left hand, won't five remain?"

The teacher was "stumped," and obliged to "knock under."

MEMORANDA OF AN ACCOMPLISHED YOUNG LADY.—The Buffalo Republic says, "We recently picked up the following memoranda, which we saw dropped by a young lady attired in an embroidered velvet Talma, an exquisite Honiton lace collar, a white hat and plume, and a painfully brilliant silk dress, with exaggerated flounces:

"I must get a—Vail, Broun hoes, Sarceknet, Laize,
Glufs, Shimmyzet,
Kulons."

"We confess we were startled at the last item, but think it means cologne. The whole simply proves that wealth and intellect do not always hunt in couples."

POLITENESS.—An officer in battle happening to bow, a cannon-ball passed over his head, and took off the head of the soldier who stood behind him. "You see that a man never loses by politeness," said he.

Editor's Table.

OTWAY CURRY.—The beautiful tribute to Otway Curry in this number was designed for our April issue, but was not received in time. In the death of Mr. Curry one of the bright literary stars of the west passed away from our horizon. He had been for many years a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and his Christian probity, as well as gentlemanly demeanor, won for him the confidence and respect of all who knew him. His dying language was, "I know in whom I have believed." He died at Marysville, O., February 15, 1855, aged fifty-one years. He was a lawyer by profession, had been repeatedly a member of the state Legislature, and was for some time editor of the Scioto Gazette, one of the oldest and best-established papers in the state. In former years he has contributed some beautiful poetic gems for the Ladies' Repository, as well as several prose articles of sterling value. One of the former may be found on the "Excelsior" page of the October number, for 1848, and another on the "Excelsior" page of the December number for the same year. There are few poems of equal sweetness, depth, and power in the English language. It is so appropriate to this occasion, and will be new to so many of our readers, that we insert the latter:

THE GREAT HEREAFTER.

'Tis sweet to think, when struggling
The goal of life to win,
That just beyond the shores of time
The better years begin.

When through the nameless ages
I cast my longing eyes,
Before me, like a boundless sea,
The Great Hereafter lies.

Along its brimming bosom
Perpetual summer smiles,
And gathers, like a golden robe,
Around the emerald isles.

There in the blue long distance,
By lulling breezes fanned,
I seem to see the flowering groves
Of old Beulah's land.

And far beyond the islands
That gem the waves serene
The image of the cloudless shore
Of holy heaven is seen.

Unto the Great Hereafter—
Aforetime dim and dark—
I freely now and gladly give
Of life the wandering bark.

And in the far-off haven,
When shadowy seas are passed,
By angel hands its quivering sails
Shall all be furled at last.

GHOST STORIES.—Alice Cary closes in this number a series of articles under the above title. A few have, perhaps, been scared from the reading of them by the "ghost" title. All that is very natural. There are some people who are always imagining there are "ghosts" where there are none, and thus get frightened out of their propriety at a shadow. These articles, by the way, we think, are admirably calculated to rectify many foolish errors, and at the same time they inculcate many useful lessons.

VIEW OF BUFFALO.—Buffalo occupies a commanding position in Western New York, and is a place of great commercial importance. It is situated at the mouth of Buffalo creek, upon the shore of Lake Erie, and is connected with the Hudson river and New York city by the Erie canal and the Central railroad. Though laid out by the Holland Land Company as early as 1801, it was a place of little importance till 1825, when the completion of the Erie canal gave it an impulse under which it has grown up to be a city of 75,000 inhabitants, with real and personal estate valued at over $27,000,000. Its commerce for a lake port is immense—amounting in the year 1853 to nearly $369,000,000, and the number of arrivals and clearances from the port were no less than 8,298. Between seventy and eighty steamers are owned in the city, and about one hundred and fifty-four sail vessels. The only harbor of which Buffalo can boast is the little creek represented in the foreground, which skirts the southern part of the city, and empties through a confined channel into the Lake. The ground on which the city stands rises gradually to the height of fifty feet above the Lake, and then spreads out into an extended plain. The city is well laid out—the streets for the most part crossing each other at right angles. Main-street is one hundred feet in width, and extends four miles. On the extreme right a train may be seen approaching the depot of the Central railroad; near the western part of the city may be seen the train starting for Niagara Falls; still lower down appears the canal; and in the extreme left we have a view of the Lake shore stretching toward the outlet, which is by the Niagara river.

"THE DEAD ROBIN" introduces us to a domestic scene. The little girl has picked up the dead bird, and, with a heart full of sympathy and sorrow, runs with it to the mother. Her little brother most deeply partakes of her sorrow and sympathy, as his countenance clearly shows. We almost hear the mother exclaim, as she raises her hand, "Poor thing! where did you find it?" Innocence and sympathy are beautiful and inseparable. "Tower"—why is it that we always associate different names with dogs of different appearances?—don't take the matter quite so gravely; he evidently looks upon the whole thing as a rather pleasant "business transaction."

CORRESPONDENTS AND ARTICLES DECLINED.—We are obliged to omit this list for the present month; but our correspondents will hear from us after awhile.

Will the author of the "Soliloquy of a Poor Student" favor us with his address?

EXCERPTA FROM CORRESPONDENCE.—Few of our engravings have spoken more directly to the hearts of thousands than "The Mother's Dream" in the December number of the last volume. Among the many testimonials of its power we have received is the following:

"When the December number of the Ladies' Repository came my little daughter was afflicted with a very sore eye. She was pleased with the 'Mother's Dream;' would point and say, 'Poor baby sick;' 'Got a sore eye, baby?' 'Mamma's sleep;' etc. But I did not see its true beauty till the 'angel' came and took her; then I felt and could realize what it all meant. I now keep it with her miniature, and look at it as often. It helps me to believe that she is in heaven, and it is only the beautiful casket that we have laid in the grave."

We are pleased to receive from a literary friend the following notes upon Mrs. Sigourney's writings. They were written before our articles appeared, and strongly corroborate our estimate, and, at the same time, give definite information concerning the nature and objects of several of her works which may be of service to many of our lady readers:

"Though Mrs. Sigourney is undoubtedly a writer from the impulse of genius, yet that element of power, so often allied to ambition or waywardness, has, in her case, been remarkably subjected to the claims of utility, benevolence, and piety. It is interesting to see how her half a hundred volumes have touched almost every grade and condition of human life, especially the routine of duty that devolves upon her own sex.

"In the 'Child's Book,' and some other eight or ten juvenile works, she gives a gentle, guarding hand to the new-born stranger; the 'Girl's Book' and 'Boy's Book' were assistants in the home education of her own children; 'Letters to Young Ladies' unfold the important bearings of life's blossoming season; 'Letters to Pupils' and 'Whispers to a Bride' contemplate still more definite responsibilities; 'Letters to Mothers' reach the climax of womanly duty and happiness; and 'Past Meridian' girds the pilgrim who journeys toward the gates of the west.

"Some fifteen years since, when those elegant illustrated annuals were new and popular favorites, she believed she saw in them a channel for salutary sentiment among the more refined circles of her country, and consented to become the editor of two volumes of the 'Religious Souvenir,' replete with high and hallowed literature—writing herself as many articles, and probably devoting more time and labor, than if all their pages had been filled by her own pen.

"The traveler in foreign climes finds a companion in her 'Pleasant Memories,' and the patriot in 'Scenes of my Native Land;' the 'Voice of Flowers' charms the lover of nature; the 'Weeping Willow' sympathizes with the mourner; 'Water-Drops' flow in the cause of temperance; 'Olive Leaves' wave with the breath of peace; the neglected mariner is remembered in 'Poems for the Sea;' the joyous parent by the cradle side reads her 'Sayings of the Little Ones;' and the weeper at the grave is soothed by her 'Faded Hope.'

"In all her variety of poems, biographies, tales, and miscellanies, more than twenty volumes of which are in active circulation here, as well as on the other side of the ocean, the object is evidently not to shine, but to do good; not to win fame, but to cultivate the affections, and impress those lessons on the heart that fit for Christian duty in this life, and a blessed acceptance in the next."

MISCELLANY.—Dr. Morrison and the Child.—When Dr. Morrison was on his way from England to China, he visited New York, and called on an old friend there. This friend received him gladly, and not having expected him, and a bed not being ready, gave up his own bed to him. Beside this bed was a crib, in which a little girl, the daughter of the Doctor's friend, slept; and she being in bed when the Doctor came, was left undisturbed. Early in the morning the little girl awoke, and, as usual, turned herself round toward her parents' bed; but, to her great surprise and terror, she saw, instead of her own dear mother, a strange man in the bed, with his eyes fixed upon her. The little girl raised herself up in the crib, and looking the Doctor hard in the face, said, "Man, do you pray?" Dr. Morrison immediately answered, "Yes, my dear child. I pray to God every day of my life; he is my best friend." Satisfied that all was well, since the stranger was a man of prayer, she turned around and fell asleep again. Was not the little girl right in trusting herself near even a strange man who loved and feared God, and prayed to him every day?

A Graceful Compliment.—It was a judicious resolution of a father, as well as a most pleasing compliment to his wife, when, on being asked what he intended to do with his girls, he replied, "I intend to apprentice them all to their excellent mother, that they may learn the art of improving time, and be fitted to become, like her, wives, mothers, and heads of families, and useful members of society."

The Money or the Man; or, the Choice of Themistocles.—The daughter of Themistocles being courted by one of little wit and great wealth, and another of little wealth and great goodness, he chose the poor man for his son-in-law. "For," said he, "I will rather have a man without money, than money without a man, reckoning that not money, but worth makes the man."

STRAY GEMS.—The Life Struggle.—Stop not, loiter not, look not backward, if you would be among the foremost! The great Now, so quick, so broad, so fleeting, is yours; in an hour it will belong to the eternity of the Past. The temper of Life is to be made good by big, honest blows; stop striking, and you will do nothing; strike feebly, and you will do almost as little. Success rides on every hour; grapple it, and you may win; but without a grapple, it will never go with you. Work is the weapon of honor, and who lacks the weapon will never triumph.—Reveries of a Bachelor.

Truth, Charity, Wisdom.—A Christian in all his ways must have three guides—truth, charity, wisdom. Truth, to go before him; charity and wisdom, on either hand. If any of the three be absent, he walks amiss. I have seen some do hurt by following a truth uncharitably; and others, while they would save up an error with love, have failed in their wisdom, and offended against justice. A charitable untruth, and an uncharitable truth, and an unwise managing of truth or love, are all to be carefully avoided of him that would go with a right foot in the narrow way.—Bishop Hall.

One Side of the World.—Constant success shows us but one side of the world. For as it surrounds us with friends who tell us only of our merits, so it silences our enemies, from whom we alone can learn our defects.

A Beautiful Thought.—A shepherd lost a sheep with its lamb. He went in pursuit of them. He found them far off in a lonely valley. He tried to drive them home, but was not able. At length he picked up and carried off the lamb, and the mother followed. Thus the Savior brings a mother to himself, by taking away the little child from her bosom.

How We should Live.—So live with men as considering always that God sees thee; so pray to God as if every man heard thee. Do nothing which thou wouldst not have God see done. Desire nothing which may either wrong thy profession to ask, or God's honor to grant.

Begin Early.—It is better to throw a guard about the baby's cradle than to sing a psalm at a bad man's death-bed; better to have care while the bud is bursting to the sun than when the heat has scorched the heart of the unguarded bosom.

THEY ARE THE ONLY TWO LEFT IN THE WORLD.

GERALD MASSEY, THE CHARTIST POET.

BY REV. D. CUNRY, D. D.

LIKE all the other productions of genius, and like genius itself, poetry is exceedingly capricious both as to the times and the conditions of its growth. Sometimes it seems to linger only along the borders of a nascent civilization; at another time it soars boldly upward in the noontide radiance of an Augustan age; and again it gives forth its mellow cadences among the fading beauties of an effete and decaying refinement. In their personal favoritisms, also, the Muses are equally capricious. That they often bestow their favors most bountifully where Fortune has been most parsimonious, is true to a proverb; and yet it is certain that the genuine poetic inspiration has occasionally manifested itself where the hard hand of adversity has never prepared its way. But though the Muses do sometimes sing in the bowers of pleasure and recline on the lap of luxury, it is nevertheless quite evident that ease and excessive refinement are unfriendly to the growth and exercise of the true poetic spirit.

The love of poetry is among the universal susceptibilities of our nature—the want of it indicates either the absence of culture or an abnormal condition of the mind. So likewise most persons have at some period of their history offered an oblation at the shrine of the Muses, in the form of an attempt at poetizing. A large portion of our race only breathe out their offerings in words that perish with the uttering; and the productions of another portion are written like lines upon the sands, to be swept away by the passing breeze. But a persistent effort to achieve a poet's renown implies, as an essential condition, that he who makes it shall have less taste than genius. It is no matter how small a share of genius he may possess, if it be relatively greater than his taste, he will most probably set himself up for a poet, and unlearn his mistake only by the public verdict against him. Doubtless a too severe critical judgment—a taste that could not tolerate mediocrity—has often stifled in its birth what might have grown to be exquisite fruits of true genius.

Much has been said and written about the injustice of critics and the severity of criticism; but what would literature be without them? True criticism is both a liberal and a useful art. It is liberal and refined, for only cultivated minds can exercise it, and such will always appreciate true merit. But it is especially useful since its province is to detect and destroy—or, rather, doom to destruction—the prolific broods that false tastes and uncultivated or feeble geniuses send out upon the world of letters. It is the winnowing fan that separates the wheat from the chaff—the mercury which gathers up the grains of pure gold found in the mass of base materials, but rejects all else.

We ran off into the above train of reflections and remarks upon sitting down to write a notice and critique of a volume of poems of recent date, which we deemed worthy of a passing word. "There is a new poet," exclaimed a friend of ours, whose lively appreciation of true excellence is only equaled by the heartiness of his disgust against inanity and false taste, as we entered his office, and sat down among his books and papers. Had he said a new planet or a new law of physics, the announcement might have been passed over without attention; but a new poet is, indeed, a rare bird, and must be attended to. Our friend then produced a paper-covered octodecimo volume, from which he proceeded to recite some specimens of verses that evidently contained sparks of the true poetic fire, and forcibly suggested thoughts of Shakespeare and Burns.

That volume was an English copy—it had not yet been published in this country—of “Poems and Ballads, by GERALD MASSEY.” A few months later it was republished by J. C. Derby, of New York, “with several new poems never before published.” From a copy of this issue we derive most that we are now about to write about both the author and the book. In its American dress the plain little volume has become a very respectable book, having grown in size to a fair duodecimo, of fine paper, with clear typography and broad margins, and clothed in a neat muslin covering. But the reader will, perhaps, desire to know something more of this new son of song, as well as of his productions—a desire that we will proceed to gratify.

GERALD MASSEY is the son of a canal-boatman of Herts, England; born in May, 1828, and is, therefore, now twenty-seven years old. The place of his nativity was a stone hut, in the hamlet of Tring, and rented at a shilling a week; the roof of which—it had no ceiling—was so low that a man could not stand erect in it. Like most of his countrymen of the same social condition, the elder Massey was without education, being unable to write his name. The son enjoyed but little better opportunities than had been afforded to his father—though a penny school in the neighborhood afforded the least possible advantages to those who could indulge their children in so great luxury as the knowledge of letters. But this could be enjoyed only so long as the child was yet too young to be capable of being put to service. At eight years old young Massey went to the silk mill, where he worked his twelve hours daily—seeing the sun or the green earth only by stealthy glances through the factory windows, and breathing the oily vapors and confined air of his prison, while his ears were perpetually stunned with the din of machinery; and in return received a shilling per week. The burning of the factory—over which he rejoiced like some time-worn prisoner at the destruction of the Bastile—only transferred him to another form of labor—straw-platting—equally toilsome, and even more unwholesome. For three years he suffered beyond account from alternate chills and fevers, which at length settled into the form of a tertian ague. With his own bold hand this nursing of misery has sketched the state of things in which he spent his early days—childhood it may not be termed—and pointed out their fearful moral tendencies:

“Ever since I can remember,” he writes of himself, “I have had the aching fear of want throbbing heart and brow. The currents of my life were early poisoned, and few, methinks, would have passed unscathed through the scenes and circumstances in which I have lived; none, if they were as curious and precocious as I was. The child comes into the world like a new coin with the stamp of God upon it; and in like manner as Jews sweat down sovereigns, by hustling them in a bag to get gold dust out of them, so is the poor man's child hustled and sweated down in this bag of society to get wealth out of it; and even as the impress of the Queen is effaced by the Jewish process, so is the image of God worn from the heart and brow, and, day by day, the child recedes devil-ward. I look back now with wonder, not that so few escape, but that any escape at all, to win a nobler growth for their humanity. So blighting are the influences which surround thousands in early life, to which I can bear such bitter testimony.”

But bad as was this state of things, its difficulties were braved and partially overcome chiefly by the aid of the unconquerable spirit of his MOTHER. She saw to it, that while her children were yet too young to begin the drudgery of infantile labor, they should enjoy the slender advantages of the penny school till they learned to read their mother-tongue. This constituted the whole of Gerald Massey's school-training; and this sufficed to open to him the gates of knowledge, into which he felt an irrepressible desire to enter. The BIBLE and BUNYAN—what better could have been chosen?—were at first his whole library: with the contents of the first he stored his tenacious memory, while the other was devoured as a veritable and most wonderful history. Then came Robinson Crusoe, the counterpart of the latter; while some Wesleyan tracts served to give point and energy to the lessons of the former.

At fifteen years old he left his native hamlet, and came up to London, that great receptacle and consumer of all that the country produces—men not excepted—to serve as an errand-boy. Here a new world burst upon his astonished vision, and new facilities for the acquisition of knowledge were multiplied upon his hands. Books were now readily obtained and greedily devoured by him; and he confessed that while in the fruition of his newly attained pleasures he first conceived the notion that life might become a scene of real pleasurable enjoyment—hitherto it had been only a struggle with want and wretchedness.

But this happy state of affairs was of but short continuance. If it is true generally that “man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward,” that truth is greatly intensified when applied to the race of verse-mongers, among whom, however, young Massey had not yet aspired to a place. Probably he was from the beginning of a poetic temperament. He says of himself, "I always loved the birds and flowers, the woods and the stars; I felt delight in being alone in a summer-wood, with song, like a spirit in the trees, and the golden sunbursts glinting through the verdurous roof; and was conscious of a mysterious creeping of the blood, and tingling of the nerves, when standing alone in the starry midnight, as in God's own presence-chamber." This, indeed, has something of the sound of the material of which poetry is made; but in this case it was not yet "married to immortal verse." The "poet-born" had not yet learned the language of his species; but an occasion soon occurred that opened his mouth, and gave utterance to the spirit that stirred within him.

The Muses are not the only divinities whose attentions are devoted to the children of poverty no less than to the silken sons of luxury. Especially does the winged archer-boy delight to try his powers upon the susceptible hearts of coarsely clad youth and of uncomely and toiling maidens. What youthful heart was ever so toil-pressed and poverty stricken as to escape the soft intrusion of the tender passion? Had such a thing been possible, one would have said that the subject of the sketch given above must have been reduced below the point of amorous susceptibility; and yet, strange to say, the boy Gerald Massey fell in love. With the awakening of the tender passion in him came also a disposition to rhyming, and verse-making became almost his mania. Association often operates by contrast, and accordingly the first lisps of the newly awakened spirit in this foster-child of despair was devoted to hope. That there was crudeness both of thought and language in his first utterings may be presumed—how could it be otherwise?—yet they found their way to the public through the columns of a country newspaper, and at length in a collected form, in a shilling volume, issued and circulated in his native town. These were his earliest exercises—useful, indeed, yet not by their intrinsic worth, but like the school-boy's copy-book on which his hand is disciplined to more excellent performances. The influence of the impression then made is plainly traceable in his more matured productions, many of which are of an amative character.

But other influences were also at work giving shape and direction to his mind and thoughts. The petty tyrannies to which he was constantly a victim awakened in him a spirit of resistance, which at length became the settled habit of his mind. Among the books which fell accidentally in his way, and were devoured without discrimination, were the political writings of Paine, Volney, and Louis Blanc; and, as a natural consequence, his mind became soured on account of his hard fate, and his wrath awakened against the existing state of society as the cause of the evils he suffered. This drift of his mind gave a new character to his poetical effusions, and Massey became the poet of the low and discontented poor, ranking in the very same class with Tom Hood and Barry Cornwall.

Before he had arrived at man's estate he had become deeply involved in political discussions. "Full of new thoughts," continues the sketch from which we derive most of the facts we are stating, "and bursting with aspirations of freedom, he started, in April, 1849, a cheap journal, written entirely by working men, entitled, 'The Spirit of Freedom;' it was full of fiery earnestness, and half of its contents were written by himself. It cost him five situations during the period of eleven months—twice because he was detected burning candles far on into the night, and three times because of the tone of the opinions to which he gave utterance. The French Revolution of 1848 having, among its other issues, kindled the zeal of the workmen of this country [England] in the cause of association, Gerald Massey eagerly joined them; and he has been recently instrumental in giving some impetus to that praiseworthy movement, the object of which is to permanently elevate the condition of the producing classes, by advancing them to the status of capitalists as well as laborers."

It is evident from some of his poems, though neither himself in his preface, nor the writer of the prefixed sketch, say nothing on the subject, that his early love affair resulted in marriage. This perhaps somewhat softened the asperities of his spirit, though it could not fail to increase the burdens of poverty and care. The scenes and events of wedded life are interwoven into his poetry and form the material of some of his best pieces. There are also indications in some of the later ones that his genius has wrought for him a better fortune than that to which he was born. It is to be hoped that he may escape from the misery he so forcibly describes and deprecates, and that the change of his condition may also exert a beneficial influence upon his character. Too often the advantages gained to the penniless foster-child of the Muses by the efforts of his genius have served only to spoil the

But this happy state of affairs was of but short continuance. If it is true generally that "man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward," that truth is greatly intensified when applied to the race of verse-mongers, among whom, however, young Massey had not yet aspired to a place. Probably he was from the beginning of a poetic temperament. He says of himself, "I always loved the birds and flowers, the woods and the stars; I felt delight in being alone in a summer-wood, with song, like a spirit in the trees, and the golden sunbursts glinting through the verdurous roof; and was conscious of a mysterious creeping of the blood, and tingling of the nerves, when standing alone in the starry midnight, as in God's own presence-chamber." This, indeed, has something of the sound of the material of which poetry is made; but in this case it was not yet "married to immortal verse." The "poet-born" had not yet learned the language of his species; but an occasion soon occurred that opened his mouth, and gave utterance to the spirit that stirred within him.

The Muses are not the only divinities whose attentions are devoted to the children of poverty no less than to the silken sons of luxury. Especially does the winged archer-boy delight to try his powers upon the susceptible hearts of coarsely clad youth and of uncomely and toiling maidens. What youthful heart was ever so toil-pressed and poverty stricken as to escape the soft intrusion of the tender passion? Had such a thing been possible, one would have said that the subject of the sketch given above must have been reduced below the point of amorous susceptibility; and yet, strange to say, the boy Gerald Massey fell in love. With the awakening of the tender passion in him came also a disposition to rhyming, and verse-making became almost his mania. Association often operates by contrasts, and accordingly the first lisplings of the newly awakened spirit in this foster-child of despair was devoted to hope. That there was crudeness both of thought and language in his first utterings may be presumed—how could it be otherwise?—yet they found their way to the public through the columns of a country newspaper, and at length in a collected form, in a shilling volume, issued and circulated in his native town. These were his earliest exercises—useful, indeed, yet not by their intrinsic worth, but like the school-boy's copy-book on which his hand is disciplined to more excellent performances. The influence of the impression then made is plainly traceable in his more matured productions, many of which are of an amative character.

But other influences were also at work giving shape and direction to his mind and thoughts. The petty tyrannies to which he was constantly a victim awakened in him a spirit of resistance, which at length became the settled habit of his mind. Among the books which fell accidentally in his way, and were devoured without discrimination, were the political writings of Paine, Volney, and Louis Blanc; and, as a natural consequence, his mind became soured on account of his hard fate, and his wrath awakened against the existing state of society as the cause of the evils he suffered. This drift of his mind gave a new character to his poetical effusions, and Massey became the poet of the low and discontented poor, ranking in the very same class with Tom Hood and Barry Cornwall.

Before he had arrived at man's estate he had become deeply involved in political discussions. "Full of new thoughts," continues the sketch from which we derive most of the facts we are stating, "and bursting with aspirations of freedom, he started, in April, 1849, a cheap journal, written entirely by working men, entitled, 'The Spirit of Freedom;' it was full of fiery earnestness, and half of its contents were written by himself. It cost him five situations during the period of eleven months—twice because he was detected burning candles far on into the night, and three times because of the tone of the opinions to which he gave utterance. The French Revolution of 1848 having, among its other issues, kindled the zeal of the workingmen of this country [England] in the cause of association, Gerald Massey eagerly joined them; and he has been recently instrumental in giving some impetus to that praiseworthy movement, the object of which is to permanently elevate the condition of the producing classes, by advancing them to the status of capitalists as well as laborers."

It is evident from some of his poems, though neither himself in his preface, nor the writer of the prefixed sketch, say nothing on the subject, that his early love affair resulted in marriage. This perhaps somewhat softened the asperities of his spirit, though it could not fail to increase the burdens of poverty and care. The scenes and events of wedded life are interwoven into his poetry and form the material of some of his best pieces. There are also indications in some of the later ones that his genius has wrought for him a better fortune than that to which he was born. It is to be hoped that he may escape from the misery he so forcibly describes and deprecates, and that the change of his condition may also exert a beneficial influence upon his character. Too often the advantages gained to the penniless foster-child of the Muses by the efforts of his genius have served only to spoil the eaten the accustomed luncheon that day, and the wife had been busy and earned what she had seldom had before—an appetite.

The next day came a new trial—some trifling articles must be bought, and Mr. Dexter must drive the small open carriage himself. "I will wear my morning dress and veil," said Mrs. Dexter, for she saw that her husband was mortified for her sake; so they set forth together. The sun shone brightly, and the fresh air and various shows of the streets and windows were so exhilarating in their effect, that Mrs. Dexter soon threw back her veil, quite regardless of the astonished looks of the ladies she might meet. It was a new sensation of delight to the husband to manage the horses, and both felt what superfluities coach and coachman had been. Affairs went on very well for a time; they felt as if rid of a great burden, and in earnest and hopeful labor experienced no depression and no pain. But so deeply involved were they that even another coming down must be made. Horses, and carriage, and house must be sold, and themselves be left with nothing in the world but their hearts and hands.

"My dear sweet wife, what can I say to comfort you?" said Mr. Dexter when he had made the confession of their extreme poverty. And he added, sighing and sinking down helplessly, "Things could not be worse than they are."

"I am glad to hear it," said Mrs. Dexter laughing outright; "for as nothing remains stationary in this world, our affairs must grow better from necessity."

"But, my dear, what can we do?" sorrowfully ejaculated the husband.

"Why," she replied, "begin to live, independent of burdens and restrictions. For my part, I just begin to see something to live for."

And drawing the easy chair to the fire, and placing the baby on his knee, she proposed to make for her husband a cup of tea and a piece of toast, in the hope of reviving his spirits.

There was no bread nor tea in the house, and, worse than all, no money. "Surely, then," said Mrs. Dexter, looking earnestly in the sad face of her husband, "there is no time to be lost;" and putting on shawl and bonnet she was presently gone from the house. When she returned, it was with a glow on her cheek that heightened her beauty far more than paint or powder had ever done. She had been selling her diamonds, and had brought home money enough to buy a cottage and ten acres of land within a few miles of the city where they had always lived.

A year went by, and as Mr. Dexter looked about his neat, well-ordered house, as he sat before the blazing hickory logs, a pitcher of cider and a basin of shining apples on the table beside, and saw his wife, in a pretty chintz, making the tea, and his boy, bright-eyed and healthy, rocking himself in the cradle with a look of pride that he was already able to do something for himself, he was surprised at his own happiness, and exclaimed, "Really, my dear, I should never have learned half your excellent qualities, and, consequently, never have loved you half so well, but for our coming down."

"Coming down, indeed!" she replied, and, putting down the smoking teapot, she wiped the happy tears from her eyes; "I was never so happy in my life. It is as if we had removed a great heap of rubbish, and had struck a vein of pure gold; for what were all our useless forms, all our servants and equipages, but so many obstacles in the way of our knowing each other? Then there was nothing that I could do for you—now I can do every thing;" and almost sobbing, she continued, "if you call this coming down, I thank God for it, for it has, in truth, been coming down to usefulness and happiness. With what our friends called misfortunes, we were the gainers every time. Was it not pleasanter to ride in the open carriage, to see what was about us, and feel the air and sunshine, than to be shut up in the old, lumbering coach? And then to walk, and have the advantage of exercise as well as air, was better still; and now to work, and so get air and exercise, and be useful at the same time, is best of all. One room darkened another when we had a great house; now the light and sunshine comes in all round. Our expensive furniture required careful keeping; so I had the care both of furniture and servants; now I can keep the little we require myself, and what was before wearisome is pleasure. I have no ceremonious calls to use the time which I can pass in friendly interchange of thought and feeling, with neighbors who come to see me, and not my house or my dress. Believe me, my husband, we have enough—a house to shelter us, and one that is withal tasteful and pretty, and ground that gives us bread and fruit, and water and flowers—all for a little work; and that is the blessedest of our provisions, for through no other means can we obtain rest."

"You are the best and noblest woman in the world," exclaimed the husband, interrupting her, "and but for you I should have come down in verity. Now I am convinced that, while we maintain honesty and self-respect, coming down is impossible."

It is sad to think of the great fine rooms, piled one over another, and darkening one against another—too costly for use, and too elegant for the free tread and merry laughter of inartificial joy—growing damp and moldy, and sending to the hearts of their inmates heaviness or stupidity, when we know they might be set up separately in bright green spots here and there, and make such little worlds of comforts. Pity it is that false notions of life, or, perhaps, the absence of any notions at all, are so enfeebling and degenerating our men and women! How shall I spend the time? and by what process shall I beat out my little gold so that it shall display the most glittering surface? are the first questions of the day.

THE GREAT SIEGE OF GIBRALTAR.

THE rock of Gibraltar, which among military men is regarded as the key to the Mediterranean, has been in the hands of the British for the period of one hundred and fifty years. It was in the year 1704 that the English, under Admiral Sir George Rooke, besieged and conquered it from the Spaniards, with the loss of about sixty killed and two hundred wounded. In the following year the Spaniards attempted to retake it, but in vain; they again attacked the fortress in 1727, when they lost three thousand men in an attempt equally futile. The great siege, however, which drew the attention of the whole world, owing to the magnitude of the operations carried on, and which by its result established the high reputation of the British as garrison soldiers, commenced in 1779, and endured till February, 1783.

The celebrated rock of Gibraltar—ancient Mons Calpe, one of the "pillars of Hercules"—forms a promontory connected with the continent by an isthmus of sand, and consists of a mass of gray limestone or marble, containing numerous caves, and about three miles in length, north to south, by from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in breadth; it rises abruptly to sixteen hundred feet above the sea, on all sides except the west, on which the town of Gibraltar is built. It is every-where fortified by works of amazing strength and extent; and besides these there are two galleries excavated in the rock, two miles in length, and of sufficient width to admit carriages; at its southern extremity—Europa Point—are a signal-house and a new light-house. Surface parched in dry weather, but after rain covered with vegetation. The town is built on the west side, which shelves down to the bay; and here the fortifications have latterly been greatly improved and strengthened. Population—excluding garrison—about sixteen thousand. The principal street is one mile in length, well built, paved, and lighted, and many other thoroughfares have been widened of late; but the houses generally are unsuited to the climate, being constructed like those of England, and unfurnished with open courts and galleries, as in the Spanish town San Roque, five miles north-west. Principal edifices are the governor's house—attached to which are gardens—the admiralty, naval hospital, victualing office, barracks, cathedral, a modern semi-Moorish structure; and in the market-place, the exchange, with a library, club, and news-rooms. Here are a Roman Catholic church, Wesleyan chapel, and synagogue, and various subscription schools. Outside of the "south port" are the esplanade, the English cemetery, and a suburban residence of the governor. The harbor is good, and protected by two moles—one eleven hundred and the other seven hundred feet in length. Gibraltar was made a free port in 1704, and its trade is still considerable, though it has latterly suffered from the rivalry of Malta, Genoa, etc. Public revenue collected in the town about £30,000. Annual expense of garrison to Great Britain £200,000. Ordinances enacted by the governor alone, subject to the approval of the British sovereign through the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The salary of Governor and Commander-in-chief is £5,000, or $25,000. His residence is in the fortress.

The court of Spain had never ceased to regret the loss of Gibraltar, and judging that a favorable opportunity for its recovery was presented by the war in which England was then engaged with France, they openly took part with that power, and declared hostilities by their ambassador on the 16th of June, 1779, closing the communication between Spain and Gibraltar a few days later. The force of the garrison under the command of General Elliot, then governor, amounted to little more than five thousand men, who were soon to be assailed by nearly seven times their number. Every thing was immediately placed upon a war footing, and every measure that could be devised was resorted to to procure provisions, which threatened to run short. The Spanish commodore, with a superior fleet, against which the small naval force protected by the guns of the garrison could attempt but little, was continually cruising in the neighborhood; and if supplies were obtained from the usual sources, it must be by the superior navigation, gallantry, audacity, and good fortune of captains bold enough to make the attempt.

Soon after the declaration of war, the Spaniards, whose design appeared at first that of compelling surrender by famine, commenced the structure of most formidable and extensive works upon the isthmus, erecting tremendous batteries which commanded the town, the inhabitants of which, anticipating a bombardment, removed their most valuable property to temporary stores erected for its reception in places of comparative safety. The stolid patience and endurance of the enemy in the preparation of their enormous batteries augured ill for the garrison. The hostile army increased in numbers as their works advanced in extent; yet still, week after week, and month after month, although annoyed day and night by the fire of the garrison, which poured shot and shell upon their working parties, and repeatedly set fire to their works, they labored steadily on, in spite of the slaughter made in their ranks, without returning the fire, save in some very trifling and exceptional instances. In fact, six months passed before a single person on the rock was wounded, and, strange to relate, the first partaker of this melancholy lot was a woman. Toward the close of 1779 famine began to be felt, especially by the unfortunate townspeople, who had neglected to make provision for the siege. In January, 1780, one woman died of want; food of all kinds was sold at most extravagant prices; three hundred per cent. was the average profit reaped by the daring fellows, who, running the gauntlet of the enemy's fleet, succeeded in arriving with a cargo; but in making the attempt many lost their vessels and some their lives. About this time the Governor made experiments as to the minimum quantity of food upon which life could be sustained, and lived himself for some time on four ounces of rice daily! Fortunately toward the spring of this year, the Spaniards relaxed in their blockade, and supplies were more regularly obtained. During the whole of this year the enemy were employed in completing their works, under the occasional fire of the British, which was not continuous, from the fear entertained lest the ammunition should run short. This long interval was marked by many exploits on the part of the little navy co-operating with the Governor under the command of Admiral Duff, upon whose courage and devotion the beleaguered garrison were very greatly dependant for supplies.

The garrison had been partially relieved by the arrival of Sir George Rodney, in January, 1780, and it was reported that the Spaniards had resolved to bombard the town by means of their newly erected works, in case a second relief should be attempted. The officers of the fortress placed little faith in this report, supposing humanely that, as the destruction of the town, though it would inflict indescribable calamities upon the inhabitants, who were non-combatants, would in no way assist or accelerate the fall of the place, the besiegers would from motives of mercy refrain from such an act. In this view, unhappily, they were mistaken. On the morning of the 12th of April, 1781, a fleet under the command of Admiral Darby hove in sight, leading a convoy of above a hundred vessels for the provisioning of Gibraltar. In spite of the opposition of the Spanish navy, the fleet and convoy came safe to anchor about eleven o'clock; but while the wretched and half-starved inhabitants were congratulating one another on this welcome supply, the Spaniards suddenly opened a tremendous fire upon the town, and from above a hundred pieces of heavy artillery at once poured in such a prodigious storm of shot and shell, as sent old and young, men, women, and children, flying in a panic of terror for the shelter of caves and holes in the rocks, leaving their property behind them. In this sudden calamity the sordid and avaricious suffered their deserts—the large quantities of food which they had hoarded in the face of the famine, to secure a higher price, being seized by the soldiers of the garrison and applied to their own use.

Notwithstanding the bombardment, which continued from day to day, the stores were all safely landed in the course of eight or nine days. Affairs began now, however, to wear a very different aspect to what they had hitherto borne. The cannonade from the Spaniards rarely relaxed, and only ceased altogether for about a couple of hours at noon, when, indulging their national habit, they took their siesta or midday sleep—a custom they observed throughout the whole of the siege. The result of this continuous fire was a sad series of casualties, or the distribution of wounds and sudden death among the soldiers and inhabitants. The range of the enemy's guns proved upon trial far superior to the estimate the British had formed of them. Shells were thrown to the very summit of the rock from immense distances; they entered the officers' quarters, and maimed and slew them as they sat in fancied security; they penetrated the hospitals, and killed and wounded the sick in their beds; the town soon became a heap of ruins, and the townspeople were compelled to encamp in tents on the south side of the rock.

To the fire of the enemy's land batteries was now added that of a fleet of gun and mortar-boats, which came regularly every evening, and for an hour or two launched their contribution of two or three hundred shot and shell against the defenses of the place. These boats were a source of perpetual annoyance and loss to the garrison, and though their fire was returned, yet from the smallness of the mark which they presented to our gunners, they are supposed to have escaped with comparative impunity. In order to retaliate effectively, and possibly with a view of deterring the boats from their daily attack, the Governor began the practice of opening a smart fire upon the camp from one of his most formidable batteries, whenever the boats began their assaults—a plan which may have avenged the sufferings they inflicted, but did not abate the annoyance. The fire of the Spaniards upon the fortress underwent every possible variation throughout the summer and autumn of this year—sometimes amounting to above fifteen hundred rounds in twenty-four hours, and sometimes consisting of only three shots. In November it was observed to slacken materially, and it soon appeared that this was owing to the erection of new works of a formidable nature, which were advancing rapidly toward completion. The Governor resolved to destroy these works by a sortie—a step so audacious and apparently desperate, that the Spaniards had never conceived it practicable, and consequently were not on their guard against it. On the night of the 27th of November, a detachment of something over two thousand men marched out, under cover of darkness, in three columns, and preserving a rigid silence, came suddenly upon the guard, whom they assaulted with the bayonet, and, putting them to the route, took possession of the works which were the object of the attack. In less than an hour they had set fire to the whole of the works, blown up the magazines, and spiked the mortars and cannon, inflicting a loss upon the enemy of above a million of dollars, besides a considerable loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The destroyed batteries continued burning for three days, and when they ceased to smoke nothing but a heap of ruins remained.

The Spaniards seemed panic-struck by this daring exploit, and made no attempt to extinguish the fire. The following month, however, they resumed their spirit, and commenced repairing the mischief, and soon after planned the construction of new works. It was their custom to labor by night, while it was that of the garrison to attempt to destroy in the daytime the work they had accomplished in the dark. It was not only on the land side that the Spaniards sought to increase their besieging force. In the port of Algeiras, on the opposite coast of the Bay of Gibraltar, preparations were constantly making for additional means of assault by sea, and reinforcements of war vessels arrived from time to time. New gun-boats were built, and defensive works erected on the shore.

On the 23d of March, 1782, the "Vernon" store-ship arrived at Gibraltar, bringing gun-boats and ammunition for the garrison. She was followed shortly after by the Cerberus and Apollo frigates, with four transports, having the 97th regiment on board, numbering seven hundred men, a reinforcement greatly needed. During this spring and summer the bombarding on the land side abated considerably, and the Governor took advantage of this circumstance to put the whole of his defenses in an admirable condition of repair. It was evident, not merely from this comparative lull, but from the activity displayed at the port of Algeiras, that a grand and united attack was contemplated, and it behooved the British to be well prepared to meet it. They could see the large battering ships which were building, six of which were completed by the beginning of June, and others were in a state of forwardness. As they built new ships, the Governor erected new batteries, and having learned by experience the deadly effect of the enemy's fire, he caused covered ways to be constructed, shell-proof. On the 11th of June a shell from the enemy burst through the door of a magazine, which instantly blew up with an explosion so terrible as to shake the whole rock, fragments of large size being thrown by it to an incredible distance into the sea. Fourteen men were killed on the spot, and fifteen more badly wounded. A few days after this misfortune the camp of the enemy was augmented by the arrival of French regiments to the number of five thousand men, and every thing betokened the approach of an important crisis. On the 21st two Genoese prisoners escaped to the garrison, and brought news that the grand attack was fixed for September, but that all about to be engaged in it were much averse to the enterprise. On the evening of the following day, the Duc de Crillon, who had lately gained a brilliant reputation by the conquest of Minorca, arrived to take the command of the combined army, and to achieve, as was expected, the reduction of Gibraltar.

The plan of attack had been contrived by M. D'Arcon, a French engineer, and it was at his suggestion that the great battering ships were constructed, upon principles supposed to be both impregnable and incombustible: they were of a strength and solidity hitherto unparalleled, and were completely roofed and walled in on the exposed side with defenses six or seven feet in thickness, consisting of green timber bolted together with iron, cork, junk, and raw hides, and made bomb-proof on the top. These would discharge shot and shell from between two and three hundred guns of largest caliber, and be seconded by a squadron of about thirty men-of-war, and a whole fleet of gun and mortar-boats, bomb-ketches, and floating batteries. This prodigious assault by sea was to be accompanied simultaneously by a grand attack from the land batteries on the isthmus, while an army of forty thousand men in camp were ready at any moment to take advantage of any opportunity for landing and carrying the fortress by storm. The effective strength of the garrison, although it had been considerably reinforced, consisted of barely seven thousand men; but, nothing daunted by the threatened destruction, the Governor calmly took his measures for the coming crisis. Toward the end of July the garrison were inspired by the news of Admiral Rodney's great victory in the West Indies, where the French fleet had been totally defeated, and suffered the loss of their admiral and his ship, the "Ville de Paris." An animated fire was now kept up upon the enemy's works, both by day and night, and it was known from the reports of deserters who came in that they suffered cruelly by it. As affairs drew to a head, the utmost activity prevailed on either side, the noise and bustle of preparation never ceasing for a moment. The Duc de Crillon assumed the command early in August, and chivalrously wrote a complimentary letter to General Elliot, his sturdy foe, accompanying it with a handsome present of fruit, vegetables, game, and other delicacies, of which he knew the General must stand in need. The General replied in the same courteous spirit, but cautiously deferred the establishment of a private friendship till the interests of his royal master should have been worthily vindicated.

By the beginning of September the enemy's works on the land side had advanced to a degree of perfection which the garrison regarded with feelings the reverse of pleasant. On the forenoon of the 6th Lieutenant-General Boyd proposed to the Governor to try the use of red-hot shot against the newly erected batteries. The Governor assented, and the necessary preparations being made, the attack commenced on the morning of the 8th. The result exceeded the most sanguine expectations; in a few hours two of the hostile batteries were on fire, and, in spite of all exertions to extinguish them, they were totally consumed before night. It is supposed that the Spaniards lost in this single cannonade above three hundred men in killed and wounded. This unlooked-for check galled the enemy, and provoked him to immediate retaliation. The next morning at daybreak he opened fire upon the rock from the whole of his line, and in the course of that day and the following night launched upon the British defenses nearly eight thousand shot and shell exclusive of those fired from the men-of-war and mortar-boats. This tremendous cannonade was continued with varying intensity, and amidst it all the utmost efforts were making for the completion of the formidable battering ships, to the instrumentality of which they looked for final success. On the morning of the 12th the combined fleet came in sight, and in the afternoon were all at anchor in the bay, ready for the assault. At seven in the morning of the 13th the dreaded battering ships got under weigh, and bore down to their several stations; and now commenced the fearful and decisive struggle which was to decide the fate of Gibraltar.

The huge floating forts took up a position at from nine hundred to twelve hundred yards from the garrison. When the first dropped her anchors, the British commenced their fire. In ten minutes the enemy were all moored, and then their fire became tremendous; from above four hundred pieces of the heaviest artillery, including both land and sea batteries, descended a blinding shower of shots and shells, furnishing a scene to which no powers of description could do adequate justice, and no imagination realize unaided by the recollections of experience. The chief hope of the garrison lay in their red-hot shot, which, however, from want of timely preparation, they could not bring into general use till near two o'clock in the day. The battering ships were found truly formidable; the largest shells rebounded harmless from their roofs, and the heaviest shot made no impression upon their hulls; while from the effects of their fire the casualties of the British were serious and distressing. For many hours the attack and defense were both so well supported that success on either side hung doubtful, the solid construction of the ships seeming to bid defiance to the heaviest ordnance. In the afternoon, however, when the supply of red-hot shot became abundant, things began to assume a different aspect. Smoke appeared issuing from the flag-ship, and the admiral's second was also seen to be on fire. Confusion ensued, their cannonade abated, and, save from one or two ships at a great distance, ceased altogether. Signals of distress were hoisted, and boats were seen to row to their assistance. Darkness came down upon their calamity, and as the artillery of the garrison poured in its iron storm upon the frenzied and helpless crews, an indistinct clamor of lamentable cries and groans arose from all quarters. Pieces of wreck, crowded with drowning wretches, floated to the shore, and others were dimly seen struggling for life in the troubled waters. About an hour after midnight the nearest battering ship burst into flames, and was soon in one blaze from stem to stern; the light she afforded enabled the garrison to fire with the utmost precision, and to consummate the awful ruin of which she was an example. Between three and four o'clock six others of these huge vessels were on fire. The Governor now ordered Brigadier Curtis to sally out with his gun-boats, to complete the confusion of the enemy. He made a capture of two boats filled with men endeavoring to escape, and learning from them the horrible condition of their friends on board, devoted the remainder of the night to saving as many as he could from their impending fate. He succeeded in bringing off three hundred and forty-five men from the burning ships. Notwithstanding his efforts, however, vast numbers were left to perish; and the scene now exhibited was one of the most heart-rending description—men crying from the midst of flames for pity and assistance, and others imploring relief with the most frantic gesticulations.

On the morning of the 14th six of the battering ships were in flames; three of them blew up before eleven o'clock; the three others burnt to the water's edge, their magazines having been flooded. It was thought that the other two might be saved as trophies; but one of them blew up suddenly, and the other, from motives of caution, was burnt by order of the Governor. Thus, in a few short hours that tremendous armament, which had cost so much to prepare, and to which the enemies of England looked exultantly for her humiliation, was annihilated. The loss of the combined forces in this attempt was not less than two thousand men, while that of the garrison was but fifteen killed and sixty-eight wounded. The men who were saved from the burning wrecks complained bitterly of the conduct of their chief officers, who had abandoned them to their fate so soon as the danger became imminent. They had been led to believe that the battering ships were invulnerable, and had been further taught that the garrison would not be able to fire many rounds of hot balls.

This defeat, the most remarkable to be met with in the history of besieging forces, though it did not terminate the siege of Gibraltar, may be said to have established that fortress in the permanent possession of the English. Though the Spaniards continued to annoy the garrison from the isthmus, they never afterward entertained the hope of success. News of peace arrived in February of the following year, when both parties, weary of the woes and miseries of a protracted war, were but too glad to meet once more on terms of friendship.

The above is a short summary of what may be termed the military history of the siege of Gibraltar. If we turn from its warlike and historical aspects to contemplate the social and individual miseries of which it was the fruitful occasion, we shall see helpless women and children reduced to the last straits of famine, dashed to pieces by cannon shot, or blown to atoms by the bursting shell, and driven to holes and caves of the rocks for shelter from the ruthless storm beneath which their homes were crumbling into dust. We shall see the timid and helpless, frenzied with the roar of the thunderous artillery, and the sight of the ruin descending upon them, purchasing shelter from the Jews and ruined tradespeople, who, having lost all other property, made a capital of these rude strongholds, and at the hazard of their lives insured their safety by covering with wet hides the fallen shells ere they had time to explode. We shall see the closest social bonds rent asunder by abject misery and still more abject fear; and sordid avarice grimly at work amidst the infernal wreck and din, gathering a rich harvest from man's despair. Worst of all, we shall see human life reduced to a terrible discount, and all that makes life instrumental to the happiness of man or the glory of his Maker banished from the scene.

Of the extreme personal misery endured by both sides during the protracted and horrible struggle, some faint idea may be formed from the numerous desertions which were constantly taking place. Almost daily deserters came in from the enemy's lines, and these described the fearful carnage produced by the fire of the garrison, and the unbearable fatigues they were compelled to endure in repairing the mischief it occasioned; to escape these horrors by desertion, they ran the most fearful risks, and numbers of them were shot dead by their own comrades in making the attempt. On the other hand, desertions from the garrison were only less frequent because more difficult of accomplishment. The only mode of escape was down the precipitous front of the rock which faced the isthmus; the attempt was nothing short of madness, yet numbers, cutting their clothing into strips, trusted their weight to that frail support, and were dashed to pieces; their mangled bodies, when found, were brought into the garrison and exhibited as a warning to others. Sometimes a poor wretch would succeed in getting as far as a cavern about half way down, and after starving there till the pangs of hunger and thirst compelled him to cry for assistance, would be drawn up with a rope and led off to execution.

As a relief to these revolting details, it is pleasant to recur to some of the many acts of noble and self-denying courage afforded by the records of the siege. Thus, when an officer of artillery, observing a shell falling toward the place where he stood, leaped into an excavation to avoid it, and was followed into his retreat by the shell itself, a man of the name of Martin dragged him out, at the imminent risk of his own life, but an instant before the shell burst! Another man, named Hartley, was engaged in the laboratory filling shells, when by some unaccountable accident one of them took fire; had he followed the natural impulse, and ran away from the danger, the whole laboratory would have blown up, numbers of lives would have been sacrificed, and the loss of ammunition to the garrison would have been irreparable. With astonishing coolness he seized the lighted shell, carried it in his arms to a place where it could do no mischief, and had not parted with it two seconds before it exploded harmlessly!

A somewhat singular feature observable in the whole conduct of the attack and defense of Gibraltar was the maintenance of a certain spirit of chivalry and honor on both sides, contrasting advantageously with the merciless details we read of in connection with sieges of an earlier date. Prisoners were constantly exchanged, without much reference either to number or grade; intercepted correspondence, not relating to the war, was politely transmitted under a flag of truce; the wives of soldiers taken prisoners were well treated, and forwarded, when opportunity offered, to their husbands; and when the body of a Spanish gentleman was washed ashore on the rock, his gold watch and purse of pistoles, found upon him, were conveyed to his friends after he had been buried with the honors of war. This astonishing defense of the fortress cost the British less than a thousand lives.—London Leisure Hour.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.

I SAW the temple reared by the hand of man, standing with its high pinnacles in the distant plain: the stream beat upon it—the god of nature hurled its thunderbolts against it—and yet it stood firm as adamant. Revelry was in its hall—the gay, the young, the happy, and beautiful were there.

I turned and the temple was no more—its high walls scattered in ruins, the moss and ivy grass grew wildly there, and at midnight hour the owl's cry added to the desolation of the scene—the young and the gay, who had revelled there, had passed away.

I saw the child rejoicing in his youth—the idol of his father. I returned, and the child had become old. Trembling with weight of years he stood, the last of his generation—a stranger amid the desolation around him.

I saw an oak stand in all its pride on the mountain; the birds were caroling on its boughs. I returned—the oak was leafless and sapless—the winds were playing their pastime through the branches.

"Who is the destroyer?" said I to my guardian angel.

"It is Time," said he. "When the morning stars sang together with joy over the new-made world, he commenced his course, and when he shall have destroyed all that is beautiful on earth—plucked the sun from its sphere—vailed the moon in blood—yea, when he shall roll the heaven and earth away as a scroll, then shall an angel from the throne of God come forth, and with one foot upon the land, and one upon the sea, lift up his head toward heaven and heaven's Eternal, and say, 'Time is, Time was, Time shall be no longer!'"—Paulding.

ARAB ODDITIES.

AN Arab, entering a house, removes his shoes, but not his hat. He mounts his horse upon the right side, while his wife milks their cows upon their left side. Writing a letter, he puts nearly all the compliments on the outside. With him the point of a pin is its head, while its head is made its heel. His head must be wrapped up warm, even in summer, while his feet may well enough go naked in winter. Every article of merchandise which is liquid he weighs, but measures wheat, barley, and a few other articles. He reads and writes from right to left, but figures are read from left to right. He eats almost nothing for breakfast, about as much for dinner, but, after the work of the day is done, sits down to a hot meal, swimming in oil, or, better yet, boiled butter. His sons eat with him, but the females of the house wait till his lordship is done. He rides his donkey when traveling, his wife walking behind. He laughs at the idea of walking in the street with his wife, or of ever vacating a seat for a woman. He knows no use for chairs, tables, knives, forks, nor even spoons, unless they are wooden ones. Bedsteads, bureaus, and fireplaces may be put in the same category. If he be an artisan, he does his work sitting, perhaps using his toes to hold what his hands are engaged upon. Is rarely seen drunk, too seldom speaks the truth—is deficient in affection for his kindred. Has little curiosity, and no imitation—no wish to improve his mind—no desire to surround himself with the comforts of life.

THE AFFLICTED FLOWER.

BY SKENNA BALDWIN.

Saw I in a garden walk,
Bending low upon its stalk,
Bending low, a lovely flower,
Beat down by a sudden shower.
Bathed in tears, upon her bed,
Mournfully the flow'ret said,
"O, I had much rather die,
Than in such distress to lie,
With my leaves and flowers so torn
By the wind and pelting storm!
I had watched, with growing pride,
One bud of beauty by my side,
Till its silken vest was seen
Peeping through its coat of green;
And now to have it rudely broken,
Just as it began to open!
Never was a bud so fine—
Never was a grief like mine.
Here in stateliness and pride,
With its branches spreading wide,
Stands a rank, luxurious weed,
Full of blossoms, buds, and seed,
While my little tender flower
Must be broken by a shower.
What is now the world to me,
Dew or sunshine, bird or bee?"

• • • • •
Soon the gard'ner pass'd along,
Took the weed with hand so strong,
Pulled its root from out the ground,
Lest it should scatter seed around;
Lifted up the flow'ret's head,
Fixed her root firm in the bed;
Then there came a cooling breeze,
Fanned and lifted up her leaves,

And the sun sent down a shower
Of beams to cheer the drooping flower.
Soon there seemed an added grace
Beaming sweetly from her face:
Then a gentle whispering gale
Bore her fragrance down the vale,
And many snuffed the scented air,
Rejoiced to find such sweetness there;
And much they blessed the cooling shower
And the sweet incense of the flower.

A I L E E.

BY KATE BRADFORD.

Sweet as the breath of midsummer air,
Grateful as answer of peace to prayer,
Brighter than isles of the southern sea,
Come to my spirit dreams of Ailee.
Pure as the lily kissed by the wave,
Sparkles the snow-sheet spread o'er thy grave;
Purer than lily, as snow can be,
Glitter thy robes, love-shrouded Ailee.
As the white mist round the trees stealing,
Lends to each grace sweeter revealing,
So through the death-vail thrown over thee
Shineth strange beauty, peerless Ailee!
Warbles canary, trills thy guitar,
Asks thy rosebush of sunbeam and star,
Sigheth each breeze to the lone elm-tree,
"Where can have stray'd our gentle Ailee?"
When, as a blushing, beautiful bride,
Spring from the bosom of Winter shall glide,
Forest, hill-side, and flowery lea,
Will miss thy glad step, angel Ailee.
Where the archangels lowest bow,
Sweep thou the harp-strings ungrieving now;
'Mid the beatified evermore free,
Praiseth the spirit of ransomed Ailee.

SONNET.

LUTHER BEFORE THE DIET OF WORMS.

"Here I stand; I can not change: God help me!"

BY MARY E. FREY.

BROKE ever words from lips of mortal one,
Clothed with such earnest might and power,
As thou didst utter in that soul-tried hour
When all thy earthly work seem'd well nigh done!
O had thy soul no secret fears to quell
When summons came to meet that august throng,
Whose nod thy life could shorten or prolong!
Ah, no! to Him "who doeth all things well"
Thy steadfast soul in living faith was bow'd.
Here lay to skeptic man the hidden source
From whence sprang all thy greatness, all thy might
To brave earth's tyrants, and roll back the cloud
Which strove to shroud the world in moral night,
And close between man and God free intercourse.

WOMAN AND FLOWERS.

BY ORLESTIA RICE COLBY.

"Blessed be God for flowers!

For the bright, gentle, holy thoughts, that breathe
From out their odorous beauty, like a wreath
Of sunshine on life's hours!"

"NO marvel woman should love flowers." A taste for flowers and a love for the beautiful, as exhibited in the wonders of creative power, are evidences of a refined and sensitive nature, and peculiar traits of character which distinguish man from the lower order of animals. The ox or horse may roam at will among earth's fairest scenes—may graze among flowery vales and cultivated fields, or browse in the wilderness, and be alike unconscious of nature's charms. The beauty of the landscape inspires within them no thrill of delight; they turn not aside to admire the blushing rose or inhale its fragrance, and crush without emotion the gay cowslip and meek-eyed violet beneath their careless hoof, and nip the grass and daisies, too, in their eager haste for food. This single desire gratified, they lie down in the green pastures, not to enjoy the fair scene stretching away as far as the eye can reach, and bounded only where the blue sky embraces the green hills, but to a dreamless slumber. The changing seasons, with their panorama of beauty, have no peculiar charm for them. The melody and fragrance of spring find no inlet into their darkened understanding, and awaken within them no responsive echo.

"But man superior walks,
And muses lively gratitude."

Though the love for the beautiful and a taste for flowers may be modified by circumstances, and varied by the ever-varying shades of character and mental culture, yet the lowest intellect and most sensual mind are at times susceptible to the sweet influences of these silent teachers. True, all may not gaze upon them with a poet's rapture, nor contemplate their loveliness with a philosophic eye; yet we think there is no being who bears the impress of humanity upon his brow that is wholly incapable of appreciating the silent influence of flowers. They are God's own missionaries; and they speak to a fallen race of peace and purity, and faintly shadow forth the glories of the "better land," where no blighting frosts mar their beauty. They come to us in mercy; and happy is he who heeds their gentle errand, and opens his heart to their instructive lessons. They come to all; the high and low, the rich and poor, the bond and the free, feel the sunlight which they fling freely and constantly around them.

Even the idiot is sometimes charmed with their beauty, and a ray of light penetrates the darkness which envelops his soul—a ray from the fountain of light whose source is God. The raving maniac is often calmed by the inspiration of their presence, and gazes with childlike wonder and affection upon their fairy forms and delicate tints, and crowns herself with fresh garlands, and converses with them as with the friends she has known and loved, and lost. The oppressed slave, the rude, untutored son of the forest, may feel an indefinable thrill of pleasure as their eyes rest upon the verdant beauty of spring, and behold Nature's emerald robe embroidered with buds and blossoms of every form and hue; and the hardy sons of toil who labor for their daily bread will pause to admire the single wild flower which springs up along the dusty wayside, and an influence, pure, subtle, and ethereal as the aroma of its breath, may silently leave its impress upon their souls.

Thus the love of flowers seems to be a universal sentiment of the human heart, more or less developed in different individuals; yet the living germ exists in every mind. Man may admire them for their beauty and fragrance; but woman loves them for the poetry which they breathe, the glowing thoughts they bring. To her they have a language expressive of the loftiest thoughts of the intellect, the noblest sentiment of the heart, the deepest emotion of the soul. To her listening spirit their "voiceless lips" are eloquent teachers, silently proclaiming the wisdom and goodness of Him who has clothed the earth with beauty as with a garment, who has made the waste places and the desert glad with his presence, and caused the wilderness to bud and "blossom as the rose," and the vernal grass, and gay dandelion, and modest violet to adorn the dusty wayside of daily toil, to cheer the desponding soul with a glimpse of heaven.

It is woman's province to multiply the sources of beauty and pleasure around her home, and this may be effectually performed by cultivating the rich and fragrant flowers which nature has strewn with lavish profusion over the earth. No desert is so barren that it is not graced by their presence; no vale so fair that its beauty is not enhanced by their loveliness. If her home is one of luxury and refinement, they may minister to her pride, and costly exotics and rare blossoms from sunny climes may reward her fostering care, and flourish as luxuriantly in her parlor or conservatory as beneath the genial sun of the tropics, exciting the wonder and admiration of all who behold their marvelous beauty.

If her sphere is among the poor and lowly, her daily life one of toil and poverty, even here countless blossoms deck the sward and perfume the passing zephyr with the rich odor of their breath. Here the blue-eyed violet springs up among the withered leaves like hope among the ruins of the past, and turns its trusting eye heavenward, like Faith smiling through her tears, and silently whispers to the saddened hearts of earth's weary wanderers of a home of purity and joy. Here, too, the "lily of the field," arrayed in its robe of more than imperial splendor, arrests her attention, and leads her to "consider" the sublime lesson of trust and dependence upon that Power which has clothed even the flower of the grass with the most delicate form of beauty, and given the whole floral race a voice which thrills her inmost soul with emotions unutterable. Her cottage-home may boast of no attractions to gratify the eye of taste and refinement; though naked walls and uncarpeted floors greet her eyes, instead of the rare paintings and rich Brussels of the more fortunate; yet the warm sunlight and balmy air comes with a blessing to her humble home, and she fills her simple vases with fresh flowers, glistening with the pearly dew, nor sighs for a more costly ornament either for kitchen or parlor. At eventide she sits by her open window, and her heart sends up the incense of praise to her heavenly Father, as her pleased eye rests upon the glowing outline of a landscape more beautiful than mortal artist has ever traced upon the snowy canvas. She watches the fleecy drapery of the skies, as the gorgeous tints of sunset one after one disappear and fade away into the somber hues of evening, and hails with delight the coming of the first star that twinkles on the "ebon brow" of night; the evening zephyr is wafted by her on its health-giving mission, freighted with the perfume of the night-blooming flowers—

"From timid jasmin buds that keep
Their odors to themselves all day;
But when the sunlight dies away,
Let's the delicious secret out
To every breeze that roams about;"

and she feels a buoyancy of spirit which the votary of fashion seldom enjoys.

Her life may be spent in a secluded vale, shut out from the privileges of civilized life, and far from the "sound of a church-going bell," where the voice of no living teacher has proclaimed the existence of a God, or spoke of his wisdom and goodness; yet even there, in the solitude and silence of the untrodden forest, she may lean her ear in the "secret places," and his works shall praise him—the lofty trees of the forest shall "clap their hands" and rejoice, and the sweet wild flower spring up at her feet, and whisper of the power, wisdom, and benevolence of nature's God, and her soul shall respond in accents of grateful praise to the great Author of all good.

Was it a mere poetic fancy which ascribed to flowers a mystic language expressive of the changeful emotions of the human heart? or has the God of nature made them messengers of his love, and given them a voice to proclaim his truth? The wayward fancy of man has not only ascribed to them the sentiments of goodness and purity, of love and tenderness, but has also given them a voice expressive of the baser passions of our nature—of anger, pride, and jealousy. Not thus does the unsophisticated heart of nature's child translate their unwritten lore. To her they are the poetry of earth, pure and unsullied as the Author. Is she happy? They are her companions—God's smile of universal benevolence, given to bless every human being. Does her spirit sink beneath the pressure of adverse circumstances, and give way to doubt and despondency? They come with the balm of sympathy to her wounded heart, and hope is born anew, as even from the flower of the grass comes up the cheering tone, "Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" And she treads the thorny path of life with a firmer step, grateful for the wayside flowers which refresh her weary soul like a gleam of light from the far-off land.

Has she seen her cherished "olive plants" wither and decay beneath the blighting touch of disease, and laid their precious forms in the silent tomb? "She goes to the grave to weep there;" and from the dark mold which covers the pulseless heart the violet and amaranth proclaim the resurrection, and typify the immortality of the soul; she feels assured that she shall be reunited with the dear ones who have gone before, and greet their happy spirits in the realms of endless bliss, and her tears of sorrow are mingled with the pearls of rejoicing, as she looks forward to a reunion in heaven.

TREATMENT OF BOOKS.

WHAT is a book? such a book as we are willing to make, and do make, the companion of our solitary and reflecting hours? If it be good for any thing—if it be really worthy of the name of a book—it can be nothing less than the intellectual or spiritual part of some man, or of some woman, excelling in some way, more or less remarkable, the mass of other men and women in the world. In cases, happily for mankind almost numberless, a book is some gloriously great or good man—all except the merely material and corruptible part of him—redeemed from the conditions of decay and death, and commissioned henceforth to dwell among us, like a beneficent angel from heaven, an ever-present minister, it may be, of usefulness, or of brotherly love and divine charity. What a world is the book world! what an illustrious companionship does it offer for the gratification of our social and spiritual instincts and likings! The great, the brave, the self-sacrificing—the oppressed and their deliverers—the sages, the instructors, the benefactors of mankind in all ages, live again in books, and reveal to us, in the seclusion of our chambers and firesides, what were the thoughts and motives of their secret lives—why they lived laborious days and spurned the tempting delights of sense—what was the spiritual atmosphere in which they breathed—what the secret source of endeavor, never slackening till the goal was won.

Books, like men, have a twofold nature: paper, print, and binding are their bodily substances, and the thoughts that breathe along their pages may be called their spirit. And since we would be loth to abuse our living friend and benefactor, or his dead remains, we ought not to abuse a book—which brings us to the subject of our paper—the treatment of books—the treatment, be it understood, not critically by rules of logic, or analytically by rules of criticism, but commonsensically by rule of thumb.

Dr. Johnson rarely read a book without thumbing, twisting, pulling, hauling, and crushing it into a state of dislocation utterly hopeless, as though he had determined to wring its essence out of it, as men do perfumes from flowers, by squeezing them to death; so that those who had the misfortune to lend him a volume rarely knew it again after it had escaped the tortures of his inquisition. We do not think the example of the great lexicographer, in this particular, worthy of imitation; and to those who presume to follow it, in regard either to their own books or those of their friends, we would suggest that they are in fairness bound to write a folio dictionary before they lay claim to the privilege. The whole Chinese nation have a reverence, almost amounting to a religious sentiment, for even the slightest scrap of written or printed paper, and would account it, if not as a species of criminality, at least as a sign of moral depravity, that any man should willfully injure a book. We must confess to something approaching to Chinese in our feelings on this matter. The sight of a dog-eared treatise brings on the symptoms of melancholy, and the spectacle of an unfortunate volume with its back broken and half its sheets "started," or of one crippled into a state of rickets by a lazy, one-handed reader, or of one which has been knocked or kicked about till its corners are all uncornered, arouse our resentment against the perpetrators of the injustice.

Some persons never lose the habit they acquired at the dame-school, where they learned to spell a, b, ab; and b, a, ba; and to the end of their lives hold their books by sheer force of thumb pressed between the margins at the foot of the page. If this class of persons read much, which they never do, their books would perish by the tortures of the thumb-screw.

Books suffer from neglect as well as ill-usage. Damp is a great destroyer, and often works irretrievable ruin while not at all suspected. Rows of volumes get put away, and shelved in cupboards, in bed-rooms, or stair-closets, against the party-walls, and when they reappear show as if struck by leprosy—being sprinkled through with moldy, saffron-colored spots: this is particularly the case with such as are illustrated with copper-plates—the plate-paper, which is but a thick kind of white blotting-paper, having a strong affinity for latent moisture.

Books should be handled tenderly; it should be remembered that their nerves and sinews are but sewing-thread and thin glue, and that they are not brick-bats. They should never be forced open too wide—should not be swung by a single cover—not thumbled like a child's primer—not folded down at the corners to mark where the reader left off—not ground beneath the elbow—not consigned to the mercy of pitch-and-toss accidents. If they be good books—and if they be bad their owner is a bad man, and the sooner he gets rid of them the better—they have a solid right to good treatment, and should have it.

We are justified in presuming that the generality of our readers are lovers of books, and, therefore, that they will take these hints in good part, and profit by them.

PICTURES WITHOUT FRAMES.

FROM THE GERMAN.

BY CHARLES NORDHOFF.

THE countenance is the title-page to the book of the soul, and it may also be regarded as the preface—a portion of the work which we should, by no means, leave unread.

As without the sun there could be no sunlight, so without Christ there can be no Christians. And as the sun's rays enlighten and enliven the world—although they are not the sun—so Christians, too, are the light and life of the world.

A noble mind weighed down and obscured by suffering, may be likened to one of the plain wooden clocks of our forefathers' days. A glance at the outside discloses nothing brilliant or beautiful; naught strikes the eye but the dark heavy weights which give it motion. But for usefulness these are the best of clocks.

With our finite understandings we comprehend sacred things just as a child, which has just acquired a knowledge of the alphabet, might be supposed to read a volume. What manner of insight into its contents would it have?

How frequently, in the course of our lives, do we gain an experience by the loss of a pleasure?

As we may notice, even in a calm, by the inclination of the trees in a forest, from which side come the fiercest and most frequent blasts of the storm, so an attentive observer of men may easily distinguish from what quarter have set the heaviest gales of passion.

Beneath what a load of worldliness and worldly cares is the soul of the Christian often buried; and how anxiously and perseveringly he struggles to penetrate the mist to return again into the bright, clear light of heaven! Yet, at other times, how easily and by what trifling matters we allow ourselves to be led away from God!

A noble person needs but a plain garment to set it off; a beautiful picture requires but a simple frame; a great thought is best dressed in the simplest language. But all these need a spirit of understanding to be appreciated.

Our thoughts should depend from our souls as leaves from a tree—so natural, so unconstrainedly ornamental, so easily stirred, so closely connected, so entirely one in nature. And like leaves upon a tree, when the storm-wind rushes through them, we shall see only the sickly, the pale, and the dead fall to the ground.

Why does the irresistible hand of fate lay such numbers prostrate in the dust? Is it not because it finds so many endeavoring to stand up—so few upon their knees?

The soul which loves the Savior enjoys the beauties and bounties of this life to a degree and with a relish unknown to the worldling. It is as if the talented author of a beautiful work should present to a friend a copy of his book as a gift of love. The latter would enjoy the rich contents in common with the great public. But aside and beyond this, would he not have another and especial joy in feeling himself the possessor of the author's love? And the last is surely the greatest pleasure.

Men of great genius but little heart, are they not like unto the aurora borealis, whose magnificence awes the arctic voyager to silence? But for what are they good? With all their splendor they cause no flower to bloom; in all their light there is no life.

The evils of life may be likened to comets. Like these they bear after them a long train. Like these, too, they seem to wander through the boundless space of our being, pathless and objectless, creatures of chance. Yet are they both alike in the hands of the Creator.

Men of great erudition and immense acquirements may be likened to the ocean, the receptacle into which flow the waters of many noble rivers and extensive lakes, but which is not, after all, itself a living fountain or spring. They are living halls, within whose recesses are gathered together the facts of the world. But a walk within their silent precincts is for the Christian, often enough, a walk amid the dead.

When the life of the oyster sickens and suffers it is turned to a precious pearl. So with the Christian; through much suffering and tribulation he enters the kingdom of heaven, to become a precious jewel in the crown of the Savior.

What an abyss we find between knowing and doing, and how frequently do we find ourselves standing midway, like marksmen, seeing our aim fairly, yet never hitting it!

Our journey through life may be compared to the ascent of a mountain. We aim high, but how frequently with, at first, but indistinct ideas of the goal which we are attempting to reach! And, accordingly, when we have reached what, to our human understanding, appears a very gratifying elevation, and begin to look about us for a fine view to reward the arduousness of our efforts, alas! at once we find ourselves surrounded by clouds, and lost in fog and mist. And then what longing, wishful looks we cast back toward the green valleys of our childhood, when the soft warmth of the sun, the sweet perfume of flowers, the music of the gurgling brook filled us with peace and gladness! But onward is the word.

Our goal is not of sweet memories or soft longings. Onward, ever onward, and upward, over rock and brier, through storm, and mist, and clouds, till we have placed all beneath us! We may not have intended to go so far when we commenced. Neither did the first disciples of our Savior. Yet he that endureth to the end shall receive the crown of everlasting life.

A soul at the point of departure from the body is aptly likened to a little boat afloat in mid-ocean. Below is naught but the vast expanse of water, above the heavens, to which the lonely boatman casts his anxious looks. At such a time he feels the most important question to be this, whether the sky of purest azure offers a prospect clear, bright, and peaceful; or if it is beset with lowering clouds, in which the vivid lightning's flash portends the approaching storm.

If one should cause a continual shower of water to fall upon a flowering tree for the purpose of washing off the parasites which infest and injure the blossoms, would not the result of such a measure, in all likelihood, be, that blossoms as well as parasites, the needful as well as the injurious, would be destroyed? So it is in education if too many rules are laid down, too many barriers and restrictions placed about the daily walks of life.

BURNS IN TEARS.

WHEN quite young Robert Burns, the poet, visited, in company with others, the house of the philosopher, Dr. Adam Ferguson, Scotland. In the midst of the conversation Burns turned away to examine a painting hanging on the wall, representing a dead soldier on the ground, with his wife and child lamenting over him, and these lines inscribed below:

"Cold on Canadian hills, or Minden's plain,
Perhaps that parent wept for soldier slain;
Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolved in dew,
The big drops mingling with the milk he drew,
Sad, mournful presage of his future years,
The child of misery baptized in tears."

As he read these beautiful lines, written by one Langhorne, the eyes of Burns filled with tears, and one of the company remarked that a man could not be a man, nor a poet, till he had a heart and could feel. A true remark, indeed; for he who can weep at misery, can "feel for others' woes and lend the helping hand."

Man without tears or feeling is like a tree in winter, barren, though strong and stately. It is feeling that robes it in beauteous foliage and makes it efflorescent and fruitful.

ADDRESSED TO MISS C. M. BROWN, A RECENTLY APPOINTED MISSIONARY TO AFRICA.

BY REV. D. D. BUCK.

THIS young lady has long felt a deep solicitude to be useful to the Church in the great work of evangelizing the world. She has finally consented to go abroad as a missionary, and has expressed a preference for the mission in Africa. In consenting to go to that field of labor, she seems to have considered the difficulties and dangers which she might expect to encounter; yet love for souls, and deep convictions of duty have had greater influence over her than desire for ease, or fear of suffering and death. Many have spoken most discouragingly and tried to persuade her not to go. She has been told that it would be throwing her life away to go to Africa. But, notwithstanding all, she has fully determined to yield to her convictions of duty and leave the consequences with God.

This address, in its original form, was of necessity very hastily written, and read to Miss Brown in the presence of several ministers and a large company of friends, on the evening of her departure from Elmira to New York. The address designedly keeps in view the well-known dangers of a residence in Africa; and the effort is to show, that even if it were as likely to be fatal as it has been represented to her, still it would be apostolic and Christ-like to go where duty and religious solicitude lead, even if it be to suffering and death.

The author has reason to believe that his address, however imperfect as a composition, was not without its good influence upon the young missionary, at a time when she needed encouragement and counsel. But, in the circumstances of the case, this could not be done by denying or lightly estimating the real hazards of a residence in that climate which has proved so fatal to American missionaries. It was deemed more consistent with Christian candor duly to consider the difficulties before her, and endeavor to derive consolation in view of all the facts in the case, even allowing the possible truthfulness of the gloomiest representations.

The publication of this address may possibly encourage others to devote themselves to the missionary work in Africa, or in some other part of the wide field of evangelical labor.

Go, Mercy's messenger, with angel speed
To Afric's bleeding heart. The Gospel balm,
That healeth spirit wounds, with haste convey.
And let poor Afric know—though hard the task—
That all is not cupidity and hate
Where human face puts on its fairest hue.

Let Afric know that love for human souls
May have a mightiness to move the heart,
Great as the lust for gold, or thirst for praise.
Can robbers go to steal their fellow-men?
Can thrifty commerce whiten Afric's waves?
Can greedy Avarice sift her golden sands,
Or dig for gems through all her desert wastes,
Or hunt her ivory from hill to hill,
Unscared by death? And may not holy love,
That brought a Savior from his blissful throne,
Impel a pious soul this land to leave,
To show poor Afric that a Christian's love
Can brave as much of danger and of death
To carry healing to a bleeding heart,
As lust of gold to open wide the wounds?

Then go, if God hath bidden, go to die,
If such a price may save one precious soul.
Did Paul his life reserve when duty called
Through perils, pains, and deaths to bear his cross?
Did Jesus come for pleasure to our earth,
Or look for lengthened years in midst of death?
He came to die! upon the cross to die!
For us to die who well deserved the death;
Why not for him, if dying be the means
Of richest blessing to the ebony race?

For Afric it were better far to die,
Than be partaker of the bloody guilt
That crushes all the manhood from the man,
And legislates the human to the brute.
I would prefer myself to be the slave,
Than forge one link of Afric's galling chain.

'Tis due to Africa from Christian lands
That Gospel freedom now be freely sent
To her ill-fated and ill-treated race;
For robbers, chains, and daggers have been sent
In Christian ships, with banners boldly spread,
And Christian symbols gleaming thro' the skies;
And myriads of her children have been torn
With bloody violence from her own breast,
By hands that handled Inspiration's page.

Then go, redeeming Love's embassadress,
With proclamation to that wretched race,
Of immortality and bliss obtained
For dying Ham, through Jesus, son of Shem.
Let Japhet's daughter brave a thousand deaths
If she may be a messenger of life,
To carry hope and gladness where Despair
Hath reigned with rayless midnight o'er the land.
Go e'en to death, if that be Afric's life;
'T were glorious thus to die, if Heaven ordains,
And so to live, if he by grace sustains
Thy fragile form amid so many deaths.

Can aught befall thee but as God permits?
Can Death approach thee without his consent?
Thou art immortal till thy work is done.

Then go to Africa, with power divine,
As shield and sun, to comfort and defend.
Stand up in Africa, by grace divine,
As strong to labor and as firm to endure,
As here, with labor less, and less of grace;

For God is there, as near to praying Faith,
When supplication meets a vertic sun,
As here, where Faith may kneel at costly shrines.

Go forth in Africa, divinely led Through various paths of usefulness and peace.
Who led his people through the wilderness,
By day defended, and by night secured,
Thy steps shall order with unerring skill,
Thy soul protect with never-failing power.

When day departs and weary night comes on,
Lie down in Africa beneath the wings
Of guardian cherubim, as safely there
As in the bosom of thy kindred here.

To die in Africa, if Heaven direct,
In faithful labor for that dying race,
Like an apostle choosing bonds and death,
If bonds and death may life and freedom give,
Is dying like our Lord, and wins a crown.

To die! Why not? Is it more far from thence
To thrones of bliss, than from these favored shores?
Is it less easy for an angel's eye
To see a Christian on his dying couch
Beneath a palm in Afric's torrid clime,
Than 'neath the palms that shaded Judah's hills?

Then go, if God hath called thee; go in peace,
To live and labor long as Heaven may please;
Or die, if need be, in that far-off land,
That lies as near to Paradise as this.

THE BLIND CHILD'S REQUEST.

BY ELLIE MILLS.

SISTER, give me thy hand, and lead me now,
Through the smooth walk, to yonder cooling bower;
The air of evening fans my cheek and brow,
I hear the rustling of the leafy bough,
And breathe the sweet perfume of many a flower.

And, darling sister, sit beside me here,
And take my hand within your own and tell—
Not of the many flowers blooming near;
Not of the flowing streamlet, bright and clear;
Not of the birds, whose songs I love so well—

Speak not to me of earth—of skies of blue,
Of the pale moon and countless stars that shine,
And rosy morn—all beautiful to you;
They are forbidden to my longing view—
All, all is dark to me, for I am blind:

But talk to me of heaven, O sister, dear!
And of the fair, bright beings dwelling there;
Often, in dreams, to me they do appear,
And woo me from this world, so dark and drear,
Away with them, unto a clime more fair.

Yes, sister, tell of heaven; there would I go;
There, to that happy place, I long to flee;
All must be very lovely here below.
This earth is beautiful, for you have told me so;
But O in heaven, dear sister, I can see!

THE HORRORS OF EVIL COMPANY.

BY REV. J. T. BARR, SCOTLAND.

"The way of transgressors is hard."

EDWIN was one of my earliest school-fellows. Thoughtful, quick, and naturally ingenious, he made rapid progress in his studies. We were nearly of the same age, and as our paternal residences were in the same street, a mutual attachment was soon formed, and we became almost inseparable companions.

His father was a pious man and devotedly attached to the ordinances of religion. He had for many years established family worship in his house. On several occasions I was present during that important service, and always received benefit to my soul. His instructions to the members of his family were communicated in the most pleasing yet impressive manner. When he conversed with them, the parent and the friend appeared to be united.

At the age of fourteen Edwin was taken from school and soon after apprenticed to a respectable tradesman in the town. Being of an active mind he acquired, in a very short time, a competent knowledge of his business.

The same openness of disposition, and the same gentleness of spirit, which had so long secured him the affection of his school-fellows, were still the prevailing attractions of the amiable youth. At "early dawn" and "silent eve" we often perambulated the fields and woods, the hills and valleys, contiguous to our native town. On such occasions, having a reciprocal feeling, and possessing a corresponding taste for the beauties of nature, our minds were involuntarily led from "nature up to nature's God."

But it was in the sanctuary, while sitting under the sound of the Gospel, that we experienced the most delightful elevations of soul—here, that the fire of devotion was kindled in our hearts. One Sunday evening we went to hear a funeral sermon. The chapel was crowded with attentive hearers, and a solemn feeling appeared to pervade the minds of all while listening to the affecting discourse. Never shall I forget that evening. At the close of the service a prayer meeting was announced. We both remained, and were both deeply affected.

Time rolled on, and Edwin had accomplished about four years of his apprenticeship, but the tide of his affections was evidently turned. I had, indeed, for some months previously, felt misgivings as to the altered state of his mind. He had frequently neglected the public worship of God, and his conversation had assumed a less serious tone. I several times called to see him, but could easily discover, from a peculiar reservedness in his manner, that he wished to shun me. The secret was soon disclosed. He had formed an acquaintance with two or three young men, who were well known in the town to be loose characters. I often remonstrated with him, but in vain. The connections he had chosen, and the evil habits into which they were daily hurrying him, had rendered him impregnable to reproof. But though I felt keenly on his account, yet when I saw him "running to the same excess of riot," and plunging deeper into sin, I considered it disreputable to be seen in his company.

There was a public house in the adjoining street, into which I occasionally saw him enter at the close of the day, and from which he would often return in a state of intoxication. At other times I saw him wandering in the vicinity of the town with the publican's daughter; while those who knew him in his school-boy days would cast upon him a look of mingled pity and reproach. This state of things continued till the period of his apprenticeship expired. But though he had a perfect knowledge of his business, and was an excellent workman, yet owing to the irregular habits he had formed his master would no longer employ him.

Being now out of a situation, he loitered about the neighborhood for some weeks, when, on a beautiful morning in May, as I was taking a solitary walk to inhale the pure breezes of the country, and to feed my eyes upon the lovely scenery which I had been accustomed to admire, my attention was suddenly drawn to a concourse of people assembled near a stage-coach which was on the point of starting for London. I soon recognized Edwin among the group; and as I stood for a moment gazing on his wasted frame and pallid features, his eye caught mine. He approached, and, grasping my hand, exclaimed, "Farewell, Mr. Barr, we may never meet again!"

"But where are you going?" I said.

"I am going to London to make my fortune," and a forced smile played upon his countenance.

"But are you sure of that?"

"Why, what can I do? There is no employment to be obtained here."

"Would not a reformation in your conduct insure you employment? Abandon the society of those who have brought you to this humiliating situation, and you need not leave your native town to seek employment."

"It is too late; I am resolved to go."

"If so, then take the advice of one who feels interested in your welfare. When you arrive in London shun the society of evil-doers; avoid them as you would the plague. Otherwise they will be your ruin."

"I know you have ever been my friend, though I have rendered myself unworthy of your esteem; and if I had listened to your counsel—"

Here the horn blew, and without waiting to finish the sentence Edwin took his seat on the coach and was soon out of sight.

I resumed my walk, but it was with a heavy and dejected heart. I listened to the music of the birds as they caroled to each other in the hedge-rows; but their warbling failed to produce that soothing, hallowing influence, which I had experienced in my former rambles. The image of my school-fellow was constantly fitting before my mental vision. I was painfully apprehensive that the same propensities which had already blighted his expectations at home would, if still indulged, accelerate his final ruin in the gay metropolis.

Year after year passed away, but I heard nothing of the unhappy youth; and I was almost led to conclude that his own words would be verified, that we should never meet again.

I was now called to the work of the ministry, and in the prosecution of its arduous duties I thought but little of Edwin. Amidst the multifarious changes, both of scene and of society, which I was destined to experience, the remembrance of our early friendship was gradually fading from my mind.

In the spring of 1834, when I was stationed in the Colchester circuit, I received an appointment to preach in London on a missionary occasion. At the close of the evening service, a stranger presented me with a note. I immediately broke the seal and found it was from Edwin. The following extract will show the purport of it: . . . "I wish much to see you. Will you favor me with a call? I am not worthy of it; but I feel my life to be drawing near to its close, and I shall soon be numbered with the dead. I am a poor unhappy sinner. Your counsel at this time may be of service to me. The bearer will inform you of my lodgings. Pray for your unfortunate EDWIN."

Whether it was owing to my surprise at receiving so unexpected a communication, or whether it arose from the distressing intelligence it conveyed, I can not tell; but immediately on finishing its perusal my whole frame became exceedingly agitated. Having obtained the necessary information, as to his residence, I dismissed the messenger with a promise that I would call on the following day.

I slept but little that night. The morning at length dawned, and I arose unrefreshed. After partaking of a slight breakfast I proceeded in the direction of his lodgings. As I passed along the bells of St. Saviour's Church were ringing a merry peal. Their sweetly-musical tones, as the fresh breeze wafted them across the Thames, seemed to compensate for the dullness of the morning. The sun was not visible, but a dense fog, so common in the metropolis, rendered the atmosphere damp and oppressive.

I now arrived at the house which corresponded with the instructions which I received on the preceding evening. A member of the family directed me to a small apartment in an upper story, on entering which I beheld my poor school-fellow seated in a corner of the room, with a small round table before him, on which were scattered a few books. He was the same individual who had shared my early friendship; but O how changed! The bloom of his manly cheek had faded, his form was wasting away under the latent workings of disease, and his eye shot from its sunken orbit a glance of despondency and grief. The extreme difficulty that he felt in breathing, the altered tone of his voice when he rose to address me, and a cough, which was evidently occasioned by an affection of the lungs—all these external symptoms convinced me that he was laboring under pulmonary consumption. Seating myself by his side, I expressed the pleasure I felt in once more seeing him in the "vale of tears."

"And to me," he said, "it has been indeed a vale of tears; and doubly so from the fact that most of the sorrows I have experienced have been the effects of my own misconduct. The advice which you gave me when I left my native town proved, at first, a check to my dissolute habits, and for several months after my arrival in London my evenings were spent in the retirement of my own chamber. I had no companions, nor did I desire any. I had obtained a good situation, and one that afforded many pecuniary advantages. My mind, however, became restless. I felt tired of such a sedentary mode of life, and once more sighed after the pleasures of the world.

"In an evil hour I, one Sunday afternoon, strayed to one of those tea-gardens, with which the suburbs so greatly abound. Here I became again entangled with the workers of iniquity, and commenced a course of folly and dissipation, which has undermined my constitution and burdened my conscience with an accumulated weight of guilt and misery, which has become almost intolerable.

"On that occasion I met with several young men of respectable appearance, and passed in their company, what I then thought, a very pleasant evening. We did not separate till a late hour, and agreed to meet again at a certain inn on the following night. Regardless of the future, I only thought of present enjoyment—sung the drunkard's song and laughed the hours away. Indeed, the society of these young men, and others to whom I was subsequently introduced, became almost indispensable to my existence.

"But I need not recount the many scenes of iniquity which I have witnessed, nor the lengths of folly to which my foolish head led me to run. My health rapidly declined, so that I had scarcely sufficient physical energy to pursue my daily labor. Frequent exposure to the cold midnight air, after being seated for several hours in a densely heated room, brought on a violent cough and a difficulty of respiration.

"About two months since, when returning home from Drury-Lane theater, I felt a peculiarly painful oppression of the chest, and on going into my room I discovered that the expectoration I had discharged was that of clear blood. As these distressing symptoms continued I became extremely alarmed. In vain I courted 'nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep'—I dared not close my eyes, for I was apprehensive of the rupture of a blood-vessel. I, therefore, lay in a state of feverish excitement. I thought of the course of sin which for so many years I had been pursuing, and wept to think that I should soon have to appear before a holy God. My sins were arrayed before me in all their deformity, and I experienced the agonies of a troubled spirit.

"I had for some time previous to this felt some compunctions of soul, which sometimes induced me to pause before entering the chambers of intemperance, but nothing equal to what I then experienced. I was overwhelmed with a sense of my awful condition, and involuntarily cried out, 'O Lord, I am oppressed, undertake for me!' 'Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy Holy Spirit from me.'

"These convictions, though not perhaps so powerful, continued to follow me for several weeks, during which I never entered a public house, nor even saw any of my dissolute companions. One evening I was returning to my lodgings, after the labors of the day, when, passing through Bedford Square, my ears caught the sound of music—soft, mournful, and plaintive. Being passionately fond of music, I was attracted to the spot, and for some time listened with considerable emotion to the delightful strains. But it was the subject of one of the pieces that most affected me, namely, the popular air of 'Home, Sweet Home.' It brought to my recollection the home of my childhood—the scenes of my juvenile days. I thought of my father, whose pious counsels I had despised, and of the many happy hours that I spent under his roof, ere my follies and vices had brought a reproach upon my character, and I turned aside to wipe away the tears which began to fill my eyes. At this critical moment I recognized among the crowd one of my old companions. I instantly left the spot, but it was too late. He had seen me, and was soon at my side. 'Edwin,' said he, 'what is the matter with you? And where have you been for so long a time?' I told him I felt unwell and was fearful I was in a decline. He laughed heartily, and, taking my arm, dragged me violently along till we arrived at the door of a tavern. For some time I resolutely withstood the temptation. 'Come in, you silly fellow!' he exclaimed, 'a few glasses of brandy and water will soon restore your health.'

"Alas! I suffered myself to be enticed, and found myself once more seated in a public house. On rising to depart I found Davis—the name of my companion—to be unusually elated by the effects of what he had been drinking, though I had cautiously taken but little. As we passed along the street he became quarrelsome, and made use of the most abusive language to some persons whom we encountered, till at length a policeman came up, and in the struggle that ensued Davis escaped, but I was taken to the Gilbert's Compter, and there confined for the night. And O, what a night!

"But I will not attempt to describe the agony I then experienced. On the next morning I was taken before a magistrate, and after receiving a sharp reprimand and paying a small fine was discharged. Being now at liberty I was determined to make the best use of it, and as I was becoming more and more disgusted with London life, I wrote to my father, begging him to furnish me with a sufficient sum of money to defray my expenses home. I have already received a favorable answer, and to-morrow is fixed for my departure. My life has been a scene of sin and wretchedness. In the pursuit of pleasure I have found sorrow and disappointment, and daily experience has confirmed the truth of Scripture, 'The way of transgressors is hard.'

"A few days since I saw an advertisement announcing that you would preach at — Chapel. I longed for an interview with you previous to my departure, and for that purpose sent the note which has once more brought us together. I have a solemn impression on my mind that this will be our last meeting on earth. My disease is rapidly gaining ground, and my strength diminishes daily. O that I could say, 'To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain!'

He thus finished the story of his vices and his griefs, during the delivery of which he appeared greatly excited, and several times raised his handkerchief to his eyes to stem the briny torrents which his lacerated feelings produced.

While giving expression to the closing sentence I looked upon him with tenderness and pity. At length he appeared more composed, and I availed myself of the opportunity to direct him to the Savior of sinners. I spoke of the efficacy of his divine atonement, and of its adaptation to the case of a penitent sinner. Then referring to the promises of the Gospel, so sweet and so precious, I said, "Now, my dear Edwin, can not you venture on this foundation? What hinders? It is true you have sinned, but Christ died for the ungodly; you are groaning under the burden of guilt, but Christ died to remove it; you are seeking salvation, and Christ says, 'Come unto me and I will give you rest.' Will you not take him at his word? Will you not rely upon his merits? O be not faithless, but believe! Now is the accepted time, behold, now is the day of salvation!"

"O that I had yielded sooner!" he sobbed, "and torn myself from those vile associates, who led me into sin!"

"You have at length yielded," I said, "and it is not too late. 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.'"

"There is one thing," said he, "with which you are probably unacquainted, and to which I attribute much of that indifference to religion which I began to feel even previous to my being seduced into vile company. My father, for many years, attended to the duty of family worship; but soon after my apprenticeship I discovered a growing laxity in the exercise of that essential part of Christianity. It was occasionally neglected under the pretense of business, till at length it was altogether laid aside. The consequence was, he became worldly-minded and I became careless about my soul. I have heard, however, since I left home, he has most painfully felt this dereliction of duty."

O that the heads of families would lay this to heart!

I continued with Edwin for some time, and having given him the best advice in my power engaged in prayer on his behalf. On taking my departure tears began to fill my eyes. I was leaving my earliest companion—my school-fellow—and it was more than probable that we should never again meet till the day when the dead, small and great, shall stand before God.

"Adieu!" I murmured, and was making my way toward the door. "Stop!" he exclaimed, and again seizing my hand, which he literally bathed with tears, said, in a faint tone of voice, "I am going home—to die. Pray for me, that when I am called I may be found ready. Vale, in æternum, vale."

Poor Edwin! we parted, and I never saw him more.

On visiting my native town a few years subsequently I met with several of his relatives, from whom I learned that he had long since been removed to a better world. He had been enabled, in the eleventh hour, to cast himself on the mercy of God, through faith in a crucified Savior; and having obtained an assurance of forgiveness, at length exchanged a life of suffering for a life of glory.

THE LITTLE GIRL AND GOD.

A MERRY little girl, just turned of four, wandered into a vacant room of her house, with a singular look of solemn adventure in her face, and closed the door behind her. Her mother, who had caught a passing glimpse of the countenance, followed softly after, and paused before the door in listening. Presently she heard a timid little voice say, "God!" "God!" Then came an interval of silence. Then the voice again somewhat louder, "God!" "God!" Another pause—longer. Once more the voice, earnest but faltering—and very entreating in its tone—"God!" "God!"

The mother entered the room.

"What is it, Anna?"

"O, I wanted to see—"

"To see what?"

"If—if—"

"Well."

"If God would speak to me. You told me God was every-where. You said I could talk to him and he would hear me. I was trying if he would only say 'Anna.'"

There was room in that little brain for one or two more lessons about God, which the young mother did not fail to impart. Very often curiosity is excited in the juvenile mind, and then it is left to work out its thoughts as best it can. Parents should always be ready and willing to attend fully to their children's inquiries.

WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED.

BY J. D. BELL.

THE booksellers of America, almost with one accord, declare that there is but a single comprehensive dictionary of our vernacular tongue, which every mechanic, student, and learned professor should adopt as his daily directory and standard, and that this chosen one is Webster's Unabridged.

But the voice of the booksellers can not, of course, be allowed to go for much among thinking men in these times of frenzied book-speculation. Indeed, it may be asserted, with a good deal of reason, that one would not miss much of real worth in print, nowadays, were he to pass stoically along through the public marts, taking it for granted that every flaming advertisement, or gilt-edged commendation, that catches at his eye from the street-corners, is but a copy of what Ben Johnson would have called,

"The most unprofitable sign of nothing."

Most certain it is, that in this way he would escape being humbugged, many a time, out of his wits as well as his dollars, by the specious emptiness put up in book-form, and advertised into notoriety by speculators in the Fanny Fern and Barnum literature, every-where so marketable at the present day.

So, setting aside entirely what the booksellers say, let us see if we may not reach the same conclusion as to that which they pretend to have come by way of better premises.

In the first place, then, we observe that every lexicographer may be viewed in two lights: first, as to his peculiarities; and second, as to his comparative merits. Let us now glance at Noah Webster in each of these aspects, in order to determine in what estimation we should hold his dictionary. Well, then, we may ask, what and of what account are Webster's peculiarities?

If the great lexicographer were living to-day, and were to be questioned as to the changes he endeavored to make in the structure and use of our tongue through the medium of his system of lexicography, we may conceive, very nearly, what his response would be. He would say that from his earliest years our language was the theme of his thoughts and his studies; that his interest in its history and development grew with the growth and strengthened with the strength of his mind; that to a clear understanding of its origin and structure he labored indefatigably and not without success; that as he pushed forward his inquiries he made new discoveries with regard to the analogies and tendencies of our tongue; that he came to see the truth of Quintilian's observation, that "speech was not formed by an analogy sent from heaven," but was the fabrication of men, and, as a consequence, must be ever liable to corruption by the extravagances of ignorance and the caprices of innovation.

He would say that he found our language, in his day, exposed to many and great dangers; that the practical tendencies of the age, as well as the spirit of the American people, were against its continuing longer in a state of even tolerable purity; that there was no standard dictionary adapted to the circumstances and wants of our growing and already great republic; that Johnson's was too old, and Walker's too full of impracticable rules and ideal distinctions; that from a thousand influences, peculiar to our country alone, we were verging upon dialectical diversities, which, if not counteracted, would, sooner or later, operate fatally against a unity of national feeling; that by the influx of foreigners, new and heterogeneous elements were constantly creeping into our language and tending to reduce its power; that from the want of a proper standard of lexicography the growth of our literature had been stifled, and etymology, orthography, and orthoepy had been sadly neglected; that, as a consequence, bad idioms and odious provincialisms had gained, and were gaining, the credit of polite usage; and that, under these circumstances, he undertook the toilsome task of compiling a dictionary which should be adapted to the character of the American people; and which, while it contributed largely to preserve the purity of our vernacular, and to foster that unity of feeling so essential to our success as a nation, should, at the same time, tend to keep warm the tie that binds us to the land where our language had its birth.

He would say that in forming the plan of his work he laid it down, in the onset, as a principle, from which there should be as little departure as possible, that analogy and its claims should be superior to all individual authority, and subject only to one unvarying rule of uniformity; that accordingly he was led to classify all words of like formation, and for analogy's sake to give them, as far as practicable, like orthography; that, therefore, he determined to leave out the u in such words as honor, labor, inferior, and their derivatives; to omit k in such words as music and public; to substitute er for re in such words as center, theater, luster, and scepter; to spell defense, expense, and the like, with e instead of c; to omit the e in high; to write all words formed from the Greek and Latin iso with the termination ice instead of ice; to spell all such words as blamable, movable, salable, etc., without e, except after c and g; to preserve ll in all the derivatives of dull, full, skill, and the like; and to spell all the derivatives of verbs of two or more syllables, ending in a single unaccented consonant, preceded by a single vowel, as traveler, without doubling the consonant.

He would say further, that his vivid apprehension of the wants of an eminently practical age led him to bestow peculiar care on the etymology and explanation of words; that he determined to exhibit more fully and accurately than had ever before been done the true genesis of our language; that, to accomplish this important object, he spent days on the history of single words, tracing them up, from nation to nation, and from age to age, and gathering from the tradition of intermediate tongues the features they had lost and gained in their meandering pathway down to us; that he aspired, too, after full, forcible, satisfactory, and complete definitions—a department of lexicography, before his time, strangely neglected; that, in this respect, he made it his aim to aptly meet the necessities of every profession of life, from the lowest to the highest, from that of a common counting-house clerk to that of a learned and critical expounder of jurisprudence; that he also endeavored to present a true system of pronunciation, one that should conform to a pure and manly taste, and which, while it answered every purpose of a polished literary education, should, at the same time, be as simple and easy to be apprehended as possible; that he, therefore, avoided all those extremes of affected orthoepy into which Walker, and others before as well as after him, unwisely suffered themselves to be misled; that he deemed it worse than useless to incumber words with a multiplicity of marks and figures, and utterly impossible to express on paper the nice distinctions which the ear recognizes in a rapid enunciation of slight sounds; and that, finally, with these peculiarities of orthography, etymology, explanation, and pronunciation, he bequeathed his work, the product of sixty years of labor and of care, to his country and the world, “with the spirit of a man who has endeavored well,” and whose trust is founded in the sure and unchanging tendencies of truth to an immortality of usefulness and fame.

Such, though perhaps in more full and forcible terms, would doubtless be Webster's own statement, could he speak to-day as to the peculiarities of his system of lexicography. And from it we may draw the conclusion that his grand object was, not merely to supplant other systems already in use, by assuming to have made some slight improvements on them, but to give our language a securer drift and a more enduring strength, by instituting a tribunal of principle for settling its difficulties, and for swaying its tendencies. He sought to do away the bugbear of mere nominal authority which had so long hindered its progress, and to substitute the laws of analogy in the room of personal dictation. He not only introduced wise changes, by way of improvement, but he set the whole language on improving itself. He breathed into it, as it were, the spirit of democratic progress. He attempted to transform it into a republic of words. Nearly every lexicographer that had gone before him had only added new chains of local prejudice and caprice to bind it down, and to crush out its original life. It had only passed from one system of tyranny to another in coming down from Johnson's time to his own. He found it with its principles bleeding and its tendencies corrupted; and under its bondage of freakish and fatal innovation, to all human appearance, doomed, ultimately, to sink into a wild chaos of absurd and irretrievable anomalies. This process of oppressive transformation and dislocation Webster arrested. He set the language, in a measure, free from arbitrary authority; and by correcting its misdirected tendencies, and by infusing into it a new spirit of progress, he contributed greatly toward bringing it into harmony with the laws of its own being. And thus he began a new era in the history of the language.

The facility with which most of his proposed emendations and improvements were almost at once carried into general practice, attest the wisdom with which they were adopted by him and recommended. It is true his system of lexicography has had to pass its ordeal of opposition. And well it might if there be truth in Hooker's remark, that “change is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better.” Nearly every reformation he proposed has been severely contested; but not one has yet failed to make its own defense with triumphant success. A few have not yet been generally accepted; and the only reason why they have not is, because they have not been contested with sufficient earnestness and vigor to make their real consistency apparent to careless and indifferent minds. You can not find one of his peculiarities that has not a firm foundation for it in reason or nature. Webster proposed no whims. He sought rather to put a stop to an endless multiplication of whims. Every change he recommended is in keeping with some great principle, and can not but challenge the keenest inspection and defy the most stubborn opposition. Take, if you please, one which, as yet, seems to have been slower than any other in becoming generally current: we mean the substitution of er for re, in a certain class of words derived from the French, among which are center, theater, and luster.

Now, the reason for this substitution seems to most persons, at first sight, to be obscure and capricious. But a moment's examination may convince any disinterested inquirer that this is not the case. The design of Webster in making the change was to heal a wounded principle of analogy that had been long neglected, and, as a consequence, was occasioning a bad disorder in the language. He saw that the correct English spelling of that class of words was with the termination or instead of re; that a large proportion of the class—such as diameter, chamber, disaster, disorder, charter, tiger, and number, and many others—had already conformed to it, and, moreover, that there had been a tendency, indicated in the highest usage of our language, ever since the time of Sir Isaac Newton—for he, as well as Pope, and Camden, and Milton fostered it—to bring the whole class under the same regimen. Such being the circumstances in the case, what more or less could any reasonable man do than make the change at once, and thus do away a needless group of anomalies? We might go on, in this way, and review other changes proposed by Webster, which have, as yet, only come into partial use, owing to the fact that the wisdom and consistency with which they were suggested and advised, have not yet been properly sought after and duly appreciated; but we deem such a course of procedure entirely irrelevant to our present undertaking, as well as unnecessary, since any one who will take the pains may find an abler defense than we can give of the whole system of the great lexicographer near at hand. We hasten, therefore, to view Webster as to his comparative merits.

In every field of mental labor that involves classification, we find a series of great systemizers, each of which has followed his predecessor with a new and peculiar cluster of improvements. The names of these illustrious men stand alone in history; and while those of other men, who figured in the successive lapses of time between the different epochs they represent, have almost faded away from the memory of mankind, these seem but to have been gaining new brightness at every step of human progress. Thus in tracing the history of metaphysics we meet with Plato, and Aristotle, and Bacon, and Locke, and the various schools that bear their names. Thus, too, in the history of poetry we meet with Homer, and Pindar, and Horace, and Chaucer, and Shakspeare, and Wordsworth, and the several epochs of style with which the names of these poets will ever stand connected. There has been, to some extent, a similar succession of great projectors and systems of improvement in the progress of lexicography. The first lexicographer who identified his name, as a true reformer, with the use of our language was Johnson. With him there commenced a new era in letters. He found the language, in his time, to use his own words, "copious without order, and energetic without rule." He set himself on reducing this chaos to order, and in a measure succeeded. With his immense learning and unequalled skill he corrected many erratic tendencies, and gave our language a new disposition and character. His spirit moved upon the wild waters and they obeyed him. But considering the state in which he found our vernacular, it is evident that with all his improvements he could not have left it perfect.

After the time of Johnson there followed a train of superficial modifiers—such as Sheridan, Kenrick, Walker, Jones, and Jameson—none of whom can be said to have made any radical and lasting improvements, and some of whom, particularly Sheridan and Walker, must be regarded rather as corrupters than improvers of our language. For even if it be admitted that some parts of their several systems are changes for the better, yet these, as Walker's clearly shows, are so mixed in with palpable whims and perversions, as to make it fairly a matter of doubt, on the whole, whether they did more good than hurt. Thus was the pathway of lexicography thronged with sikle innovators down to the time of Webster. It remained for him to take up the language nearly as Johnson left it and make a radical reformation. He found disorders and tendencies to disorder, which Johnson, amid the confusion of dialects that surrounded him, was forced to leave unremedied and unrelieved. He found inconsistencies and anomalies that had arisen, and were continually multiplying, from needless violations of the principles of analogy. These he endeavored to do away by a wise method of purification and reconstruction. With him our whole language, like the science of astronomy when Galileo made his appearance, assumed a new aspect. He substituted nature for art, reason for caprice. Happy had it been for our vernacular tongue had no superficial modifier followed in his wake! But regret it as we may, such has been the case. A train of would-be reformers, similar though not so numerous as that which followed on the heels of Johnson, have been essaying, ever since Webster's Unabridged was issued, to supplant it by their own whimsical modifications of its great plan. We can not speak of them all but in general terms; and speaking thus, it is not too much to say that they have, without exception, proved themselves corrupters instead of improvers. This could not have been otherwise, considering the nature of the attempts which they made. Their chief claim is in the matter of pronunciation. They insist upon having done wonders here, when in fact they have only done damages. It requires but a brief inspection of the system of any one of these second-hand lexicographers to detect the extreme weakness of its pretensions.

It was a wise observation of the great man whose dictionary we are considering, that "the multiplicity of books for instructing us in our vernacular tongue is an evil of no small magnitude. Every man has some peculiar notions which he wishes to propagate, and there is scarcely any peculiarity or absurdity for which some authority may not be found. The facility of book-making favors this disposition; and while a chief qualification for authorship is a dexterous use of an inverted pen and a pair of scissors, we are not to expect relief from the evil." Now, if we bear in mind the fact that the system of Webster lies at the bottom, and is the very sine qua non, so to speak, of every system that has been projected and circulated since his was put forth; and, moreover, that his dictionary can not, at most, be supplanted but over a limited area, how can we come to any other conclusion than that nothing short of a universally acknowledged necessity in the case would justify any attempt to supplant it? That there has been no such necessity, and will not be for decades of years yet to come, it is needless for us to assert. Every one knows that Webster's Unabridged has been for the last score of years not only adopted as the great standard of our language, but cherished as a book next in importance to the Bible itself, by the larger part of England and nearly the whole of the American republic. We make no extravagant assertion, but one which can not be doubted, when we say that the majority of our people would to-day pronounce it impossible to prove that dictionary deficient, in any important respect, as a national standard, without putting pretension and sophistry to the utmost stretch. In what other light, then, can we view those whose aim is to supplant Webster's Unabridged by their own systems, than as mere propagandists of insignificant notions and predilections? To show that we may rightly view them thus, let us specify some of the pretended merits of their dictionaries. And we will take for an example that of J. E. Worcester, which, we are sorry to say, has, by dint of extraordinary exertion in its behalf, been adopted as a standard of our tongue, to a limited extent, in certain portions of our country. Now, it requires but a glance to see the folly of the claims this lexicographer urges as an apology for attempting to supersede Webster's Unabridged. His whole system is but a modification of Webster's, with the addition of a few boasted improvements in orthoepy. In the preface to his dictionary he observes, that "in the preparation of this work pronunciation has been made a leading object, and as a pronouncing dictionary it will be found to possess peculiar advantages." Now, let us see what these advantages amount to. In the first place, he claims an advantage in having exhibited a great many different authorities in every case of doubtful, various, or disputed pronunciation. But what has he gained in doing this? Any reasonable person must see that it can be of no service to our language or to those who speak it, in this age, to append a list of superannuated and superseded modes of pronunciation to words. It is but the exhibition of an unmanly and self-abusing attachment to the past, for a lexicographer of these times to go to the fickle English orthoepists, that succeeded Johnson, to find standard decisions in pronunciation. It would be just as reasonable for an American President to cross the ocean and consult the monarchs and despots of Europe as to the best methods of carrying out the various ends of republicanism. It is time the principles of orthoepy were rescued from the crushing wheels of this Juggernaut of authority. Our language has been tortured long enough by personal caprice and arbitrary dictation. The man who would seek to perpetuate this bondage of names can not be regarded as an improver. He stands in the way of the progress of our language, and, what is worse, gives it tendencies backward rather than forward. By dooming himself to be controlled by nominal authority, Worcester has been led to adopt and recommend some of the most intolerable inconsistencies of pronunciation. Take, for example, his change of the sound of s in possess, disable, disinterested, etc., into that of an ugly and unwarrantable s. Take also his perversion of the sound of ak, no, or neh into the disgusting nasal sound of agk in such words as twinkle, concord, function, and anchor, and his preference for the corrupt sound of short e instead of æ in the word deaf. So much for Worcester's pretended advantages on the score of authority. His next claim is in regard to his manner of notation. He pretends to have realized a long-desired advantage in exactly discriminating the different sounds and varieties of sounds of the letters. Now, it was demonstrated long ago, by the almost perfect failure of Walker's system of pronunciation, that all attempts at representing slight sounds, in a manner adapted for practice, must be entirely abortive. It were a thing very much like attempting to reduce to constellations those myriads of undiscoverable stars that constitute the whiteness of the milky way. There are certain distinctions of sound that no method of notation can reach, much less settle upon for general use. Take, for instance, the sounds of e and i in the unaccented syllables of most words that contain them. What speaker of the English language is there that would ever think of going to a dictionary to find out how the e should be sounded in the final syllable of blessedness, or the i in the third syllable of severity? Webster considered this matter of notation well, and he expressly asserts that the true pronunciation of unaccented vowels is best caught by the ear, and that it is worse than useless to incumber words with a multiplicity of marks and figures.

We might point out many other egregious weaknesses as well as absurdities in Worcester's system of lexicography did we think it appropriate to do so in the present connection.

The so-called phonographic pronouncing dictionary, put forth by William Bolles, lies open to somewhat similar exceptions as that of Worcester; and so we find it to be with every dictionary that has been brought into competition with Webster's Unabridged. All these would-be improvers carry the point of notation to an absurd extreme, and tend to thwart the tendencies of our language to true progress, by reviving and reinforcing defunct or superseded authority.

From the foregoing considerations we are forced to the conclusion that there is truly but one dictionary of the English language justly entitled to be adopted and cherished by us as a national standard. We regard Webster's Unabridged as the most precious as well as noble boon that American genius has ever conferred upon our republic. Who can open that great work and not be awe-struck with the vastness of its plan and the triumphant completeness of its execution? It is a sublime achievement of human perseverance and thought. Look back over the history of our country and point, if you can, to any single work, more grand and more powerful, that has been performed since the framing of our national Constitution. You can not point to one. As a nation we have built great cities, enlarged our territory immensely, founded powerful institutions of religion, benevolence, and learning, and almost annihilated time and distance by converting the swift-winged lightning into a faithful message-bearer; yet, as a people, what higher boast can we make than that a man of our own American spirit and blood has planned and wrought out for us a national dictionary of our tongue? Think of a great nation, the greatest in the world, depending for the very essence of its power upon one chosen and cherished book, holding this as the book next in value to the Bible itself, and even renewing its structure from the rich and exhaustless quarry of thought it contains! Such a reflection, we fancy, can not fail to awaken in the dullest soul the most sublime emotions. Webster's Dictionary has done more toward promoting our prosperity as a people for the last score of years than any other single agency that can be named. By that we have secured a high standing among other nations in the literary world. By that all attempts at capricious innovation have, in a great measure, been checked, and we have been preserved from being reduced to babble a language deformed by heterogeneous dialects and provincial peculiarities. By that the various branches of our national school system have been bound into one beautiful community of letters, and made to drink the bright waters of one glorious fountain of intelligence. Webster has been the great teacher of our republic. He has educated it and guided its successful march of literary progress. In the fine words of a late writer, "not a man has sprung from its soil, on whom he has not laid his all-forming hand. His principles of language have tinged every sentence that is now or will be uttered by an American tongue. His genius has presided over every scene in the nation. It is universal, omnipotent, omnipresent. No man can breathe the air of the continent and escape it. . . . When our republic rose he became its school-master. There had never been a great nation with a universal language without dialects. The Yorkshireman can not now talk with a man from Cornwall. The peasant of the Ligurian Apennines drives his goats home at evening over hills that look down on six provinces, none of whose dialects he can speak. Here five thousand miles change not the sound of a word. Around every fireside and from every tribune, in every field of labor and every factory of toil, is heard the same tongue. We owe it to Webster. He has done more for us than Alfred did for England, or Cadmus for Greece."

And now, in conclusion, let us hope that such noble achievements will not soon be lost sight of by a people that has shared so bountifully in them. No, no. We will not forget our great schoolmaster. We will not suffer his unequalled book to be rudely shoved from our tables to give place for another. Through a long lapse of time we will continue to consult those richly-freighted pages, and draw instruction from them. Far hence, it is true, an age will come when that dictionary will need to be revised and enlarged; but in behalf of the genius and refined scholarship of him who laid its enduring foundations, may it never, never cease to be called Webster's Unabridged!

MY FRIEND CARRIE.

BY HERBY NORY.

WHEN we place our affections on the things of this world without any regard to the future, how apt we are to be deceived—how sure to be disappointed! Things of earth are fading and sure to decay. The objects on which our affections are placed are the first to vanish.

As I mingle with the world I am often led to think of an early acquaintance of mine—Carrie was her name—that was born and raised in the town where I once lived. She was the third, and, to appearance, the most promising daughter of affectionate parents, whom the mother looked upon as the support of her declining years. She married the man of her early choice and settled in a beautiful little cottage but a few rods from her parents' dwelling; was surrounded by every thing that could make home a paradise or life desirable—peace, love, and contentment reigned in their dwelling, the fashionable and gay courted their society, and by both words and actions fostered their worldly ambition. In two or three years after her marriage, I, together with a more intimate friend of hers, called to spend a few hours in social intercourse. The afternoon passed pleasantly and rapidly away. In the course of the afternoon she led me around to show me her house, which was constructed in quite a modern style and different from any I had then seen. As we went from room to room I every-where saw specimens of her industry, economy, and ingenuity, which struck me at once with admiration. I said to her, "How pleasantly you are situated, Carrie! I see nothing to prevent you from enjoying life." As I spoke my eyes rested upon her. Hers brightened with a peculiar luster. She gave her head a significant toss, and replied with something more than her usual gayety, "No body so happy as I." Her words were indelibly impressed upon my mind. I looked upon her with a kind of foreboding sorrow which I could not erase from my mind, being somewhat older than she was, and having been called to experience some of the ups and downs of life, the deceitfulness of worldly hopes, and the danger of trusting too much to earth's treasures for happiness. We parted that evening, she gay as the gayest, but I more than commonly reflective.

A few weeks from that time Carrie was taken sick; her mother was sent for. All that a devoted mother, an idolizing husband and other friends, together with the skillful family physician, could do was done, but nothing could arrest the progress of the disease. At first she thought it hard to die so young, when life was so desirable, so full of pleasure. Her sickness was protracted. She was enabled to see her delusion and seek for happiness of a more durable substance. She lingered some weeks, then fell a victim to the great destroyer, which lays all ranks and conditions of mankind upon a common level. She left an evidence that she had obtained pardon before her death and died tranquil. I was there when her spirit took its departure. It was heart-rending to hear the heavy groans of her mother, and see the despondency of her husband and other friends. I could but mark the contrast between the spirit that prevailed in the little cottage that night and the afternoon I spent there a few months before, when Carrie said, "No body so happy as I." We trust she was happy then; but what a change in worldly circumstances! What a gloom filled the house and neighborhood, for Carrie was beloved! Thus, with all her anticipations of earthly bliss before her, she was snatched away, hopes were crushed, visions fled, and earthly happiness proved to her but a dream—a phantom that allured but to deceive.

Reader, are thy hopes and prospects all of an earthly nature? Hast thou not yet laid up a treasure that is not perishable? one that flatters not to deceive? The Holy Spirit invites thee now to participate in the joys of the redeemed; to raise thy heart and affections above the delusive charms of earth. Like Carrie, thy soul may soon be required of thee. Art thou ready?

If you would properly erect the edifice of personal improvement, the foundation must be laid in moral purity.

WONOMSCOPOMIC.*

BY H. N. POWERS.

THE dainty ripples lisping summer speech,
 Tease pearly blossoms nestling near the shore;
 On slopes of sunshine robins sit and teach,
 In undertones, the happy air their love.
 A purple cloud hung in voluptuous blue
 Waits for some mystic message from the pines;
 Shades drowse sweet nooks, and odors wanton through
 The glossy ringlets of luxuriant vines.
 Their golden bosoms leaning round and round,
 The harvest fields a ripe contentment know;
 Through ancient groves and o'er low meadow ground
 A murmurous gladness ever seems to flow.
 Far off the circling mountains stand and doze,
 With vistas opening into shimmering haze,
 And the low clouds which, on bald peaks repose,
 Seem like the fire of some half-smothered blaze.
 Before me, in this quiet, sleeps the lake,
 Like some pure heart where heaven deep-mirrored lies,
 And still so winning that its friendships make
 All that it loves more lovely in our eyes.
 I muse along the margin, where the joy
 Of Beauty thrilled me with delicious pain;
 But deeper in my heart than when a boy,
 Streams the calm glory of the scene again.

NEW-YEAR'S EVE, 1854.

BY GABRIEL MYER.

ANOTHER New-Year's eve! What wizard sprite,
 Or light-winged fairy, charms December's moon,
 That she doth smile so pleasantly to-night?
 Our thoughts turn truant back to rose-cheeked
 June.
 I close my eyes and dream, though not asleep;
 Would mine were all such rainbow-tinted dreams!
 Then life would be a river, tranquil, deep,
 Serenely flowing with the crystal streams
 That wind, like silver threads, thro' summer vales,
 When stars burn fervently in Even's bowers,
 And blue-eyed Morning trims her dewy sails
 To bear afar the spicy breath of flowers.
 The spirits of the night march sadly now
 To see the old year yield his weary breath;
 Dark shadows gather on his wrinkled brow;
 Weird midnight groans shall chant the song of death.
 Not like the moon that, slowly, toward the west
 Shall journey all night long without a cloud;
 He travels on to his eternal rest:
 Not only have the coffin and the shroud
 Of peaceful death brought fear to stalwart men
 And fragile women—trembling at a frown—

* The Indian name of a beautiful lake in Salisbury, Connecticut.

Lips wailed and shrieked more fearfully than when
 The Arctic, with her precious weight, went down.

Dark was thine onward pathway, dying year,
 With wreck, and storm, and pestilence; but yet
 Ere summer's leaves had fallen, faded, sear,
 A darker seal was on thy forehead set!

The fires of war athwart the crescent's path,
 In redness streaming, broke the Moslem's ease—
 The sounds of battle mingled with the wrath
 Of tempests raging on the orient seas.

They sleep—at Alma, Inkermann, and Kara,
 Osmanli, English, French, and Russian, sleep
 On gory pillows, watched by fiery Mars—
 Heart-broken thousands for the fallen weep.

Is this the last? or did the prophet's eye
 See darkly through a veil, delusive, dim?
 The last of human strife, ere to the sky,
 From earth, ascends the great millennial hymn?

The sullen power that sits in sunny fanes,
 In triumph, rising, lifts his flaming spear—
 A kingdom added to his wide domains,
 'Twas thine and ours to see, O dying year!

'Tis said where Kansas' glorious sunsets flame,
 A river glides in many a silvery coil—
 "The Weeping river"—'tis a fitting name
 For all that water young Nebraska's soil.

The very streams should mourn that these fair lands,

With such a curse so marred and stained should be,
 That men should fetter hearts, and souls, and hands

Where float the starry banners of the free!

Behold, the old year dies! The golden bells
 Of Hope fall, tinkling clearer, on the ear,
 While wide throughout the moonlit ether swells
 A merry welcome to the glad new year.

ICE-DROPS.

BY MRS. M. A. BIGELOW.

SEE the mimic blossoms hanging
 Thick on every bud and spray;
 When the sun shines out a moment
 They will melt and drop away.

Hark, the wind is breathing gently
 Through the ice-incrusted trees,
 And a sweet enchanting music
 Floateth on the morning breeze

Thus along life's frozen valley,
 Oft we hear some pleasing sound;
 But perchance it ends as sadly—
 Ends with branches falling round.

Now the gems of joy are shining
 All along our youthful way,
 But, alas! like these frost blossoms,
 They are destined to decay.

THE THRONE OF GRACE.

CLEMENCY is one of a sovereign's noblest qualities, and its exercise must to himself be as delightful as its exhibition is to beholders endearing and impressive. But it is not always that his office as administrator of law and guardian of the public welfare, allows him to indulge his private or personal disposition: for, by a false leniency, by being too soft and facile, and so making pardons too frequent, a sovereign may multiply crimes, and may bring his laws into contempt; while, by letting loose on society a host of miscreants, for whose reformation no means have been taken, he may contaminate the virtuous community, and may inflict on his dominions an injury more grievous than if he broke up a pest-house and scattered its contagious inmates through all his provinces.

Of the arrangement to which we owe our amnesty we do not know the entire details, but we know such things as these: 1. It was no suggestion of a third party, much less was it a device of the culprit's own; it was "a mystery of godliness," an extrication which Wisdom, moved by tender Mercy, found out, and which God alone could propose to God. 2. It was an expedient which amply vindicated the broken law, and held forth no encouragement to a repetition of the first transgression. The eternal Son of God became man, and taking a nature that could die, he offered an atonement for sin, exhaustive and complete, and brought in a righteousness everlasting and redundant, which is counted as the righteousness of all the second Adam's family. And, while thus magnifying the law and justifying the ungodly, the magnificence of the sacrifice was the best security against a pardon so purchased encouraging a spirit of levity or lawlessness. It is as much as said, These are the lightest terms which Justice can accept. No ransom less costly can release from the desert of sin. And if a new race fall from innocence to guilt, or if any member of the human family pass away from earth contemptuous of Calvary, there remains no more sacrifice for sin. In order to obtain remission we must procure a substitute greater than Immanuel—a victim who is more than Divine. 3. It was a plan which abundantly guaranteed the restoration and progressive improvement of the rescued offender. In other words, it insured that the pardoned should not be moral pests, but epistles of goodness and patterns of every excellence sent forth to circulate in the midst of society. And this not merely from the force of generous and grateful emotion, but from a peculiar feature in the scheme of mercy: from that condition in the covenant of grace which secures to the redeemed of the Savior the new-molding and inspiring influence of the Holy Spirit the Comforter. When Demetrius starved into surrender the insurgent city, and assembling the inhabitants in one place, surrounded them with his soldiery, they expected to die; but the conqueror said, "It is not an enemy whom you have refused, but a prince who loved you, and still loves you, and who wishes to revenge himself only by granting you pardon and being still your friend. Return to your homes. While you have been here, my people have been filling your houses with provisions." In the first gush of gratitude, in the first ecstasy of admiration, there would be no lack of loyalty; and yet in the lapse of months and years that loyalty might have died away, and the fickle Athenians might have been in danger of revolting again. And so when God undeceives the arrested transgressor—when he tells him, "I am not your enemy. I so loved the world as to send it a Savior. I grant you a free pardon, and I only seek to be your Friend. And during this interval, while you have been harboring such hard thoughts, and rebelling against me, I have been preparing a feast of fat things for you;" in the first burst of astonishment there will be no want of devotion. "What shall I render to the Lord? Mine ears must be bored. Behold the Lord's servant forever!" But the bones which rejoice grow used to health. The deliverance ceases to be recent; and when early motives lose their freshness, there is a danger lest, along with waning gratitude, obedience grow stunted and formal. But the same economy of grace which confers on the sinner believing an instant pardon, secures to the believer the teaching and quickening of the Holy Spirit: and though his blessed influences may not always be the subject of a vivid consciousness, they are none the less real; and they are so kindly continued and so effectual, that notwithstanding corruption within and temptation without, the believer is enabled to hold on to the last, not only a new and altered man, but most usually a rising and improving character.

"Seeing, then, that we have a great High-Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, . . . let us come boldly unto the Throne of Grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." The graciousness of God is an unchanging perfection. Among our weak and fallen brethren we are accustomed to caprice and uncertainty. The last time we parted with the friend nothing could exceed his frankness and fervor; but as we met him yesterday, all was coldness and unaccountable reserve. The last time we were in the presence of this superior, he was so affable and so confiding that we hoped to rise high in his favor; but as we return to-day, we know not the reason, but his answers are sharp and short, and his face is dark with frowns. You remember the eastern despot. If any entered the presence-chamber unbidden, the monarch might extend the golden scepter, and as the suppliant touched it, he was safe; but if this token were withheld, it was death to the intruder. And the doubt was dreadful. Should the autocrat be in a genial humor, the suppliant's suit is granted and his fortune is made; but just as likely a sleepless night or some vexation has left its thunder on the haughty visage, and when the prostrate petitioner implores the remission of a heavy impost or a reprieve for some doomed kinsman, he is answered with a flash of fury, and, withering like a worm, is carried out to die. But from that caprice and inconsistency which so imbibiter earthly friendships and so darken human governments, the character and the administration of the great I AM are sublimely exempted. Infinitely exalted above the circumstances which influence ourselves, he is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever—as just, as true, as benevolent, as gracious, as when he opened Paradise to the dying thief, and answered the first petition urged in the name of his holy child Jesus. And—for even here we may get helps to our faith in our earthly experiences—just as there have been men in whom there was a lovely reflection of a loftier excellence—men who had so learned of Jesus that to a goodly degree they exhibited his constancy—men who were not creatures of impulse, but under the guidance of goodness—men who were governed not by personal likings or dislikes, but by great judgment-proof first principles: and you could count on them. The reception which they gave you yesterday, you could rely upon to-day; the award which they had delivered in the last submission they would repeat in its present counterpart: so, in the case of him with whom we have to do. He changeth not. All his decisions and all his doings in past conjunctures have been the best which infinite Wisdom could pronounce, or infinite Goodness could perform; and when similar exigencies occur, or similar pleas are offered, like interpositions will occur and like answers will be returned. God is no respecter of persons. His throne is founded on first principles, and all his procedure is that which boundless Benevolence would dictate, and which a Wisdom that knows the end from the beginning would approve. So that we may safely say, that the most absolute of all governments is withal the least arbitrary, and that the scepter whose sway is the most resistless is the scepter under the completest control—the scepter whose movements we could most infallibly calculate if in each case we knew beforehand what equity and kindness required; for it obeys no fitful fiat nor ever yields to passing impulse; but in its oscillations, however causeless or however the result of mere self-acting volition they may appear to us, it is still obeying the “good pleasure of” God’s “goodness.”

So constant is God’s grace that there is nothing on which we may count more securely. The throne which God has set up in this world of ours is a throne of clemency; and “grace reigns” is the purport of every Gospel proclamation. In other words, we are told, that in virtue of the satisfying work of the Savior, it is consistent with God’s holiness to yield to the promptings of his compassion; and now that it is no injustice to cancel expiated sin, it is a great joy to pardon the sinner.

In the exercise of God’s clemency there is nothing arbitrary, nothing capricious or uncertain. All is first principle; all is fixed and revealed arrangement; all partakes the constancy of him whose dispositions, amidst every various dispensation, know no shadow of turning. Nothing will ever alter God’s love for his beloved Son. Nothing will ever lessen his complacency in the finished work of the Savior, or lead him to give a colder reception to the sinner who pleads the merits of Immanuel than he gave to the blasphemer of Tarsus and the converted voluptuaries of Corinth. But as long as man’s Mediator keeps his station at the right hand of the Father—as long as the blood of our divine Brother retains its voice, and speaks better things than the blood of Abel—as long as the echoes of the upper sanctuary repeat that dying cry, “Father, forgive them”—so long will it be just in God to pass by transgression, and so long will it be a joy to all his generosity to bestow the pardon which penitence craves, and which justice no longer withholds.

In order to receive that pardon, we have only to come to God through Jesus Christ. There are no courtly punctilios prescribed, but there is a great principle laid down. That principle is, that whoso shall so far agree with God himself as to give glory to the work of Immanuel, shall benefit by that work; or, otherwise expressed, that whosoever shall subscribe his name to that petition for pardon which has already received the signature of the atoning surety, shall never come into condemnation, but in the very fact is already passed from death to life. In such an event—in the case of such believing in Christ—in the case of such an adhesion to the scheme of mercy, there need be no more doubt as to the forthcoming pardon than there need be distrust in the laws of nature. To those who come for it to the throne of grace, God himself has taught us that his mercies are as sure, as it is sure that the thick cloud will be blotted out and melted away in the blazing beam—as it is sure that the sun will soon salute his expectant gaze whose eyes are turned to the serene and brightening orient—as it is sure that the rich round drops will not spin upward through the firmament and disperse through empty space, but will descend on the outspread, eager soil. If we return to the Lord, thus surely will he raise us up and cause us to live in his sight; for his going forth is prepared as the morning, and he shall come unto us as the latter and former rain comes down on the earth.

Reader! let each of us, then, take words and say, "O God, I am thy creature. Every moment I depend on thee; and if I am to lead a blessed life here and hereafter, it must be a heaven of thine own giving, and it must be given to one whose desert is hell. But I hope in thy mercy. Though it has taught me that thou wilt not connive at sin, the cross of Christ has taught me thy clemency. And encouraged by thine own invitations, I come to thee. I come in the name of him who, occupying the nearest relation to thyself, was so generous as to become the near relation and the all-sufficing representative of our fallen family. O Father of our Lord Jesus, for his sake have mercy on a miserable sinner. His sufferings do thou accept in lieu of my merited punishment, and let his spotless obedience earn my admission to a forfeited heaven. I believe thine own declaration that thou art a God ready to pardon, and I now draw nigh rejoicing to think that it is on a throne of grace that thou givest me this audience. From that throne I beseech thee send down the Holy Spirit the Comforter. May he increase and perpetuate those grateful feelings and devout affections which, I trust, he himself has enkindled, and conduct me to the end of my course a lowly but true-hearted follower of the blessed Redeemer! And whatever else I forget, may I ever remember that I have a great High-Priest who is passed into the heavens; and may I never forget the revelation of this hour; but always come boldly to the throne of grace, that I may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need: for Jesus' sake! Amen."

THE WREATH.

BY REV. L. B. GURLEY.

LAURA K. was the best looking girl in the school at "Spear Grove," a school of by-gone years. And what man or woman, long after the bowers of youth have been left forever, can not look back and remember such a one—one whose name, and features, and history are still fresh in recollection, while others repose under the waves of oblivion!

Laura was bright as she was beautiful, and in such branches as were taught in that school at that day certainly she had no superior—so beautiful in penmanship, so accurate in arithmetic, so correct in pronunciation. In orthography she was at the head of her class always and ever, except once a week, when, for variety, the teacher reversed the class, making the foot the head. This was some encouragement to the dull ones; but as incompetency, when elevated by accident or circumstances, soon develops its real character, and, like water, finds again its own level, so with these, and Saturday would be sure to find Laura again at the head of her class. And then at the spelling school in the evening, where the 'squire and the deacon, and their wives and the young men who had "finished their education," and every body were expected to be present, Laura was peerless. If she "missed" a word, it was a subject for a week's conversation. Every one loved Laura, she was so kind. Little Orpha Brown would always sit beside her, because, as she said, "Miss Laura wouldn't let the other girls plague her on account of her patched dress and moccasins."

How often she was seen sharing her basket of brown, light "doughnuts" and dried venison with little Emma Roe, whose father was dead, and whose scanty dinner was often merely corn-meal cake! But a gay girl was Laura K. She loved to look fine, and to dress a little better than any of her associates. The first Leghorn hat that ever honored Spear Grove was on Laura's head; and the first wreath of artificial flowers known in those parts was on Laura's hat. The first time she wore the wreath was at an evening meeting, and for a time, at least, it seemed to attract more attention than the minister.

But I will not stop to describe how a whole bevy of girls looked at each other, and smiled and winked, and how the young men looked soberly, as if they were wondering whether Laura would ever speak to them again, and how, at the close of the meeting, when the deacon prayed that the "youth of the place might be saved from the fading vanities of the world," all eyes were turned to Laura and her wreath. Even the "Prairie Bard," as they called him—a bashful boy of sixteen years—could not let so fine an opportunity pass without invoking the muses to aid him in giving utterance to his heart-felt emotions. So, musing on the subject he retired to rest. Long before the light of morning dawned he awoke, and after listening awhile to the distant murmuring of Lake Erie he rose, and lighting a lamp at the buried embers of the hearth, he re-ascended to his apartment in the cabin, and actually perpetrated a poem entitled, "The Artificial Flower." The rustic verses ran thus:

"Say, what are those on yonder head-dress hung?
Emblems of roses in expanded bloom;
Not such as nature's smile hath sweetly flung
In wild profuse to cheer the vale's deep gloom.

No, they are but the sickle, gaudy plumes
Formed by the mimic hand of human art.
In vain the wreath a rosy tint assumes;
Alas! no fragrance can those flowers impart.

Better go place them on the wrinkled brow
Of some lost fair—"

But enough for a specimen. Somehow without consent of the author the piece found its way into the county paper, and was circulated in the neighborhood. It was deemed pretty severe moralizing for a young rhymist of sixteen, and there was no small fluttering in the community of Spear Grove. Some said the Prairie Bard had no right to meddle with the matter, as he was no professor; others said it was just right, for "Laura was too proud." But the gay Laura took no offense; she even hinted to a friend that she was pleased with the verses. She smiled on, and studied on, and sported her rosy wreath, and cared for no body.

Years passed before any other girl in Spear Grove ventured to follow her example in superfluous decoration, and when they did so that first wreath was well nigh forgotten.

Now, what influence could that young girl, or her wreath of mimic flowers, have on the future life of that young man? Perhaps none—possibly much. A feather may turn a nicely-balanced scale. Let us see.

A few years on and that young rhymist became a member of the Church. People whispered that he would become a minister. Why they should think so was marvelous to him.

True, he had thought on the subject himself, and felt a strong desire to devote his entire life in publishing to others a Savior who had recently become so precious to him. But he had hinted to no mortal ear his feelings. Even his own desires were rather repressed than fostered. Who was he that he should think of such a responsible position—a backwoods boy, unnoticed and unknown! With no competent education, no pretensions to talent, diffident in company, and shrinking from observation, was the thing to be thought of? And so he tried to banish the impression from his mind.

But in meetings for social worship, which were frequent in Spear Grove, he could not keep silent. Often the pent-up feelings of his soul would swell his throbbing heart and find utterance in burning words and gushing tears. Moreover, the repressed thought would not be exiled from his bosom, but as often as sent away returned again to his breast, like Noah's dove to the ark, and nestled there.

How much that thought followed and perplexed him I can not tell—how, when he sought the "bower of prayer" in the grove beyond the field, it met him there; and when some youthful associate was carried to the grave it met him there; or how, in meeting for social worship, held for want of better places, in groves and barns, as the tide of feeling rose in the audience, he was sometimes tempted to pledge himself publicly to the work of the Lord.

Sometimes when, at twilight hour, of summer eve, a female friend would sing at his request,

"Hark! listen to the trumpeters,
They call for volunteers;
On Zion's high and flowery mount Behold her officers;"

the words would stir the deep fountains of his soul; and he would feel like grasping the standard and rushing to the battle-field of Zion. When he encouraged the idea that he was called to the work of the ministry he was happy; when he resisted it he was sad and gloomy. Slowly but steadily the conviction of duty gained upon him, till he came to the conclusion that to resist the impression longer would be to resist the Holy Spirit of God; and when, unsolicited, license was put into his hand, and a neat pocket Bible was presented to him by a friend, with these apostolic words written on the fly-leaf, "Study to show thyself approved unto God a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth," he settled fully in his mind the question: he must become a laborer in the vineyard of the Lord. But the time—here was a wide margin for expediency. Could he not wait to bury his father or to sharpen his sickle? though the harvest seemed ripe enough and the laborers were few. Yes, he might preach occasionally on the Sabbath and prosecute business during the week, and thus lay a foundation for worldly competence; for Mammon whispered, "Else you will always be poor; get property first, and then go into the field."

At this juncture a tempting offer was made to him to engage in a business which promised to be lucrative, and to postpone to a future period what he felt to be immediate duty. A sore conflict of mind ensued, which lasted for some time; but he did not neglect the improvement of his talent; he studied books, held meetings in destitute places, and was encouraged by seeing some fruit of his labor.

One Sabbath afternoon he preached in his own neighborhood, surrounded by his young associates, whom curiosity, if nothing better, had collected in the old school-house. Laura K. was there, too. But the Leghorn hat and wreath had passed away, and, by most persons, probably was forgotten. That night the young preacher retired thoughtfully to rest in the same apartment where he had penned the "Artificial Flower," and the same murmuring of the distant lake lulled him to repose.

He dreamed—what? why, that a messenger came to tell him that Laura K. was dead! Quick as lightning the thought rushed to his mind, "Dead! Laura dead! O have I done my duty! Did I do all I could to win her to the Savior?" No satisfactory answer seemed to come, and he resolved to go at once to the house of death.

Proceeding to the place he entered noiselessly the familiar room, and there he beheld, robed in snowy white and laid out on a bed, the once gay and lovely Laura. Silently approaching the bed he bent over her pale and still beautiful face, when, to his great amazement, the corpse opened its eyes and looked earnestly at him.

"She is not dead!" he exclaimed, and placing his hand beneath her head, as if to raise her to a sitting posture, she seemed light as a feather, and glided like a spirit from his hand to a distant corner of the room, where she stood upright, assuming a stature of extraordinary magnitude and angelic appearance. Her robes were of dazzling brightness, but in singular contrast with her unearthly aspect. On her head was that forgotten hat and wreath of flowers. An awful and majestic sternness settled on her countenance; her eyes seemed charged with lightning, and were fixed with steadfast and mysterious gaze on the youthful preacher. No words can describe the look of those piercing eyes; their burning glances went like daggers to his heart, and for a moment the young man stood petrified and speechless. Her look was an accusing one, and he felt it. At length he exclaimed, "In the name of heaven, Laura, why gaze thus at me!" She replied sternly, "You are guilty of murder." Now, thought he, this is terrible to be accused of such a crime, and that, too, by one just risen from the dead. Surely I am guilty of no such a deed; but she will be believed and I shall be disgraced, condemned, perhaps executed. Then turning with agitated countenance to the accusing spirit, for such it now seemed, he cried, "Tell me, I adjure thee, this moment, whom I have murdered, and if guilty I will frankly confess."

Slowly the specter raised her pale hand, and pointing with her finger directly at his heart, she uttered in such tones as never came from mortal lips, in slow and measured accents, these burning words, "Thou art guilty of the blood of souls in not warning them to flee from the wrath to come." Suddenly, as if struck with the lightning's bolt, the young man fell prostrate on the floor, exclaiming, in tones of anguish, "Guilty! guilty!"

At that moment he awoke, trembling with excitement and bathed in tears. It was but a dream, but those burning words followed him and sounded in his ears, "The blood of souls." What if his Savior should, at some future time, reiterate them in his hearing!

A rosy morn succeeded to that troubled night; but all day long that accusing spirit was before him; her white robes flashed before his eyes. That piercing look—the unutterable anguish of that moment—what if it should become a verity! During that day he was not thoughtless, and as the last beams of the setting sun lingered on the tall tree-tops of the forest, God heard, from a sequestered bower, a vow which has never been recalled. That dream was never decided to have been supernatural; but no matter, it was suggestive and illustrative of a condition of mind which for worlds he would not endure. A short time for preparation, and the "Prairie Bard" forsook his rustic harp and rural home for the itinerant field; and although a quarter of a century has rolled over him he has never regretted his vow nor forgotten that "wreath of flowers."

VICE.

A SOCIETY composed of none but the wicked could not exist; it contains within itself the seeds of its own destruction, and, without a flood, would be swept away from the earth by the deluge of its own iniquity. The moral cement of all society is virtue. Where there is no integrity there can be no confidence; and where there is no confidence there can be no unanimity.

THE SEA BOY'S GRAVE.

"All tears wiped off from every eye,
They wander where the freshest pastures lie,
Through all the nightless day of that unfading sky."

AS we drew near the end of our voyage from the West Indies, the weather became squally, and we had occasionally a good deal of sea, which made things very uncomfortable on board. A sailor, who had behaved very ill at the outset of the voyage, and with whom the men had declined keeping company, had been seized with a fever; and although it had been in some measure subdued, yet the poor fellow was in a very dangerous state. He had been a bad and wicked man; and now that he was apparently drawing near to death, it was desirable that some care and kindness might be shown him in regard to his soul. The captain and crew were very indifferent upon the subject; and I had been so ill, that I was scarcely able to get out of my berth. There happened, however, to be a boy on board, who went among the sailors by the nickname of Pious Jack; or what was, perhaps, equally to his honor, or to the honor of the philanthropist from whom he derived it, they used to call him Jack Raikes, from his having been educated in one of the Sunday schools of "Robert Raikes, of Gloucester;" of which city the boy, John Pelham, was a native. Poor Jack, however, cared very little for the sneers and scoffs of the seamen; and the meekness, patience, and temper with which he endured the jibes and jeers of many on board, often gave me occasion to say, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained strength, that thou mightest still the enemy."

When Williams, the poor sailor, was dying, and indeed all the time he had been ill, no body had shown him any kindness except little Jack and a negro woman who was on board, the attendant of a child, whom she was bringing over to some relations in England. This woman, who was always called Cleo, ministered to the wants of the dying seaman, nursing him with great tenderness, and preparing with her own hands whatever she thought would be likely to tempt his sickly appetite.

The little Creole, whom Cleo had in charge, was a sweet child, about four years old. I saw her very seldom, for she generally amused herself on deck, when the weather would permit, playing with a pet kid which had been spared for her sake, and which followed her wherever she went. She had taught it to go down and up the companion ladder, and she would bring it in her arms into my cabin, almost every morning, when she came to ask me how I did.

This excellent negress was kind and attentive to the sick and young, for we had two or three of both on board; and though she had little idea of the profounder doctrines of Christianity, she yet possessed some knowledge of the truth, and she had a deep sympathy for the soul of the dying man. She could not read herself, but she knew that the Bible revealed the Christian's God, and taught the way to heaven; and she would sit with devout attention, listening to every word which the dear boy, Jack, read from that holy book, not only from day to day, but whenever he could persuade Williams to hearken to it.

Things had gone on in this way for some time, when one day Jack came into my cabin, his face bathed in tears, a look of horror on his countenance, his whole frame trembling with agitation, and himself unable to speak; I thought from his appearance that poor Williams was dead, and that he had left poor Jack no "hope in his death."

"What's the matter, Jack?" I said, starting up on my elbow in bed. "What has happened? Williams—is he dead?"

"Dear sir," said the boy, regardless of my question, "Williams—poor Williams! he is in agony of soul; he says he is lost—that he is a ruined sinner—that he must, sir—he must—O! I can not say the word—he says God will cast him into the place," continued Jack, in a burst of inexpressible anguish, "where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth! O! what shall I say to him?"

"Dear boy," I said, "do not afflict your soul so bitterly. It is well that Williams feels all this; take it, my child, as a token for good from the hand of your heavenly Father, who is not unmindful of your prayers and labors of love for this trembling penitent. Go to him again, bid him call upon his God; he has said, 'Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee!' Tell him that God is, indeed, as he believes him to be, a just God, who will by no means clear the guilty without an atonement; bid him believe in the blood of that atonement already made for the sins of many; tell him God can be just, even while he pardons all his sins, if he throws himself upon his mercy in Christ Jesus. Say to him, it is not too late to believe—neither is it too late for God to have mercy; the Lord delighteth in mercy; only let him seek repentance at the throne of grace, and faith in the blood that cleanseth from all sin. O, say to him, God waiteth to be gracious!"

"Sir," replied Jack, "I have told him all this already; but he says he can not believe it. He says every body's sins are forgiven but his. I have told him the history of the thief on the cross—of the laborer called at the eleventh hour—of the lost sheep—and all the parables about God's love to sinners—and how Christ came into the world on purpose to save sinners, even the chief. But he says—he can not believe it; and he will not pray!"

"Nevertheless, go to him again, my dear, good boy; read to him, and I will come and pray with him." This I said, not knowing that the boy was able of himself to pray for another.

I rose with difficulty, and found my way into the way where Williams was sitting up in his hammock, his face pale and ghastly, his eyes sunk in his forehead, and his bosom laboring with the heavy respiration of death. Jack and Cleo were both on their knees beside his berth; and the little child, not well knowing the meaning of what she did, had covered her face with her hands; but she was evidently looking through her half-closed eyelids. Jack was reading the office for the sick; Williams, deeply, agitated, his hands clasped, and his emaciated fingers convulsively compressed against each other, was now and then attempting to pray. After every petition, the little sea boy paused for the dying man's response, saying, he would read no further if Williams still refused to pray to God.

"Open thine eye of mercy, O most gracious God!" said the boy at last, closing the book, and speaking, I suppose, from memory, or perhaps out of the abundance of his own heart, "Open thine eye of mercy upon this dying man, who most earnestly desireth pardon and forgiveness, but will not pray for it."

"O, earnestly!" exclaimed the wretched man, with a voice so full of the bitterness of death that it sent back the blood in a cold shiver to my heart.

"Renew in him, most loving Father," continued the little intercessor, "whatsoever hath been decayed by the fraud or malice of the devil, or by his own carnal will; O, impute not unto him the guilt of his former sins!"

The boy here paused again and looked with an eye of supplication upon Williams, beseeching him, as if with the whole tenderness of his soul, to reiterate the petition; but Williams replied only with a look of horror.

"For the sake of Christ," resumed the little suppliant, "who bore our sins in his own body upon the cross, show thy pity on Harry Williams!"

The boy again paused, and taking the hand of Williams, attempted, by an act of kind compulsion, to raise it into an attitude of supplication.

"He has no hope, O Lord, but in thy sweet mercy! O, visit him with thy benign salvation!"

"I have no hope!" at last exclaimed the man, wringing his hands in despair; "I have no hope!"

"O, look down from the height of thy sanctuary, and hear the groaning of this poor prisoner, and loose him who seemeth now to be appointed unto death!"

"O, I am appointed unto death!"

"O Lord! wilt thou not regard the cry of the destitute? behold, he is destitute! we can do nothing to help him—help thou him, O our God!"

"Help me, O my God!"

"O Lord, save! save this poor dying man; O, save Harry Williams!"

"Lord, save Harry Williams!" was uttered by all present, even by the little child; and Williams, softened by their affectionate sympathy, and doubtless also by the power of that word which is both spirit and life, melted into tenderness, and, falling back on his pillow, shed a torrent of tears.

These tears, the first that had moistened his burning brain since the commencement of his sickness, evidently brought relief to his overburdened spirit. As drops of rain to the bruised reed, or as the evening breeze to the smoking flax, they were just what nature required at this moment of deep extremity. I sat by him till the emotion that swelled his heart and filled his eye had somewhat subsided; and, commending him to the Father of mercies, withdrew to my cabin.

I did not see him again for many days after this, my own indisposition having increased, but I heard of him often, both from Jack and the negro woman. Every moment the boy could spare from the duties of his station on board, was occupied in reading the Scriptures to Williams, who was now often seen engaged in prayer for himself; and he began by degrees to talk less of the justice of God, a subject which had always filled him with alarm, and more of his love.

After a few days, being considerably better, I told Jack that I would see Williams to-morrow. Cleo, however, said that she thought Williams was now too near his end for me to delay my visit; I, therefore, arose in the evening and went again to his berth.

The horror, so strongly marked in every feature the first time I saw him, had dwelt upon my mind, and, on entering the little place where he was lying in his cot, I dreaded the idea of looking on him again. But how sweet was my surprise when I beheld in poor—no, in happy

Williams, a countenance of the most touching complacency, and of a placidity so soft, that one would have thought that death, which was evidently upon the very threshold, was the object, not of fear, but of long-desired approach! He had suffered much in the interval between my former visit and this from many doubts and fears; but now they seemed to have been all subdued; and he said to me, with the triumph of one deeply conscious to whom the glory was due, "I am a conqueror through Him that loved me. O, that wonderful love!"

I spoke to him for some time of the grounds on which he built his hopes, and was much satisfied with all he said in reply. He heard me with all the attention and courtesy which the subject demanded; but he seemed as if he thought—so grateful was he—that he wronged his young friend, in deriving consolation from any one's conversation but his. Every word the boy now uttered was as much a source of joy to Williams as it had formerly been of horror. He said to him, two or three times that night, referring to the struggle he had had in the morning, "It is calm now, Jack—all calm. Is this peace?"

"Yes," replied he, "I trust it is peace, the peace of God, which the Bible says passeth all understanding."

"Who has given me this peace?" said Williams, as if he delighted in the ascription of praise to his divine Redeemer, "Who hath given me this peace?"

"Christ," said the boy, in a voice so solemn and so soft, that it seemed like the breathing of some ministering angel, rather than the articulation of a human voice. "Christ is our peace; he hath made peace for us."

"Yes," said Williams, "by the blood of his cross."

Whether it was that the near presence of death naturally tends to unnerve us, or that my spirits were weak from long confinement, I can not tell, but I felt compelled, at this moment, to steal away, to hide the emotion gathering round my heart, which I was unable any longer to repress.

I lay awake all night, meditating on the things I had seen and heard in poor Harry's berth. No sound disturbed the repose of all on board, except the man at the helm, as he chanted, from time to time, some doleful ditty. In the midst of this calm the spirit of Harry Williams winged its flight aloft, entering into the presence of Him whom the heaven of heavens can not contain, and mingling with the thousand thousands of ministering spirits which, "thick as stars, surround him."

The next day but one the body of Williams was committed to the mighty deep. The poor boy, on this occasion, seemed to feel as if, for the first time, that his friend and pupil was indeed no more. But when he heard the heavy plunge of the corpse in the water; when he heard the waves, with a gurgling sound, close over the body, and shut out forever all that remained of dear Harry Williams, the boy, unable any longer to control the violence of his feelings, uttered a piercing cry, and, so infectious is unfeigned sorrow, that many an iron countenance, that gave little indication of a kind heart within, was that day bedewed with tears.

I looked upon the whole circumstances of this day's scene as a merciful and providential preparation for what followed; for, three days after, as we drew near the Land's End, a strong gale of wind from the west south-west sprung up, and missing the port in the Channel for which we were bound, we made for the Downs, expecting to have come to anchor there; but the wind shifted, and, continuing more boisterous than at the first, we were glad to stand out to sea. We sprung a leak, and were driven at the mercy of the winds and waves for three days and three nights, till we knew not well where we were. It would be in vain for me to attempt to describe the feelings of those on board. The moment of danger is not the time for any one to seek peace with God; and that which ought to be the object of every day's labor should not be left to hours of peril and sickness to accomplish. Now, indeed, is always an accepted time, and God forbid that I should dare to limit the mercy that is measureless; but they who have neglected the great salvation in the day of sunshine and of calm, come with a load of aggravated provocations before God, when they draw near to him only in the whirlwind and the storm.

The wind being somewhat abated, in the course of the fourth day from our leaving the Channel, we made the Firth of Forth, and came to anchor. But the storm, which during the last two or three hours had subsided into a sullen calm, burst out again, toward sunset, with a tremendous fury, and driving us from our moorings, it carried us among the islands of the Firth. At half-past eleven o'clock, in the absence of moon and stars, and amid cries of "Breakers ahead!" we struck upon a sunken rock, the mainmast coming down with a fearful crash.

In the midst of all this outward misery and distress, I felt a keener edge set to my own sufferings by witnessing the affliction of the affectionate negress, and the anguish with which she gazed upon her "Massa's child." Her own fate she seemed to meet with heroic firmness, sustained, I hope, by her confidence in God, and her confidence in the Redeemer. "But Massa's child, my Missis' little girl!"—she wrung her hands over her in unutterable agony. Her deep despair was strangely contrasted by the infantine composure of the child. For the last half hour she had held her little bleating pet in her lap, saying she would not have Nanny to be drowned; and when she saw Cleo, and Jack, and I, and all, I may say, engaged at intervals in prayer, she would try to imitate us, saying, with a most solemn look, "Lord, let me die with Cleo, and Jack will pray for me to Jesus Christ."

As the flood-tide set in, the breakers on the rock became more and more tremendous. The boat was hoisted out, but the shore presented no hope whatever of safety, for it was one unbroken reef of rocks and shelving stones, on which the sea was dashing with a noise like thunder. I determined to abide by the wreck; and, seeing I could but die, while I had life I left no means of self-preservation unimproved; so, lashing myself to a spar, I silently witnessed the embarkation of Cleo and her child, dear Jack, and some others of the sailors, in the boat. With much difficulty the men were enabled to set a little bit of sail, and made for the shore, in the presence of hundreds of spectators, who were looking with anguish upon our miserable situation. When they put off from the wreck, they went pretty well for about a quarter of a mile or so, the sail keeping them buoyant, and the boat standing with her head against the waves. But as she drew nearer and nearer the surf, a tremendous squall involved them all in darkness, and torrents of rain quite shut them out from our view. But, O, how shall I relate what followed!—the sky cleared almost as suddenly as it was overcast—the squall subsided—the sun shone out—we looked, and looked again, till our eye-balls were almost bursting from their sockets—we strained our vision again to look; and the cry, "Where's the boat?—where's the boat?"—the shriek from the spectators on the cliffs, and the groans from my fellow-sufferers on the wreck, came at once with a louder and more fearful sweep than even the wildest ravings of the tempest. Again it returned, in one simultaneous burst of anguish. The sea, indeed, answered the demand, and gave up the boat; but she gave not up the dead—the boat appeared, driven with her keel above the waters; but her interesting freight was gone forever!

O the horrors of that moment! And yet, amid them all, while I clung shivering to the shrouds of the vessel, expecting every moment to be swallowed up by the merciless sea, I felt, as it were, a beam of light cross my soul as I followed in spirit the sailor boy, and beheld him, with his ransomed companions, enter into the joy of his Lord.

The wreck, contrary to all human calculation, continued to hold together till next morning, when, the storm having been succeeded by a calm, that smiled, as it were, on the ruin its predecessors had accomplished, my fellow-sufferers and myself were brought, by the kind care of the fishermen on the coast, safe to land.

Being much exhausted, I went to bed in a little cottage, whose generous owner hospitably opened her door to receive me. In the evening I arose, and went to view the bodies of those who had been washed ashore. On the low but decent bed of the little village ale-house, Cleo and her "Massa's child" were lying. They were clasped together in an inseparable embrace—the child's hand reposing on the bosom of her nurse; and the swarthy arms of Cleo were locked around her little darling; while death itself, which severs the dearest and fondest ties of human tenderness, here appeared only to have rendered their communion more indissoluble. They were buried in each other's arms.

I was turning away from the last view of their remains, when I perceived that poor Nanny, the pet kid, who had survived by swimming ashore, and who had followed me into the room, had climbed with its fore-feet upon the bed, and was licking the dead hand of its sweet little playmate.

Poor Jack—less honored, but surely not less worthy of honor—was laid out on a sheet on the floor, a blue checkered shirt his only shroud. On his hands and face a few scratches were visible, which he had received from the rocks. Yet his countenance wore a heavenly expression; and, stooping down, I robbed his dear head of a little lock of auburn hair. His effects—alas! how poor! and yet how rich!—were spread upon a table in the room, and consisted of a little leathern purse, in which was a well-kept half crown and a solitary sixpence. His Bible was placed by his side. I took it up and observed engraven on its clasps of brass these words: "The gift of Robert Raikes to J. R. Pelham, Glo'ster." O Raikes! this is one gem of purest light; but it is but one of the many thousand gems that shall encircle thy radiant head in that day when the Lord of hosts shall make up his jewels! For they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever.—True Tales for Spare Hours.

EXTREMES IN RELATION TO DRESS.

"This is no time to encourage superfluity of apparel."

BY REV. L. A. EDDY.

IN selecting the above from a little book which is not as well known as it should be, as the basis of a few remarks on personal ornaments, I propose to show how superfluity in dress is sometimes encouraged, and why it is now no time for us to give such encouragement. Before, however, we consider these questions, there are two or three preliminary ones which should be settled.

The first is, whether this subject is really worthy of our serious attention. There are some professed Christians who look upon such discussions as very puerile business; and when their pastor makes pointed allusions to this topic, if they do not actually turn his instructions into ridicule, seem to wonder how any sensible, well-bred man can so far degrade the dignity of the pulpit as to expatiate on matters so trifling. Do such persons realize that thoughts like these not only seriously reflect upon their pastor, but his divine Master, the almighty Governor of the universe, who has seen fit to incorporate these small things into his statutes, which he has expressly required his ambassadors to publish, and by which all mankind are to be judged at the last day? Do they realize that human life is chiefly made up of what are called little things, and that the neglect of or attention to really small matters often furnishes infallible tests of character? Such persons would do well to consider the pithy answer of a minister to a lady, who, when he advised her in relation to certain points of practical piety, said she thought he was rather too precise: he replied, "I serve a precise God."

Another question is, whether there is, at the present time, occasion for the agitation of this subject. There certainly is not if the evil has only an imaginary existence in the Church, or, if real, is gradually disappearing. But is either of these suppositions sustained by facts? I think not. Without reference to those times when some of our fathers leaned to the extreme not merely of simplicity, but of Quakerish singularity of dress, has there not been within a few years past an obvious tendency toward excessive show and extravagance, and with certain classes an eagerness amounting almost to a mania for the display particularly of jewelry? If not, I shall be happy to be convinced of my mistake; but if I am correct, should we not avail ourselves of every means to enlighten errorists on this subject, and shew that, although almost inexhaustible mines of gold have been discovered in California, the Divine prohibition against adorning our persons with it has not been repealed?

But the most important preliminary query is, what are we to understand by superfluity of apparel? This question confessedly is not so easily answered. Even Mr. Wesley is not as explicit upon this point as is desirable. For instance, in his Sermon on Dress—Vol. II, page 259—he tells us, that, while the Bible manifestly "forbids ordinary Christians, those in the lower or middle ranks of life, to be adorned with gold, or pearls, or costly apparel," he doubts whether "any part of the Scripture forbids those in any nation that are invested with supreme authority to be arrayed in gold and costly apparel, or to adorn their immediate attendants, or magistrates, or officers, with the same." Now, if the reader will turn to Volume VI, page 549, of Mr. Wesley's Works, he will find an entirely different and, I think, more consistent view of the matter. He says, "Our Savior once occasionally said, 'Behold they who wear gorgeous [splendid] apparel are in kings' courts;' but he does not say they ought to be even there; he neither enjoins nor countenances it."

Whether this last is his more mature view of the point in question, I am unable to say, but, I repeat, it seems more consistent and Scriptural than the former; for if we admit that one class of Christians, whatever their position in society, may, without sin, array themselves in gold or pearls, we must of course allow those "in the lower or middle ranks of life" to do the same. Indeed, is it not more important that Christian simplicity should characterize those of highly cultivated minds, and who occupy influential positions in society, than those of more limited advantages? The truth is, whatever may be the meaning of the apostolic interdictions on this subject, they are of universal application. Though specifically addressed to females, the principle involved applies to both sexes and to all classes. Still it must be admitted that the culpability of the use of what are usually termed superfluous ornaments depends much upon circumstances. Gold is not, in itself, an evil. It is not the use, but the abuse of gold that is forbidden. We have no proof that it is impossible to wear this or other precious metals about our persons without an infraction of God's law. But there can be no doubt of the sinfulness of their use when we "adorn" ourselves with them, and wear them as mere ornaments.

As trivial a matter as we may affect to view this subject, individuals never purchase jewelry and put it upon their own persons or their children
